The Vosseller Case was quite similar to the case at bar. It was there held that the property of the vendor was not subject to a mechanic's lien upon the buildings erected or altered by the vendee. In that case it was said: "It would be a most unusual statute, and of doubtful validity, which should provide that in case a vendor sells real estate by an ordinary executory contract of sale, knowing that the vendee intended to erect a building thereon, the vendor's interest should be charged with a lien for the expense of erecting a building, and so improve the vendor out of his estate." In that case, as in this, there was no provision in the contract which required the vendee to make the improvements which were made upon the premises. In the Havens Case it was held that the mere fact that a landlord may know that his tenant contemplates making certain improvements, or applying the property to certain purposes, cannot make the former liable for the expense of such work. The Hankinson Case is to the effect that a mere general consent of an owner that the lessee in occupation may, at his own expense, make alterations in a building occupied by him, does not constitute a consent by the owner that a third party shall furnish labor or materials for the alterations, so as to make such labor and materials the basis of a mechanic's lien upon the building, especially in the absence of any notice or knowledge on the part of the owner from which such consent can be implied. After reviewing several authorities in this court, it was there said: "Thus it seems that the requirements of this statute as to consent are not met by a mere general agreement to the effect that a third person may, at his own expense, make alterations in a building occupied by him. The statute requires more. It requires either that the owner shall expressly consent to the particular alteration made, or that, with a knowledge of the particular object for which they are employed, he acquiesces in the means adopted for that purpose." In the DeKlyn Case it was decided that the consent necessary under the mechanic's lien law, to render the owner liable for work done or materials furnished, will not be implied from a mere acquiescence by the owner in the alterations, in the absence of any affirmative act or declaration on his part which might have misled the lessee or contractor. It was there said: "The owner's interest in his real estate is not liable in every case in which, to his knowledge, labor and materials are furnished for erections upon his real property or alterations in the existing erections. . . . Consent is not a vacant or neutral attitude in respect of a question of such material interest to the property owner." In Rice v. Culver the authorities relating to the subject were quite exhaustively examined, and we held that, to constitute the consent mentioned in the statute, the owner must either be an affirmative factor in procuring the improvement to be made, or, having possession and control of the premises, assent to the improvement in the expectation that he will receive the benefit of it. This review of the authorities discloses that the consent relied upon by the respondent was insufficient to justify the court in holding the land of the university liable to the liens sought to be enforced in this action. Therefore there was in this case no evidence to justify the trial court in finding that the labor and materials performed and furnished by the lienors were furnished with the consent of the university. It thus appearing that there was no evidence which, according to any reasonable view, supports the finding of the trial court, and as the affirmation by the appellate division was not unanimous, the question whether there was any evidence to support that finding raises a question of law which the court of appeals may review. Ostrom v. Greene, 161 N. Y. 353, 55 N. E. 919.

While there were several other questions presented upon the argument and in the briefs of counsel, still, as the judgment must be reversed upon the ground that there was no valid consent by the owner which made its land liable for the liens placed thereon, no discussion of those questions seems necessary. It may, however, be remarked that the admission of the evidence as to the acts and declarations of Dahlgren was clearly erroneous, and the judgment might well be reversed upon that ground.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Frank P. ELLIOTT, Appt.

(172 N. Y. 146.)

Reading on a second trial of a criminal case testimony of a witness who died after the first trial, at which accused was present and represented by counsel, who was accorded the right of cross-examination, does not infringe the right of the accused to be confronted with the witnesses against him, in the presence of the court.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This defendant has been twice tried. The judgment of conviction at the first trial was reversed by this court. 163 N. Y. 11, 57 N. E. 103. At the second trial a judgment of conviction was entered upon the verdict of a jury, which on appeal was affirmed by the appellate division, and we are now called upon to pass on that determination.

The learned counsel for the defendant presents three grounds for the reversal of this judgment. Error in challenging the jury; failure of the trial judge to follow the decision of this court on the first appeal, in charging the jury; the admission of the testimony of Dr. Brooks, who was dead at the time of the second trial. The appellate division decided that none of these grounds presented reversible error, and we are of the same opinion, but deem it proper to further consider the question whether Dr. Brooks's testimony was properly read on the second trial.

The Code of Criminal Procedure (§ 8, subd. 3) provides that in a criminal action the defendant is entitled "to produce witnesses in his behalf, and to be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the court, except that where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a magistrate, and the testimony reduced by him to the form of a deposition in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined, or had an opportunity to cross-examine, the witness, . . . the deposition of the witness may be read upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found in the state." There seems to be no provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure authorizing, in terms, the reading on a second trial of the testimony of a deceased witness sworn at the first trial. The Code of Civil Procedure (§ 830) provides as follows: "Where a party or witness has died . . . since the trial of an action . . . the testimony of the decedent, . . . taken or read in evidence at the former trial or hearing, may be given or read in evidence at a new trial or hearing, or upon any subsequent trial or hearing, of the same subject-matter in an action . . . between the same parties who were parties to such former trial or hearing or their legal representatives, by either party to such new trial or hearing or to such subsequent action . . . subject to any other legal objection to the competency of the witness, or to any other legal objection to his testimony or any question put to him. The original stenographic notes of such testimony, taken by a stenographer who has since died or become incompetent, may be so read in evidence by any person whose competency to read the same accurately is established to the satisfaction of the court, . . . presiding at the trial of such action. . . ." The section quoted refers to the death of a witness after the trial of an "action." Section 3333 of the Code of Civil Procedure defines "action" as follows: "The word 'action' as used in the New Revision of the Statutes, when applied to judicial proceedings, signifies an ordinary prosecution, in a court of justice, by a party against another party, for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense." This definition renders it clear that § 830 of the Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted, refers to both civil and criminal actions. Section 8 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that the defendant shall be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the court. This is merely a re-enactment of the Bill of Rights, which provides, in § 14, that the accused shall be confronted with the witnesses against him. 2 Rev. Stat. Banks's ed. 1561. The Constitution of this state, unlike the Federal Constitution, has no similar provision.

The question has been much discussed whether the reading of testimony, reduced to a deposition in a preliminary examination, where the accused was represented by counsel and exercised the right of cross-examination, or testimony taken at a former trial, where the deponent or witness was dead at the time of the subsequent trial, could be read in evidence. It has also been matter of discussion whether the precise testimony taken at a former trial should be read in evidence from the minutes, or, in case of their destruction, the substance thereof given by a witness who heard the testimony delivered at the first trial. In the case of People v. Williams, 35 Hun, 516, the question of the constitutionality of § 8, subd. 3, of the Code of Criminal Procedure, was under consideration. Judge Daniels said (p. 518): "It is manifest from the authorities permitting the deposition or evidence of a deceased witness to be read upon a trial of the accused that it has not been deemed essential that he should be confronted by the witness against him upon the trial itself; but if the evidence be taken in the course of the proceeding in his presence, and with the right or privilege of cross-examination secured to him, that will be sufficient to allow the deposition to be read, in case of the decease of the witness making it, between the time when it may be taken and the time of the trial. And if this article of the Constitution should be held to be applicable to the case, it would not, therefore, exclude the deposition received in evidence on the trial of the defendant." The Constitution here referred to is the Federal Constitution, for, as already observed, the state Constitution has no provision for the right of confrontation. In People v. Penhollow, 42 Hun, 103, it appeared that a witness on the part of the people at the first trial of this indictment was dead at the time of the second trial, and the district attorney offered to read in evidence her testimony as previously given. To the reception of this proof the defendant objected on the ground that it was incompetent and unconstitutional, being in violation of the 6th article of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall be confronted with the witnesses against him. The court said (p. 105): "This provision has no application to criminal trials in the state courts for a violation of state laws. This right secured to the accused is limited in its application to citizens of the United States on trial in the Federal courts, charged with a violation of the Constitution of the United States or of the laws of Congress. . . . Our own state Constitution does not contain any provision securing to the accused the right and privilege of being confronted by the witnesses against him. In the Bill of Rights, adopted by the legislature, there is a provision similar to the one embraced in the Constitution of the United States, and expressed in the identical words." The learned judge here quotes § 14 of the Bill of Rights, and proceeds as follows: "The accused was confronted by the witness on the former trial, and he had an opportunity of making a cross-examination, and that satisfies the requirements of the statutes. The right secured to the accused, it is to be observed, is 'to be confronted with the witnesses against him.' This language does not require that the accused shall in all cases be confronted with the witnesses against him upon a pending trial of the indictment. The courts have held that the statute is satisfied, in cases of necessity, if the accused has been once confronted by the witness against him in any stage of the proceedings upon the same accusation, and has had an opportunity of a cross-examination, by himself or by counsel, in his behalf." In Brown v. Com. 73 Pa. 321, 13 Am. Rep. 740, the question was considered whether the testimony taken by the commonwealth, on a hearing before a justice of the peace, of a person charged with murder, was admissible on the trial. Chief Justice Read, in a very careful and able opinion, considered the question at some length, citing many authorities, and reached the conclusion that the testimony was admissible. A like question was before the court in Com. v. Richards, 18 Pick. 434, 20 Am. Dec. 608. The learned court said: "It has been contended for the defendant that the admission of such evidence is directly against the 12th article of the Bill of Rights, which provides that in criminal cases the subject shall have a right 'to meet the witness against him, face to face.' Now, the defendant did meet the witness who has deceased, face to face, and might have cross-examined him before the magistrate touching this accusation. . . . We think it to be very clear that testimony of what a deceased witness did testify on a former trial, between the same parties on the same issue, is competent evidence. The rule is thus well stated in 2 Lilly's Abr. 745: 'If one who gave evidence on a former trial be dead, then, upon proof of his death, any person who heard him give evidence and observed it shall be admitted to give the same evidence as the deceased witness gave, provided it were between the same parties.' I cite the passage for the expression 'shall be permitted to give the same evidence' which the deceased gave. It is to be the same, not a part, not the effect or substance, but the whole evidence which the deceased witness gave, touching the matter or issue in controversy. 1 Phillips, Ev. chap. 7, § 7; Miles v. O'Hara, 4 Binn. 111; Pyke v. Crouch, 1 Ld. Raym. 730; Melvin v. Whiting, 7 Pick. 79; Bull. N. P. 242 et seq." In People v. Newman, 5 Hill, 295, the supreme court of this state held that in a criminal action the public prosecutor will not be allowed to use the testimony given by the witness at a former trial on the same indictment, though he be absent from the state. It is stated in a per curiam opinion as follows: "It seems to be settled in this court that nothing short of the witness's death can be received to let in his testimony given on a former trial. Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. 176; Wilbur v. Selden, 6 Cow. 162. And see Jackson ex dem. Potter v. Bailey, 2 Johns. 17; Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 446, o Am. Dec. 348; White v. Kibling, 11 Johns. 128; Crary v. Sprague, 12 Wend. 41, 44, 45, 27 Am. Dec. 110. But if the rule were otherwise in respect to civil cases, we are of opinion that it should not be applied to criminal proceedings. . . . It is not now necessary, however, to decide that point; the present case being one of mere absence from the territorial jurisdiction of the court." In the case of United States v. Macomb, 5 McLean, 286, Fed. Cas. No. 15,702, the circuit court of the United States, seventh circuit, held that where, at the preliminary examination, a witness, since deceased, testified in relation to the offense, the accused being present and his counsel accorded the right of cross-examination, on a trial before a jury, under an indictment for the same offense, witnesses might be permitted to testify as to what the deceased swore to on the preliminary examination. Judge Drummond in that case made an exhaustive examination of the authorities, and reasons the question on principle at length. Mr. Underhill, in his work on Criminal Evidence (§ 261), says: "In criminal as in civil procedure, the evidence of a witness at a prior trial may be proved as evidence in a subsequent trial of the accused for the same offense if the witness is dead, or has become incompetent by reason of mental derangement. His testimony is admissible either for or against the party in whose favor he originally testified." State v. Taylor, 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 508, 513; Hair v. State, 16 Neb. 601, 605, 21 N. W. 464; State v. McNeil, 33 La. Ann. 1332; O'Brian v. Com. 6 Bush, 563, 571; State v. Johnson, 12 Nev. 121, 123; State v. Able, 65 Mo. 357; Sullivan v. State, 6 Tex. App. 319, 32 Am. Rep. 580. In 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 163g, this language is used: "The death of the witness has always and as of course been considered as sufficient to allow the use of his former testimony." Citing a number of cases in England and several states of the Union. See also Abbott, Trial Brief Crim. Cas. § 664, and cases cited; 1 Phillpotts, Ev. Cowen & H. Notes, p. 571, note 437, p. 578, note 442.

It seems to have been the universal rule that the evidence of a deceased witness could be read on the second trial in civil cases. It has been debated to some extent whether the rule should be extended to criminal trials. It is safe to say that the great weight of authority is in favor of such extension. The object of all trials, civil, and criminal, is to arrive at the truth and do justice; and it would certainly tend to an opposite result if testimony carefully taken upon a former trial at which the accused was represented by counsel, who was permitted the right of cross-examination, is to be excluded by the mere accident of the death of the witness, which is liable to occur in all prolonged litigations. In this state the discussion of the question seems to have been confined to the lower courts, and mainly in the earlier cases. There is little doubt that the practice in civil cases in this regard has been adopted by the criminal courts as matter of course, which accounts for the fact that the question has not been presented to this court so far as we are advised. The legislature, in enacting § 830 of the Code of Civil Procedure, already quoted, evidently sought to codify what was an existing general rule in both civil and criminal cases. If this legislation could properly be regarded as violating the right of confrontation, as contained in the Bill of Rights, it would amount only to a modification of the rule as laid down in the former legislation. There is, however, no ground for such criticism, as it is very clear that the right of confrontation has been carefully guarded in this and other states, by only admitting such testimony or depositions as were taken in the presence of the accused, represented by counsel, exercising the full right of cross-examination.

While unable to find reversible legal error in this record, we feel constrained to repeat what we said on the first appeal (163 N. Y. 12, 57 N. E. 104),—that "in a case like the one before us, where the indictment charges a heinous and unnatural offense, it is most difficult to secure an absolutely fair trial." There are features of this case, common to both trials, where evidence was procured for the people at the fearful cost of a mother voluntarily subjecting a mere child to the alleged repetition of an unthinkable and horrible offense by the father. This is a phase of the case we do not feel justified in passing over without comment. It was an unconscionable and brutal act on the part of the child's mother, in seeking to secure her husband's conviction by resorting to a mode of procedure that shocks the moral sense of every right-thinking person. The case of the people is subjected to the gravest suspicions, under the circumstances.

The judgment of conviction should be affirmed.

BOARD OF STATE TAX COMMISSIONERS.

(126 Mich. 22.)

1. The constitutional requirement of uniformity and equality in taxation is not violated by taxing shares of stock in foreign corporations and exempting those in domestic corporations, whose property is taxed within the state; and it is immaterial that the property, including the capital stock of the foreign corporations, is taxed at their domicile.
2. The use of the word "citizens" in Comp. Laws 1897, § 3831, subdiv. 9, providing that all shares in foreign corporations owned by citizens of the state shall be taxed, is not limited to its political sense so as to exempt stock owned by inhabitants who are not citizens, and thus make the statute void for lack of uniformity.

3. The provision of the Federal Constitution that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts of every other state does not prevent the taxation of stock in a foreign corporation owned by residents of the state because the property of the corporation is taxed at its domicile.

I. Scope of note.

This note is confined to two classes, only, of cases relating to the taxation of corporations organized for gain. One class includes those wherein a tax is resisted upon the ground that it lays upon its subject more than a fair share of the public burden. The other embraces those in which the authorities assert that an exemption claimed by such a corporation unwarrantably relieves it from its due proportion of such burden. In both classes some provision of the Federal, or a state, Constitution is relied upon to defeat either the tax or the claim to immunity in dispute.

The analogous cases involving the taxation of national bank stockholders under the permission given by the act of Congress in that behalf, to tax them equally with other capitalists, have not been included.

Neither does this note deal with license taxes on trades, occupations, etc., followed by either artificial or natural persons, even where the nature of the calling is corporate only. The cases of this character herein referred to do but throw light upon the main theme.

The ground covered by the previous notes in this series, so far as in point, is not, in general, again traversed. The reader should consult, in particular, the notes on the constitutional equality of privileges, immunities, and protection, to the case of Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579; on the constitutionality of a provision in a tax law for deducting debts from credits and other property, to the case of Florer v. Sheridan (Ind.) 23 L. R. A. 278; on the state taxation of national banks, to the case of McHenry v. Downer (Cal.) 45 L. R. A. 737; on the taxation of corporate franchises in the United States (div. VIII.), to the case of Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 57 L. R. A. 93, 98; on the taxation of capital stock of corporations in the United States (divs. VIII., X., and XI.), to the case of State Bd. of Equalization v. People (Ill.) 58 L. R. A. 589, 603, 605.

II. Natural justice.

Before the United States was born, Adam Smith wrote that the subjects of every state ought to contribute towards the support of government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the obser-

Mr. Joseph Walsh, with Messrs. Avery Brothers, for relator:

When the New York statutes and the Michigan statutes and constitution are read together the conclusion must necessarily be reached that the stock of petitioner is not subject to taxation in this state.

Stock of a like character issued by a corporation within the state is exempt; and if the legislature did undertake and did mean by paragraph 9 of section 3831 of Miller's Compilation to tax the stock of petitioner, then in doing so it violated article 14 of section 11 of the Constitution in this, that it provided an unequal rule of taxation.

The Michigan statute in effect gives a preference to stocks issued by Michigan corporations.

Taxes are, within the meaning of the constitution, equal and uniform when no person or class of persons in the state taxed is taxed at a higher rate than are other persons in the same district upon the same value or thing and when the objects of taxation are the same by whomsoever owned or whatever they may be.

Norris v. Waco, 57 Tex. 635.

Taxation is not necessarily unconstitutional and void when double; but the intention must be so clearly expressed when the result is double taxation that there can be no possible doubt that the legislature intended to tax twice.

Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. p. 227; Kimball v. Milford, 54 N. H. 406.

The law of 1893, § 3831, Miller's Compilation, has the element of doubt and uncertainty in it as to the intent of the legislature.

lows: "One who resides actually and permanently in a given place and has his domicile there."

Black, Law Dict. p. 622.

The word as used in the statute of 1889 and also in paragraph 5, of section 3831, was intended to and does include all residents of the state. Under the law of 1889 a citizen of the state of Michigan who was not an inhabitant could not be taxed.

Evidently for this reason the word "inhabitant" was eliminated and the word "citizen" substituted so as to reach the class of persons who are citizens of the state, domiciled elsewhere, or who return for the purpose of voting at elections but reside for the most part in a foreign jurisdiction.

When the legislature substituted the word "citizen" for "inhabitant" in one part of the same section of the statute and both parts of the section were dealing with property beyond the jurisdiction of the state, the two words were to have a distinct and separate meaning.

Every statute which undertakes to appropriate in any manner the property of private persons for public purposes must be strictly construed.

Picquet v. Swan, 5 Mason, 35, Fed. Cas. No. 11,134.

The word "inhabitant" sometimes means "citizen," but that depends upon the subject-matter with which the law is dealing.

State v. Primrose, 3 Ala. 546; Bull v. Warren, 36 Conn. 85; Parker v. Overman, 18 How. 137, 15 L. ed. 318; Kelly v. Houghton, 9 Sawy. 19, 23 Fed. 417.

The word "citizen" as used in this statute was intended to reach a large class of and the constitutionality of similar statutes has been affirmed in Minnesota and Florida. Cameron v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Minn. 384, 31 L. R. A. 553, 65 N. W. 652; Dell v. Marvin, 41 Fla. 221, 45 L. R. A. 201, 26 So. 188.

The Texas supreme court, on one occasion, after deciding that the statute then before it was not repugnant to any provision of the state Constitution, took up the appellant's contention to the effect that it was so discriminatory in its character, being directed against one class of citizens only, and was so opposed to the principles of republican government, that it could not be presumed that the people intended to have conferred the power on the legislature to pass it; and replied to this contention by saying that the ablest and most conservative writers on constitutional law seem to entertain grave doubts as to the wisdom and propriety of the judicial department venturing upon the dangerous ground of declaring a statute void because it is unjust or oppressive, or is supposed to affect the natural rights of the citizen because violative of the fundamental principles of republican government, unless it appears that these principles are placed beyond legislative control by the terms of the Constitution. This is founded on the reason that these principles are so susceptible to the varying demand growing out of public necessity and expediency that they cannot always be incorporated in the Constitution, and it is only, generally, where they have found expression in that instrument that the "principles of republican government" constitute a guide for our action or restraint on legislative power. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Elms (Tex.) 17 L. R. A. 286, 18 S. W. 723.

The case just cited, apparently, was a decision in the same suit elsewhere reported in 87 Tex. 19, 26 S. W. 985, and afterwards reversed on error by the Supreme Court of the United States in 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255.

There is, declared another court, no paramount and supreme law which defines the law of nature, or settles those great principles of legislation which are said to control state legislatures in the exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the people in the Constitution. If it is once admitted that there exists in this court a power to declare a state law void which conflicts with no constitutional provision; if we assume the right to annul laws for their supposed injustice or oppressive operation,—we become the makers, and not the expounders, of constitutions; our opinion will not be a judgment on what was the pre-existing law of 60 L. R. A.

the case, but upon what it is after we shall have so amended and modified it as to meet our ideas of justice, policy, and wise legislation by a direct usurpation of legislative powers and a flagrant violation of the duty enjoined on us by the judiciary act. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldwin, 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1319.

III. Need of constitutional guards against inequality.

The constitutionality of a legislative act is to be determined solely by reference to those limitations which the Constitution imposes. Leep v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 58 Ark. 407, 23 L. R. A. 264, 25 S. W. 75.

Because a tax bears heavily upon a corporation or class, it is not, for that reason alone, unconstitutional. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578. In that case, Scudder, J., discussing the constitutionality of the New Jersey railroad and canal tax law of 1884, asks: Is this law invalid so that it cannot be executed without violating the fundamental law of the state? And then adds: If it be not thus controlled and annulled, it is the duty of this court to give it effect. It is not our province to say whether the law is impolitic, or even oppressive and unjust in its provisions, so long as it does not violate the constitutional rights of these corporations in the enforcement of what is designed to be strictly a tax law. The judicial power cannot legitimately question the policy, or refuse to sanction the provisions, of any law not inconsistent with the fundamental law of the state. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts, but to the people.

In considering the constitutional provisions on the subject of taxation, it must not be forgotten that the Constitution is not so much a grant of specific powers as a limitation on the exercise of general powers. State v. United States & C. Exp. Co. 60 N. H. 219.

In the absence of any provision in the state Constitution requiring, either expressly or by necessary implication, uniformity and equality of taxation, a taxing statute which is open to the charge of imposing unequal burdens of taxation, and not taxing uniformly those in the same class, cannot be adjudged void as contrary to natural justice. State v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 73 Conn. 255, 57 L. R. A. 481, 47 Atl. 299, Affirmed in 185 U. S. 364, 46 L. ed. 949, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673.

The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States was not intended to compel persons who are citizens of the state and reside elsewhere.

Evans v. Davenport, 4 McLean, 574, Fed. Cas. No. 4,558; White v. Clements, 39 Ga. 232.

There can be no departure from the plain meaning of a statute on grounds of its unwisdom or public policy.

Handy v. Meridian Twp. 114 Mich. 454, 72 N. W. 251.

There is a strong presumption in favor of a construction that will not do injustice.

Osborn v. Charlevoix Circuit Judge, 114 Mich. 655, 72 N. W. 982.

The property or business of a non-resident must not be taxed at a higher or a different rate than that of a resident.

Mr. Horace M. Oren, Attorney General, for respondent:

By clear, unambiguous and unmistakable language, the state has manifested its intention to tax the stock of foreign corporations owned and held within this state.

Comp. Laws 1897, § 3831.

No difference is made between foreign corporations and domestic corporations in the states to adopt an iron rule of equal taxation. If that were its proper construction, it would not only supersede all those constitutional provisions and laws of some of the states whose object is to secure equality of taxation, and which are usually accompanied by qualifications deemed material, but it would render nugatory those discriminations which the best interests of society require, which are necessary for the encouragement of needed and useful industries and the discouragement of intemperance and vice, and which every state in one form or another deems it expedient to adopt. Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 83 L. ed. 892, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 538.

It was afterwards said of this decision that it put at rest the whole argument of a right, under the Federal Constitution, to challenge a tax law on the ground of inequality in the burdens resulting from the operation of the law. Merchants' & Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Pennsylvania, 167 U. S. 461, 42 L. ed. 236, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 829.

The statement of Miller, J., in Memphis Gas-light Co. v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 109 U. S. 398, 27 L. ed. 976, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 205, that the Constitution of the United States does not profess in all cases to protect property from unjust or oppressive taxation by the states; that is left to the state constitutions and state laws,—is quoted and adopted by Gray, J., in New Orleans City & L. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 143 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 121, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 406.

IV. Absolute equality unattainable.

The doctrine that perfect equality of taxation is in practice beyond the reach of human endeavor has been subscribed to generally by the Federal and state courts throughout the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States has frequently expressed such a view. Absolute equality in taxation, it declared in one case, can never be attained. That system is the best which comes the nearest to it. The same rules cannot be applied to the listing and valuation of all kinds of property. Railroads, banks, partnerships, manufacturing associations, telegraph companies, and each one of the numerous other agencies of business which the inventions of the age are constantly bringing into existence require different machinery for the purposes of their taxation. The object should be to place the burden so that it will bear as nearly as possible equally upon all. For this purpose different systems with reference to the valuation of different kinds of property are adopted. The courts permit this. Tap- pan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. 490, 22 L. ed. 189.

Perfect equality and perfect uniformity of taxation, as regards individuals or corporations or the different classes of property subject to taxation, it declared in another case, is a dream unrealized. It may be admitted that the system which most nearly attains this is the best. But the most complete system which can be devised must, when we consider the immense variety of subjects which it necessarily embraces, be imperfect. And when we come to its application to the property of all citizens, and of those who are not citizens in all the localities of a large state, the application being made by men whose judgment and opinions must vary as they are affected by all the circumstances brought to bear upon each individual, the result must inevitably partake largely of the imperfection of human nature, and of the evidence upon which human judgment is founded. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 601, sub nom. Taylor v. Secor, 28 L. ed. 669.

The better part of this statement is quoted with approval by Chancellor Runyon of the New Jersey court of errors and appeals in a similar case decided in that state. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578.

"Perfect uniformity and perfect equality of taxation in all the aspects in which the human mind can view it is a baseless dream, as this court has said more than once." Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, sub nom. Edye v. Robertson, 28 L. ed. 798, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247.

This court, said Lamar, J., in still another case, has repeatedly laid down the doctrine that diversity of taxation, both with respect to the amount imposed, and the various species of property selected, either for bearing its burdens or for being exempt from them, is not inconsistent with a perfect uniformity and equality of taxation in the proper sense of those terms; and that a system which imposes the same tax upon every species of property irrespective of its nature or condition or class will be destructive of the principles of uniformity and equality in taxation and of a just adaptation of property to its burdens. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. 339, 35 L. ed. 1035, 8 Intern. Com. Rep. 810, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250.

And Brewer, J., in dissenting from a recent judgment of the court sustaining the constitutionality of the Illinois succession tax, said: If this were a question in political economy I should not dissent, but it is one of constitutional limitations. Equality in right, in protection, and in burden is the thought which has run through the life of this nation and its conporations whose property, capital stock or franchises are taxed in the state of its existence, or in the state in which such property is located, and those which are not so taxed, the conclusion follows, that no distinction exists.

Graham v. St. Joseph Twp. 67 Mich. 652, 35 N. W. 808; Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 547.

Where an exemption from taxation is claimed, the construction must be in favor of the tax and against the exemption.

Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 225, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 894; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 205; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Grand Rapids, 102 Mich. 374, 29 L. R. A. 195, 60 N. W. 767; Manistee & G. R. R. Co. v. Auditor General, 115 Mich. 291, 73 N. W. 240;

Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 29 L. ed. 240, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1014.

This stock is in the nature of a chose in action. It is intangible personalty, whose situs follows the domicile of the owner, and it is there subject to taxation.

Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 22, 23; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 565; State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, sub nom. Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 179; Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 25 L. ed. 558.

It is uncontrovertible that this stock has its situs in Michigan for the purposes of taxation. That being the case it necessarily follows that the laws of the state of New York, either by taking or exempting from taxation the property, franchises and capital stock of the corporation in which they are held, can have no effect on the power or stitutional enactments from the Declaration of Independence to the present hour. Of course, absolute equality is not attainable, and the fact that a law, whether tax law or other, works inequality in its actual operation, does not prove its unconstitutionality. But when a tax directly, necessarily, and intentionally creates an inequality of burden, it then becomes imperative to inquire whether this inequality, thus intentionally created, can find any constitutional justification. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1087, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594.

Exact uniformity, said the Pennsylvania supreme court, is theoretically possible, but it is practically unattainable by any system of classification yet devised in this state. Com. v. National Oil Co. 157 Pa. 516, 27 Atl. 374.

And again: We recognize the difficulty complained of,—the want of exact uniformity in the distribution of the burdens of taxation; but substantial uniformity is all that is required by the Constitution, or attainable in practice. Com. v. Mill Creek Coal Co. 157 Pa. 524, 27 Atl. 375.

And the supreme court of Minnesota puts it thus: Perfect equality in taxation is perhaps impossible, made so by the failure of property owners to disclose all their taxable property to the assessor, and the inability of the latter to discover it when not voluntarily listed; in consequence of which, taxes are not borne in proportion to the amount of property owned by each taxpayer. But all laws providing for their assessment and collection should have that object in view. This does not require that all persons shall be taxed alike. The nature and character of property and of property rights subject to taxation as respects personality render absolute uniformity impracticable, and necessitate a resort to different methods for bringing intangible property to the tax list. State v. Canda Cattle Car Co. 85 Minn. 457, 89 N. W. 66.

Of course, said the Colorado supreme court, ament a taxing statute of that state, instances of injustice will sometimes result under the statute before us; but this is necessarily true of all statutes providing methods for the assessment and taxation of property. Exact uniformity and mathematical accuracy in valuations are absolutely impossible. Nothing that can be devised by human reason will secure such exactness or accuracy. People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144, 60 L. R. A.

V. Constitutional provisions.

a. The Federal Constitution.

The pertinent parts of the Federal Constitution with which this note is concerned are the first clause of § 2 of article 4, providing that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and the second sentence of § 1 of the 14th Amendment, providing that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

The 5th Amendment, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation,—has been held all along to limit only the power of the United States, but not that of the states. Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. ed. 672; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 411, 12 L. ed. 213; Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. 84, 15 L. ed. 816; North Missouri R. Co. v. Maguire, 49 Mo. 490, 8 Am. Rep. 141. Affirmed in 20 Wall. 46, 22 L. ed. 287; Ellenbecker v. Plymouth County Dist. Ct. 134 U. S. 31, 33 L. ed. 801, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 424; State ex rel. Curtis v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co. 18 R. I. 16, 17 L. R. A. 856, 25 Atl. 246.

The reader must never lose sight, in considering the cases discussed in this and kindred notes, of the radical distinction between the United States Constitution and the Constitutions of the respective states. The former, unlike the latter, is a grant of power, not a bundle of restraints upon power inherent. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. (10th Amendment.)

b. The state Constitutions.

The Constitutions of the several states, with two exceptions, all contain one or more special provisions designed to secure uniformity and equality of taxation. In Connecticut and New York the only guaranties a taxpayer has against disproportionate taxation must be sought for in the Constitution of the United States.

Many Constitutions except from the operation of the uniformity and equality rule and the general requirement that all property be taxed ad valorem certain classes of property, some authority of the state of Michigan to tax the same.

Utah provides (art. 13, § 3) for the exemption of ditches, canals, and flumes used for irrigation; and Colorado (art. 10, § 3) for the exemption of irrigation works for a limited period; while Florida provides (art. 16, § 16) for exempting the property of any corporation that constructs a ship or barge canal across the peninsula. Nevada (art. 10, § 1) and South Carolina (art. 9, § 1) except mines and mining claims, and provide that only the proceeds thereof shall be taxed; and Colorado (art. 10, § 3) exempts mines for ten years. California (art. 13, § 1) exempts growing crops, and Tennessee (art. 2, § 28, 30), products of the soil in the hands of the producer and first buyer, and, except to pay inspection fees, articles manufactured from the produce of the state. Delaware (art. 8, § 1) permits the legislature, by general laws, to exempt from taxation such property as, in its opinion, will best promote the general welfare.

A few Constitutions provide for exempting a limited amount of personal property to each taxpayer. Kan. art. 11, § 1; Minn. art. 9, § 3; Tenn. art. 2, § 28.

A few others authorize the deduction of debts from credits. Cal. art. 13, § 1; Utah, art. 13, § 3; Wash. art. 7, § 2.

In several states all laws exempting property other than that specifically mentioned in the Constitution are declared void. Ark. art. 16, § 6; Colo. art. 10, § 6; Ga. art. 7, § 2, ¶ 4; Ky. Bill of Rights, § 3; Mo. art. 10, § 7; Pa. art. 9, § 2; S. D. art. 11, § 7; Tex. art. 8, § 2.

A common provision, sometimes of limited application to corporations and corporate property, is that the power of taxation shall never be surrendered or suspended by legislative act or any grant or contract to which the state shall be a party. Ark. art. 16, § 7; Cal. art. 13, § 6; Colo. art. 10, § 9; Ga. art. 7, § 2, ¶ 5; Idaho, art. 7, § 8; Ky. § 175; La. art. 205; Me. art. 9, § 9; Miss. art. 7, § 182; Mo. art. 10, § 2; Mont. art. 12, § 7; N. It is doubtful whether this is a case of double taxation, as the property taxed is not twice charged with the same burden.

Mississippi excepts manufactures and other new enterprises of public utility for a limited time under certain conditions; and the North Dakota provision is qualified by another section (art. 11, § 176) authorizing the commutation of all but real-estate taxes on railroads for a percentage of gross earnings.

Another common provision is a prohibition against the grant to any person or persons of privileges, immunities, or emoluments not equally open to all. Ark. art. 2, § 18; Cal. art. 1, § 21; Conn. art. 1, § 1; Ind. art. 1, § 23; Ky. Bill of Rights, § 3; Mass. Bill of Rights, chap. 1, pt. 1, art. 6; N. C. art. 1, § 7; Or. art. 1, § 20; S. D. art. 6, § 18; Tex. art. 1, § 3; Va. art. 1, § 6; Wash. art. 1, § 12.

Some states forbid their legislatures to release or discharge any county, city, township, or district, or the inhabitants thereof, or the property therein, from their or its proportionate share of state taxes. Ill. art. 9, § 6; Neb. art. 9, § 4.

Others command laws to be passed taxing all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, joint-stock companies, or otherwise. Minn. art. 9, § 3; N. C. art. 5, § 3; Ohio, art. 12, § 2; S. D. art. 9, § 4 (the latter state by uniform rule).

Utah (art. 13, § 2) and Montana (art. 12, § 17) declare that stocks in any company or corporation are not taxable when the property represented by them has been taxed.

Certain states define property, for the purposes of taxation, as inclusive of moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership. Cal. art. 13, § 1; Mont. art. 12, § 17; Utah, art. 13, § 2.

Some require that the notes and bills discounted or purchased, moneys loaned, and all other property, effects, and dues of every description of all banks and bankers, be taxed so that property employed in banking shall always be subject to a taxation equal to that imposed on the property of individuals (Minn. art. 9, § 4; Ohio, art. 12, § 3; S. D. art. 11, § 4); and one (Miss. art. 7, § 181) empowers its legislature to provide for the taxation of banks and banking capital, by taxing the shares according to the value thereof augmented by accumulations, surplus, and unpaid dividends, and diminished by real estate separately taxed as such.

Tennessee (art. 2, § 28) requires that all property, real, personal, or mixed, shall be taxed; Florida (art. 16, § 16), that the property of all corporations shall be taxed; South Carolina (art. 12, § 2), that corporate property shall be subject to taxation; Utah (art. 13, § 10) that all corporations or persons in the state, or doing business therein, shall be subject to taxation for state, county, the subjects of taxation, and this necessarily includes the right to classify such subjects of taxation and apply to each class such rules, regulations and exemptions as that body deems necessary.

Foreign corporations and shares in the same are properly placed in one class and subject to one set of rules and exemptions, and domestic corporations naturally and properly fall within another class.

The shares in foreign corporations are taxed once, the shares in domestic corporations, or their representatives, are once taxed.

The statutes of the foreign states can have no effect in this state, either to prevent taxation or to make uniform and equal rules of taxation ununiform and unequal.

school, municipal, or other purposes on the real and personal property owned or used by them within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and Colorado (art. 10, § 10) has the same requirement, omitting the words "or persons."

Iowa declares that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals (art. 8, § 2); Ohio, that it shall be so subject forever (art. 13, § 4); Mississippi that the property of all such private corporations shall be taxed in the same way and to the same extent as that of individuals (art. 7, § 181); Alabama, that the property of private corporations, associations, and individuals shall forever be taxed at the same rate (art. 11, § 6); Kentucky, that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed unless constitutionally exempt, and that corporate property shall pay the same rate of taxation paid by individual property (§ 174); Texas, that all property of natural persons or corporations, other than municipal, shall be taxed (art. 8, § 1); and South Dakota (art. 11, § 2) and Washington (art. 7, § 3) both command their legislatures to provide by general law for the assessment and levying of taxes on all corporate property as near as may be by the same methods as are provided for assessing and levying taxes on individual property. On the other hand, North Dakota (art. 11, § 179) prescribes the assessment of individual property by local assessors, and the assessment and apportionment on a mileage basis by a state board of equalization of the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads, unless commuted by a gross earnings tax.

Kentucky leaves its legislature free to provide by law how railroads and railroad property shall be assessed, and how taxes thereon shall be collected (§ 182); Missouri declares that all railroad corporations in the state, or doing business therein, shall be subject to taxation for state and local purposes, not only on the real and personal estate they own or use, but also on their earnings, franchises, and capital stock (art. 10, § 5); Montana provides for assessing the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads operated in more than one county by a state board of equalization, and an apportionment upon the mileage basis (art. 12, § 16); and Texas commands railroad property of every description within any city or incorporated town to bear its proportionate share of municipal taxation (art. 8, § 5). North Dakota permits the commutation of railroad taxes, leaving aside those on real estate, for a tax on 60 L. R. A.

The rule of classification making a distinction between domestic and foreign corporations and the shares in domestic and foreign corporations is a proper one.

S. 511, 29 L. ed. 240, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1014; Graham v. St. Joseph Twp. 67 Mich. 652, 35 N. W. 808.

Constitution, art. 14, § 11, does not require all property to be taxed, but simply that "taxes shall be levied on such property as shall be prescribed by law" according to "an uniform rule of taxation." This gross earnings (art. 11, § 176), while Illinois (art. 9, § 6) and Nebraska (art. 9, § 4) forbid the commutation of state taxes in any form whatever.

Louisiana forbids property to be assessed in excess of its cash value (art. 203), and opens its courts to taxpayers to test the correctness of their assessments (Ibid.). And Virginia provides that the capital invested in all business operations shall be assessed and taxed as other property, and that assessments upon all stock shall be according to the market value thereof (art. 10, § 4).

Several states expressly authorize the imposition of special taxes, to which the rule of uniformity and equality governing property taxes in general does not apply. These embrace taxes upon incomes and occupations, license, privilege, and franchise taxes, and other excises. Ark. art. 21, § 6; Cal. art. 13, § 11; Ill. art. 9, § 1; Ky. § 174; La. art. 206; Mass. chap. 1, art. 4, § 1; Mich. art. 14, § 10; Mo. art. 10, § 21; Mont. art. 12, § 1; Neb. art. 9, § 1; N. C. art. 5, § 8; Tenn. art. 2, § 28; Tex. art. 8, § 1; Utah, art. 13, § 12; Va. art. 10, § 4; W. Va. art. 10, § 1.

Louisiana authorizes license discrimination between foreign and domestic corporations, but requires companies in the same kind of business to be treated uniformly (art. 217); Georgia, a specific tax on domestic animals by nature or habit destructive of property (art. 7, § 2); Minnesota, assessments for local improvements and water supply according to the front-foot rule and supposed benefits (art. 9, § 1); Mississippi, the imposition of privilege taxes on building and loan associations in lieu of other taxes, except on real estate (art. 7, § 181), and also provides that domestic insurance companies shall not be required to pay a greater tax in the aggregate than is required of foreign insurance companies doing business in the state, except to the extent that their ad valorem taxes exceed the privilege taxes imposed upon such foreign corporations (Ibid.); and Illinois declares that specification of objects and subjects of taxation shall not deprive the general assembly of the power to tax other subjects or objects in such manner as may be consistent with the principles of taxation fixed in the Constitution (art. 9, § 2).

Subject to the foregoing rather numerous qualifications, the aim to subject all taxpayers to equal burdens is manifest in nearly all the state Constitutions.

Maryland declares in her Bill of Rights (art. 15) that every person in the state, or holding property therein, ought to contribute his proporsection leaves it within the plenary power of the legislature to select the subject of taxation, and merely requires that the tax on the subjects selected shall be uniform.

East Saginaw*, 19 Mich. 259, 2 Am. Rep. 82; Walcott v. People, 17 Mich. 68; State, Stratton, Prosecutor, v. Collins, 43 N. J. L. 562.

Property owned by citizens domiciled outside the state would be properly taxable only in the states of domicile of the owners, and the construction contended for by relator would, to that extent, give the act an extraterritorial effect, and the law would to that extent be of questionable validity. The tion of public taxes for the support of the government according to his actual worth in real or personal property; Massachusetts in hers (pt. 1, subd. 10), that each individual of society is obliged to contribute his share to the expense of his protection; New Hampshire in hers (pt. 1, art. 12), that every member of the community is bound to contribute his share of such expense; Rhode Island in hers (art. 1, § 2), that the burdens of the state ought to be fairly distributed among its citizens; South Carolina, in hers (art. 1, § 36), that each individual of society should contribute his share to the expense of his protection; and Vermont (art. 9), that every member of society is bound to contribute his proportion towards such expense.

Nearly always taxes are commanded to be assessed ad valorem, and property to be taxed according to its value. Ala. art. 11, § 1; Ark. art. 16, § 6; Cal. art. 13, § 1; Ky. §§ 172, 174; La. art. 203; Me. art. 9, § 8; Mich. art. 14, § 12; Minn. art. 9, § 8; Mo. art. 10, § 4; N. J. art. 4, § 7, subd. 12; N. Va. art. 10, § 1.

Illinois and Nebraska both (art. 9, § 1, of each) order their legislative bodies to provide needful revenue by levying a tax by valuation. Minnesota requires all property on which taxes are laid to have a cash valuation (art. 9, § 1), and Kentucky says its value shall be estimated at the price it would bring at a fair voluntary sale (§ 172); but most of the states simply direct that value to be ascertained as provided by law. Cal. art. 13, § 1; La. art. 203; Tex. art. 8, § 1; Utah, art. 13, § 2; Va. art. 10, § 1; W. Va. art. 10, § 1; or in such manner as the legislature shall direct (Neb. art. 9, § 1; Tenn. art. 2, § 28), making the same equal and uniform throughout the state (Ark. art. 16, § 6); or, by some person or persons to be elected or appointed in such manner as the legislature shall direct, and not otherwise (Ill. art. 9, § 1); or else by such rules of appraisement and assessment as may be prescribed by general law (S. D. art. 11, § 2).

In general the legislature is directed to prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, real and personal. Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

The legislature has used the word "citizen" with a meaning, embracing all persons within this state possessing property of the character mentioned, subject to taxation. The word is properly used in this sense, and numerous cases have held that the word "citizens" is synonymous with the word "inhabitants" or "residents."

Risewick v. Davis, 19 Md. 82; State ex rel. Owens v. Trustees of Section 29, 11 Ohio, 24; McKenzie v. Murphy, 24 Ark. 155; Cooper v. Galbraith, 3 Wash. C. C. 546, Fed. Cas. No. 3,193; State, Pitter, Prosecutor, v. Ross, 23 N. J. L. 520; Union Hotel Co. v. Hersee, 79 N. Y. 454, 35 Am.

It is directed by the organic law in Massachusetts (chap. 1, § 1, art. 4) and New Hampshire (part 2, art. 4) that there be a new valuation of estates every few years. And Louisiana provided that, in order to arrive at equality and uniformity, the general assembly should, at its first session after the Constitution was adopted, provide a system of equality and uniformity in assessments based upon the relative value of property in different portions of the state, and declared that the valuation put upon property for the purposes of state taxation should be taken as the proper valuation for the purposes of local taxation in every subdivision of the state (art. 203).

Several states provide that all taxes or taxation shall be equal and uniform (Or. art. 1, § 32; S. D. art. 6, § 17; Tenn. art. 2, § 28; Tex. art. 8, § 1; Va. art. 10, § 1; W. Va. art. 10, § 1; Wyo. art. 1, § 28); others that laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all property (N. C. art. 5, § 8; N. D. art. 11, § 176; Ohio, art. 13, § 2); that all taxes upon real and personal estate shall be apportioned and assessed equally (Me. art. 9, § 8); that all taxes to be raised in the state shall be as nearly equal as may be (Minn. art. 9, § 1); and be equalized and uniform throughout the state (Ibid.); that property shall be assessed for taxes by uniform rules (N. J. art. 4, § 7 subd. 12); and that all property shall be uniformly assessed for taxation (Wyo. art. 15, § 11).

In some cases the legislature is directed to provide for a uniform and equal rate of taxation (Fla. art. 9, § 1); or, of assessment and taxation (Ind. art. 10, § 1; Kan. art. 11, § 1; Mont. art. 12, § 1; Nev. art. 10, § 1; Or. art. 9, § 1; S. C. art. 9, § 1; Utah, art. 13, § 3; Wash. art. 7, § 2).

Some states provide that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property (Ill. art. 9, § 1; S. D. art. 11, § 2; Utah, art. 13, § 8; Wash. art. 7, § 2), and one adds "and franchisees" (Neb. art. 9, § 1).

Three declare that no one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of the same value. Tenn. art. 11, § 28; Va. art. 10, § 1, and W. Va. art. 10, § 1.

Wisconsin declares that the rule of taxation shall be uniform, but adds that taxes shall be levied upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe (art. 8, § 1), and Michigan says the legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation, except on property paying specific taxes; and that taxes shall be levied on such property as shall be pre-

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Relator is a citizen of this state, a resident of the city of St. Clair, and the owner of a number of shares of stock of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, of the state of New York. He is assessed upon the tax roll of said city $50,000 for personal property. This assessed valuation includes the shares of stock held by him in said railroad company. The real estate of said company, and its capital stock in excess of the real estate, are taxed in the state of New York. The stock owned in the state of New York is not taxed. The relator appeared before the board of state tax scribed by law (art. 14, § 11). Massachusetts (chap. 1, § 1, art. 4) and New Hampshire (pt. 2, art. 5) clothe their respective general courts with power and authority to impose and levy proportional and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes upon all the inhabitants of, and residents and estates within, their jurisdictions.

A number of states require that taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. Colo. art. 10, § 3; Del. art. 8, § 1; Ga. art. 7, § 2, ¶ 1; Idaho, art. 7, § 6; Mo. art. 10, § 3; Mont. art. 12, § 11; Pa. art. 9, § 1.

Several states require taxes to be levied and collected under general laws. Colo. art. 10, § 3; Del. art. 8, § 1; Ga. art. 7, § 2, ¶ 1; Idaho, art. 7, § 6; Ky. § 171; Mo. art. 10, § 3; Mont. art. 12, § 11; Pa. art. 9, § 1. And one, property to be assessed for taxes under general laws. N. J. art. 4, § 7, subd. 12.

VI. Inclusiveness of equal rights, privileges, immunities, and protection of the laws.

The first attempt at a comprehensive definition of that part of art. 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States which declares that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states, was made by Mr. Justice Washington in Coryell v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230. In enumerating some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental, he includes an exemption from higher taxes and impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the state.

Attempt will not be made, said the Supreme Court of the United States afterwards, to define the words "privileges and immunities," or to specify the rights which they are intended to secure and protect, beyond what may be necessary to the decision of the case before the court. Beyond doubt, those words are words of very comprehensive meaning, but it will be sufficient to say that the clause plainly and unmistakably secures and protects the right of the citizen of one state to be exempt from any higher taxes or excises than are imposed by the state upon its own citizens. Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449.

Grant, it was added, that states may impose discriminating taxes against citizens of other states, and it will soon be found that the power 60 L. R. A.

conferred upon Congress to regulate interstate commerce is of no value, as the unrestricted power of the states to tax will prove to be more efficacious to promote inequality than any regulation which Congress can pass to preserve the equality of right contemplated by the Constitution among citizens of the several states. Ibid.

Inequality of burden, it was further said, as well as the want of uniformity in commercial regulations, was one of the grievances of the citizens under the confederation; and the new Constitution was adopted, among other things, to remedy those defects in the prior system. Ibid.

And, again: The people of the several states live under one common Constitution, which was ordained to establish justice, and which, with the laws of Congress and the treaties made by the proper authority, is the supreme law of the land, and that supreme law requires equality of burden, and forbids discrimination in state taxation when the power is applied to citizens of other states. Ibid.

For a state to impose different and greater burdens or impositions on the property of citizens of other states than on the same property belonging to its own subjects would directly conflict with the constitutional provision that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. By exempting its own citizens from a tax or excise to which citizens of other states were subject, the former would enjoy an immunity of which the latter would be deprived. Oliver v. Washington Mills, 11 Allen, 268.

By the Constitution of the United States, the citizens of each state are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states, and that means that the citizens of all the states shall have the peculiar advantage of acquiring real as well as personal property, and that that property shall be protected and secured by the laws of the state in the same manner as the property of the citizens of the state is protected. It means, such property shall not be liable to any taxes or burdens to which the property of citizens is not subject. Campbell v. Morris, 3 Harr. & M'H. 535.

A statute, which, in effect, exempts from taxation all the personal estate of a resident of the state except the excess in value of such estate over debts owing beyond the owner's non-taxable bonds, stocks, and deposits; and taxes a nonresident's property circumstanced the same; and which, in so far as it does this, gives an immunity from taxation to a resident that it denies to a nonresident,—discriminates in favor of the resident against the nonresident commissioners at a meeting held in said city August 20, 1900, and made application to have said assessment reduced by reason of the fact that, as the property and franchises of said corporation are taxed in the state of New York, the stock is not taxable in this state. The board refused to reduce said assessment, and the matter is presented to this court upon petition for mandamus to compel such reduction.

The questions raised by the parties involve the construction of certain subdivisions of section 3831, Comp. Laws 1897. Those provisions are as follows: "For the purposes of taxation, personal property shall include: . . . (5) All goods, chattels and effects belonging to inhabitants of this state situate without this state, except that property actually and permanently invested in business in another state shall not be in-taxpayer, and thus denies to citizens of other states an immunity granted to its own citizens. Such discrimination and denial are clearly forbidden by the Constitution of the United States providing that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states. Sprague v. Fletcher, 69 Vt. 60, 37 L. R. A. 840, 37 Atl. 239.

It was in the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 76, 21 L. ed. 394, that the Supreme Court of the United States was first called upon to construe the prohibition in the 14th Amendment against denying the equal protection of the laws; but those cases involved, not a question of taxation, but an exercise by the state of Louisiana of the police power.

By that amendment unequal exactions in every form, or under any pretense, are absolutely forbidden, and, of course, unequal taxation, for it is in that form that oppressive burdens are usually laid. It is not possible to conceive of equal protection under any system of laws where arbitrary and unequal taxation is permissible. San Mateo County v. Southern P. R. Co. 8 Sawy. 238, 13 Fed. 722.

The prohibitions of that amendment protect the citizen against a denial of the equal protection of the laws and a deprivation of property without due process of law, under the power of taxation. The state may not single out a class of citizens, and subject that class to oppressive discrimination in exercising the taxing power, without infringing upon the constitutional guaranties. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor, 86 Fed. 168.

VII. Status of corporations.

a. Citizenship.

It was settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, that corporations are not citizens within the meaning of the provision in the Federal Constitution declaring the citizens of each state entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states; that that provision applies only to natural persons, members of the body politic, owing allegiance to the state, and not at all to artificial beings created by the legislature, and possessing only the attributes with which they have been endowed by the legislature.

The soundness of this decision has been approved, and its doctrine adopted, by both state and Federal courts generally. Ducat v. Chicago, 48 Ill. 172, 95 Am. Dec. 529, Affirmed in 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Liverpool & L. Life 60 L. R. A.

cluded. . . . (7) All shares in corporations organized under the laws of this state when the property of such corporations is not exempt or is not taxable to itself, or when the personal property is not taxed. . . . (9) All shares in foreign corporations, except national banks, owned by citizens of this state."

It is contended by counsel for relator:

1. That the statute, in providing for taxation on foreign stocks, is unconstitutional, in that it is not uniform and equal. The argument is that because, under this statute, an individual holding stock issued by a domestic corporation which pays taxes on its capital stock is not taxed on such individual stock so held by him, the same rule must be applied to persons owning stock in a foreign corporation whose capital stock is taxed. One owning shares in a corporation

Clark-Gardner Lode Min. Co.* 4 Colo. 371.

Neither is a corporation a citizen of the United States within the meaning of that clause of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbidding the states to make or enforce any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Insurance Co. v. New Orleans, 1 Woods, 85, Fed. Cas. No. 7,052. (This decision, though open to destructive criticism upon other grounds, is doubtless sound to the extent of the proposition just stated.)

b. Personality.

1. Within the 14th Amendment.

While corporations are not citizens, they are persons to whom the states are not at liberty to deny the equal protection of the laws. This is now well settled, but, as the proposition has not commanded the same unreserved acceptance, and sometimes has been denied, it will be well to refer to the cases by more than their titles.

Corporations are persons, to whom a state cannot deny the equal protection of its laws without coming in conflict with the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution. Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 118 U. S. 394, 30 L. ed. 118, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1332.

Under the designation of "person" in that clause of the 14th Amendment inhibiting states from depriving any person within their jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws, there is no doubt that a private corporation is included. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737.

Corporations are persons within the meaning is substantially the owner of an aliquot part of the property of the corporation, although the legal title to such property is vested in the corporation, and not in him. The value of his shares can never vary greatly from the value of the property they represent. This is as true of shares of stock in foreign corporations as in those of domestic corporations. The law taxes both, with the exception of cases where the property of the corporation is taxed in this state. Stated thus (and this is the effect of subdivisions 7 and 9, taken together), there is no want of uniformity of method or rule; and there is no impropriety in thus stating it, for the constitution cannot be supposed to have been framed with a view to what other states might do. It has no jurisdiction over corporations of other states; and when its citizens embark in foreign corporate enterprises, and pay money to them, taking certificates of stock therefrom, this state cannot tax the property of such corporation in its possession outside of this state. Yet, substantially, its citizens have as much property as before; and, if not taxed in another state, there is no reason why it should not be taxed here, like the stock of domestic corporations. The state has said, in effect, to its citizens, "If you invest your property in corporations, you shall be taxed upon the shares, except where the property of the corporation is taxed to the corporation by this state." We may doubt the abstract justice of this; but we believe the state has the power to tax the shares of residents in foreign corporations, and that this power is not affected by the action of another state in imposing taxes upon the corporations. Michigan owes much to the investment of

of the 14th Amendment. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161.

It is contended by counsel, as the basis of his argument, and we admit the soundness of his position, that corporations are persons within the 1st section of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, forbidding the denial by a state to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 585, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207.

It is conceded that corporations are persons within the meaning of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution forbidding states from depriving any person within their jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593.

Private corporations are persons within the meaning of the 14th Amendment, and as such may not be denied the equal protection of the laws. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S. 386, 35 L. ed. 1061, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255; Covington & L. Twp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 560, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198; United States v. Northwestern Exp. Stage Transp. Co. 164 U. S. 686, 41 L. ed. 599, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206.

It is well settled that corporations are persons within the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, Reversing 87 Tex. 19, 26 S. W. 985.

The rights and securities guaranteed to persons by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States cannot be disregarded in respect of the artificial entities called corporations, any more than they can be in respect of the individuals who are the equitable owners of the property belonging to such corporations. A state has no more power to deny to corporations the equal protection of the laws than it has to deny it to individual citizens. Ibid.

It is well settled that a corporation is a person within the meaning of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution; that it is entitled to the equal protection of the laws; and that no state can to any extent deny it. Schofield v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 92 Ky. 233, sub nom. Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 14 L. B. A. 579, 17 S. W. 567.

That corporations are persons within the meaning of the 1st section of the 14th Constitutional Amendment, and that they may invoke the benefit of those provisions of the Constitution which guarantee to persons the enjoyment 60 L. R. A.

of property, or afford them the means for its protection, or prohibit legislation injuriously affecting it, has been emphatically affirmed in comparatively recent cases. Hammond Beef & Provision Co. v. Best, 91 Me. 431, 42 L. R. A. 528, 40 Atl. 338.

Corporations, as well as individuals, are entitled to the equal protection of the laws under the 14th Amendment. Luman v. Hutchens Bros. Co. 90 Md. 14, 46 L. R. A. 393, 44 Atl. 1051.

A corporation is a person within the meaning of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

It follows from the foregoing that the decision in Insurance Co. v. New Orleans, 1 Woods, 85, Fed. Cas. No. 7,052, that only natural persons are embraced in the clause of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution forbidding any state to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, and that corporations are not included; and the like decision in State ex rel. Curtis v. Brown & S. Mfg. Co. 18 R. I. 16, 17 L. R. A. 856, 25 Atl. 246,—are both against the whole current of authority, and must be condemned as unsound.

It was held in Central P. R. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 60 Cal. 35, that a corporation was, not a person within the meaning of the 14th Amendment forbidding states to deny to any person within their jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but that case is thoroughly discredited.

It was expressly disapproved on this point in San Mateo County v. Southern P. R. Co. 8 Sawy. 238, 13 Fed. 722, and was reversed in California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073, although, in reversing, the Supreme Court of the United States refused to express itself concerning the repugnancy of the statute involved to the 14th Amendment as a denial of the equal protection of the laws. It was subsequently overruled in San Benito County v. Southern P. R. Co. 77 Cal. 520, 19 Pac. 827.

2. Within statutes.

It was and is a logical necessity to hold corporations to be persons within the 14th Amendment, so as to be entitled to the equal protection of the laws in respect of the burdens of taxation, because the courts generally hold them to be persons within the taxing statutes. For the illumination cast upon this point, the reader will pardon a brief digression to the cases of this character.

foreign money in her corporations which she taxes, and it is probably to her interest that moneys so invested be not taxed again elsewhere; but she is powerless to prevent it, though it goes without saying that the property, in effect, is taxed twice. There are the questions of policy and abstract justice involved, both protesting against double taxation; but the legislatures of the states are judges of both policy and propriety, so long as the constitutions have not forbidden it, and the weight of authority supports the claim that, in the absence of clear and express prohibition, they have not. In the case of Youngblood v. Seaton, 32 Mich. 406, 20 Am. Rep. 654, a tax was objected to as violating the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity. It was said: "If the precise point here is that the tax is unequal and unjust because it is not levied in proportion to the business done, then the objection is without force. It may possibly be true that an apportionment according to the business done would have been more just, but a question of this nature concerns the legislature, and not us. Courts cannot annul tax laws because of their operating unequally and unjustly. If they could, they might defeat all taxation whatsoever, for there never yet was a tax law that was not more or less unequal and unjust in its practical workings. . . . Apportionment of taxation is purely a legislative function." In Insurance Co. v. New Orleans, 1 Woods, 89, Fed. Cas. No. 7,052, it was said: "This is a suit for $1,000 tax on a foreign insurance company not chartered in this state, but transacting business therein. . . . It is resisted on the ground that the same statute imposes a tax of but five hundred

A domestic corporation is within a general statute declaring all property in the state, and all personal property belonging to the inhabitants thereof, liable to taxation, unless otherwise specially provided, and thereunder is liable for a personal property tax assessed in the city where it has its principal office. Tripp v. Merchants' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 12 B. I. 435.

A foreign insurance company having within a city an established agency for the transaction of its business is an inhabitant of such city, so as to be subject to taxation upon its business therein carried on under an ordinance imposing a license tax passed in pursuance of a power in the municipal charter to make such assessments on the inhabitants, or those who hold taxable property in the city, as may seem expedient. Home Ins. Co. v. Augusta, 50 Ga. 530.

But a foreign corporation with an office in the state is not within a statute thereof providing that all personal property within or without the commonwealth shall be assessed to the owner thereof in the city or town where he is an inhabitant on a stated date. A corporation is an inhabitant only at its domicile in its own state. Boston Invest. Co. v. Boston, 158 Mass. 461, 83 N. E. 580.

"It was decided by this court, in the case of The Clinton Woolen and Cotton Manufacturing Co. v. Morse & Bennet (October Term, 1817), that, under the act for the assessment and collection of taxes, corporations are liable to be taxed for property owned by them; yet, the act speaks only of persons liable to be assessed, and the term 'corporation' is not used at all." People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 358, 8 Am. Dec. 243.

A banking corporation is within a statute empowering the village in which it is located to assess taxes for municipal public purposes upon the inhabitants and freeholders thereof. Ontario Bank v. Bunnell, 10 Wend. 186.

A foreign corporation is within a statute providing that all persons doing business within the state, who are not residents, shall be assessed and taxed upon all sums invested in said business the same as if residents. Smyth v. International Life Assur. Co. 35 How. Pr. 126.

A statute enacting that all persons and associations doing business in the state as merchants, bankers, or otherwise, and not residents thereof, shall be assessed and taxed on all sums invested in any manner in said business the same as if they were residents; and that said taxes shall be collected from the property of the firms, persons, or associations to which they severally belong,—embraces foreign corporations, which are accordingly liable to local taxation. 60 L. R. A.

People ex rel. Thurber-Whyland Co. v. Barker, 141 N. Y. 118, 23 L. R. A. 95, 35 N. E. 1073.

The New York tax law, in requiring assessors to set down all taxable personal property of each person after deducting his debts, and to make oath that the assessment roll contains a true statement of such personal property of each person named in it above his debts, embraces a corporation; and, therefore, corporate debts should be deducted from the personal property assessed to it for local purposes. People ex rel. Cornell S. B. Co. v. Dederick, 161 N. Y. 195, 55 N. E. 927.

A statute enacting that, if any person whose duty it is to list property, or make a return thereof for taxation either to the assessor or county auditor, shall in any year or years make a false return or statement, or shall evade making a return or statement, etc., etc., embraces an insurance corporation. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Hard, 59 Ohio St. 248, 52 N. E. 635.

A railroad corporation is within a statute enacting that, if any person shall neglect or refuse to pay any tax assessed to him, the township or city treasurer, as the case may be, shall collect the same by seizing the personal property of such person to an amount sufficient to pay such tax, fees, and charges for subsequent sale. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ellison, 118 Mich. 30, 71 N. W. 324.

A statute enacting that, if any person fail or refuse to give a list of his taxable property when legally called upon for that purpose by the assessor, or give a false or fraudulent list, or refuse to give the amount he is worth, he shall be fined and otherwise penalized; that when it shall be known to the sheriff that any person has failed, etc., etc., he shall report such person to be dealt with, fined, and taxed as delinquent, etc.; and that any person who has failed to give in his list of taxable property because he was not called upon to do so by the assessor may, after the assessor has returned his tax book, list the same, etc.,—applies to railroad corporations. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 85 Ky. 198, 3 S. W. 139; Lincoln County Ct. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 3 Ky. L. Rep. 436.

Indeed, Kentucky holds, not only that corporations are persons within the meaning of its tax laws, but that they are "white folks." Pineville Public Graded Schools v. Bell County Coke & Improv. Co. 96 Ky. 68, 27 S. W. 862; Elisabethtown Dist. Public School v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 160, 30 S. W. 620; Com. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 991, 33 S. W. 204.

In some of the states, whose decisions have dollars upon an insurance company incorporated by the laws of the state and transacting business therein. The defendant contends that the distinction made between these two classes of cases is in violation of article 14 of the state constitution, which declares that 'taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state.' The provision of the constitution relied on by the defendant has not deprived the legislature of the power of dividing the objects of legislation into classes. It merely obliges the legislature to impose an equal burden upon all those who find themselves in the same class." This doctrine is supported by State v. Lathrop, 10 La. Ann. 398; *Hughes v. 652, 35 N. W. 808. We think the determination of this question is for the legislature, and not subject to review by the courts. It appears from the statute itself that shares in foreign corporations are taxed in this state but once, and the shares in domestic corporations or their representatives are also taxed. The question of the effect of statutes of foreign states cannot be considered, nor can such statutes have any effect in this state upon the question of the uniformity of the rules of taxation. The stock has a situs in this state, and is subject to the control of the legislature for the purpose of taxation.

2. It is further contended by counsel for relator that the law of 1893 (section 3831, 1 Comp. Laws 1897) has an element of doubt and uncertainty in it as to the intent of the legislature to include such property for taxation in this state, as it is provided by subdivision 5 that personal property actually and permanently invested in any other state shall not be included, while subdivision 9 includes for taxation all shares in foreign corporations owned by citizens of this state, except national bank stocks. It is also contended that it was the intent of the legislature to provide taxation upon such property against citizens of the state; that it is evident the legislature used the word "citizen" in its restricted sense, and that the act was intended to provide taxation against a citizen of the state residing in New York or Ohio, or any other place outside the state,—one who returns for the purpose of voting at elections, but resides for the most part in foreign jurisdictions; that the word "citizen," as used in this statute, was intended to reach a large class of persons who are citizens of this state and reside elsewhere; that, under the construction contended for by the respondent, all citizens who are nonresidents of the state would escape taxation. It is claimed that the construction contended for by relator is made apparent from the change made in 1893 from the former provisions of the statute; that the statute of 1889 (Act No. 195) provided, as did the law of 1885, for taxation upon all ships, boats, and vessels belonging to inhabitants of this state, whether at home or abroad, and all goods, chattels, and effects belonging to inhabitants of this state, situate without this state, and all shares in foreign corporations except national banks owned by inhabitants of this state; that the law of 1889 used the word "inhabitant" in providing for taxation upon personal property; while in the enactment of The leading cases in point bring this out very clearly.

A statute exacting a yearly percentage of the capital of all banks is not a tax, but an excise or duty upon a commodity, and, therefore, need not be proportionate, as the Constitution requires assessments, rates, and taxes to be when laid upon the inhabitants and estates within the commonwealth. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252.

By the Massachusetts Constitution, the legislature may not only impose and levy, on condition that they be proportionate and reasonable, assessments, rates, and taxes upon all inhabitants of, and persons resident and estates lying within, the commonwealth, but it may also raise a revenue under the power conferred to impose and levy reasonable duties and excises upon commodities and other things,—from other sources of emolument and profit not strictly called property, but which are rather to be considered as the means of acquiring property. An annual percentage charge upon the capital of all banks is an exercise of this latter power. Ibid.

The statute requiring every domestic savings bank and institution to pay the state a tax on account of its depositors, of a stated percentage on the amount of its deposits, to be assessed semiannually on the average of deposits during the preceding half year, imposes a duty or excise upon a commodity, viz., the privilege or franchise of the institution; and, hence, is not repugnant to the constitutional provision requiring the imposition and levy of proportional and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes. This is plain, because the charge is against the corporation, whose franchise may be taken away if it does not pay; it is not laid upon individual deposits, but upon the average aggregate ascertained periodically, and, hence, is measured by the extent the corporation has used its franchise; and because, too, by another section of the act depositors are exempt. Com. v. People's Five Cents Sav. Bank, 5 Allen, 428.

Under that Constitution, it has uniformly been held, since the formation of the government of Massachusetts, that the legislature has power to impose an excise upon any business or calling exercised in the commonwealth, and upon any franchise or privilege conferred by, or exercised within, it. An act requiring every life insurance corporation and association, domestic and foreign alike, to pay annually an excise tax of an amount determinable by assessment upon a valuation equal to the aggregate net value of all policies in force at the end of the year, held by residents, is an exercise of such power. Such an act is constitutional, although it cannot be justified as a tax upon property under the power to impose and levy proportionate and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Com. 133 Mass. 161.

Every excise necessarily must finally fall upon and be paid by property, and so may be indirectly a tax upon property. But the legislature clearly intended such charge as an excise, and not a tax upon property. It is not in terms laid upon the property, or upon the policy holders; it is the corporation which is to pay it, and which is exposed to the penalties for non-payment. We hold it to be what the legislature has declared it to be,—an excise upon a franchise or privilege of the corporation. It is true that the aggregate net value of outstanding policies represents debts or liabilities of the companies; so does the capital stock of a corporation; and, what is more nearly analogous to these cases, so do the deposits of a savings bank; but this is immaterial if they also furnish a fair basis by which to estimate the value of the franchise or privilege which the legislature, in its discretion, desires to subject to an excise. Ibid.

A statute requiring every telegraph corporation, company, or person doing business in the state to pay annually a state tax of a stated percentage on the value of the line owned within the state, including all poles, wires, insulators, office furniture, batteries, and instruments, imposes a tax upon the franchise or business of telegraphing, and not upon the property of those conducting it; and, hence, is not within a constitutional requirement that all taxes upon real and personal estate assessed by authority of the state must be apportioned and assessed equally according to the just value thereof. State v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Me. 518.

A tax upon savings banks is admitted to be

1893 this word was eliminated and the word "citizen" substituted, when referring to stock in foreign corporations; that section 3831, 1 Comp. Laws 1897, by subdivision 5, provides for taxation upon all goods, chattels, and effects belonging to inhabitants of this state situate without this state, except that property actually and permanently invested in business in any other state shall not be included; that the word "inhabitants," as used in these statutes, reaches all persons who are residents of the state, while the word "citizen" as used is intended to reach a class of persons who are citizens of the state and reside elsewhere; that by this construction all citizens of the state who are nonresidents of the state could be taxed under this law, while, if it only provided that inhabitants of the state should be taxed, then nonresident citizens would escape taxation. And it is thus insisted that the change made in 1893, by striking out the word "inhabitant" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "citizen," was made to meet this situation. It is claimed that under this construction a rule of taxation is provided which is not uniform, as it does not operate upon all this kind of property alike, and whether it is taxable or not depends upon who is the owner of it. It is claimed that the statute does not provide that all foreign stock shall be taxed; that it provides only for the taxation of stocks owned by citizens of the state. We think this contention has no force, and that it does not accord with the plain provisions of subdivision 9. We think the legislature intended to use the word "citizen" as synonymous with "inhabitant" or "resident." As was said in McKenzie v. Murphy, 24 an anomaly. It rests upon peculiar grounds of public policy, and is universally excepted from the rule of equality and uniformity. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. v. State, 62 N. H. 648; Somersworth Sav. Bank v. Somersworth, 68 N. H. 402, 44 Atl. 534.

An act requiring domestic corporations, with certain exceptions, to pay a yearly license fee or tax of a fraction of 1 per cent on the amount of their capital stock, does not fall within a constitutional provision directing property to be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value. Such a tax is manifestly not one upon property, but a tax on certain corporations by way of a license for exercising corporate franchises, and, although laid upon capital stock, possesses the legal quality of a license or franchise tax. There is in New Jersey no constitutional restriction upon the power of the legislature to impose such a tax. Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 46 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Atl. 733.

A tax imposed upon a savings bank under a statute requiring all such institutions, in lieu of all other taxes, to pay an annual tax on the amount of their deposits of a specified percentage after deducting therefrom available funds on hand or on deposit to meet current payments or expenses, and the amount invested in any securities issued by any county, town, township, or city in the state, or which by state or Federal laws are exempt, and, also, the cost of real estate purchased upon foreclosure and subject to taxes the same as other like property,—is not a property tax, nor one upon anything having a certain relation to property; it is a tax upon the bank gauged by the amount of its deposits,—its debts, not its possessions,—subject to stated deductions; and, therefore, it is not affected by a constitutional mandate that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value. State, Trenton Sav. Fund Soc., Prosecutor, v. Richards, 52 N. J. L. 156, 18 Atl. 582.

A state tax laid annually upon the gross receipts of all domestic steam railroads doing business in the state is not a tax upon their property, but upon their franchises, measured by the extent of their business, and, hence, not in conflict with the declaration of the Maryland Bill of Rights that every person in the state, or holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of the public taxes for the support of the government according to his actual worth in real and personal property. State v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 45 Md. 361, 24 Am. Rep. 511.

A statute levying a percentage tax upon the gross receipts of every telegraph, telephone, electric light, and express company derived from business done by it in the state is not in conflict with provisions in the state Constitution requiring all taxes levied on property in the state to be assessed in exact proportion to the value of such property, and forbidding the legislature to levy in any one year a greater than a stated rate of taxation on the value of taxable property within the state, because such a tax is not one upon property, but upon occupations. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State Bd. of Assessment, 80 Ala. 273, 60 Am. Rep. 99.

This case was reversed in 182 U. S. 472, 83 L. ed. 409, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 726, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 181, but the reversal went upon the ground that, in its application to the Western Union Telegraph Company, the tax was in conflict with the commerce clause of the United States Constitution.

Constitutional provisions requiring all taxes levied on property to be assessed in exact proportion to the value thereof, and that the property of private corporations, associations, and individuals shall be forever taxed at the same rate, do not inhibit the legislature from levying an occupation or a privilege tax upon corporations or business, and measuring the amount thereof by the gross receipts. Capital City Water Co. v. Montgomery County Bd. of Revenue, 117 Ala. 303, 23 So. 970.

The fact that such a tax is a percentage of the gross receipts above current expenses does not make it a tax upon income, and therefore upon property, and thus bring it within such constitutional limitations. Ibid.

The court reached its conclusion by reasoning that state Constitutions were restraining acts, not enabling ones, and, hence, legislatures had plenary power, in the absence of specific restrictions, to tax anything and everything they chose; that license exactions are not taxes, nor are privilege or occupation taxes taxes upon property. That the power to tax property was the only one limited in respect of taxation. All other taxes might be laid ad libitum. Ibid.

A municipal ordinance imposing a license tax sanctioned by penalties under a power given a city in its charter to levy and collect a license tax on fire or life insurance companies or agencies, and to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures for the breach of any ordinance, is not repugnant to a constitutional command to the legislature to provide an equal and uniform rate of assessment and taxation. Leavenworth v. Booth, 15 Kan. 627.

Even cases wherein a tax was annulled be-

Ark. 159: "The word 'citizen' is often used in common conversation and writing as meaning only inhabitant, a resident of a town, state, or county, without any implication of political or civil privileges." In State ex rel. Owens v. Trustees of Section 29, 11 Ohio, 24, it was said: "Here a question is raised as to the meaning of the word 'citizen' as used in this connection. That this word does not always mean one and the same thing is clear. Thus we speak of a person as a citizen of a particular place, when we mean nothing more by it than that he is a resident of that place. When we speak of a citizen of the United States, we mean one who was born within the limits of, or has been naturalized by the laws of, the United States. It can hardly be believed that the legislature, in using the word 'citizen' in this statute, intended to make a distinction between native or naturalized citizens and resident aliens." We think it was not intended by the legislature to limit the word to persons who are actually citizens in a political sense. A liberal construction must be given to the tax laws for public purposes. Mr. Justice Grant said in Auditor General v. Hutchinson, 113 Mich. 245, 71 N. W. 514: "Tax laws should be liberally construed." See also United States v. Hodson, 10 Wall. 395, 19 L. ed. 937; United States v. Taylor, 104 U. S. 216, 26 L. ed. 721.

3. One other question is raised. It is claimed that the taxation of relator's stock is in contravention of section 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other cause of its repugnancy to uniformity and equality provisions frequently illustrate the same principle, wholly irrespective of whether, individually, they were well decided, since in the main they go upon the ground that the challenged exaction rested, despite its form, upon property rather than privilege.

In the two cases of State v. South Carolina R. Co. and State v. Northeastern R. Co. 4 S. C. N. S. 376, a statute imposing a state tax upon railroads, graduated in amount according to the length of the main tracks and branches, was held unconstitutional for violation of the provisions respecting the uniformity and equality of property ad valorem taxation. The overturned statute was entitled, An Act to Provide for a General License Law. The court said: "The section . . . on which the indictments are founded adjusts and fixes the amount to be paid into the treasury by the length of the road. It is a tax imposed on the road as property. It is not laid on its income, or any franchise or privilege, but measured solely by the 'length of the main track and branches.' . . . So far as the provisions of the act seek to make railroad companies amenable to it in the way and manner it proposes, it is unconstitutional and void. The conclusion is so clear and undeniable that we shall content ourselves with a mere reference to the clauses of the Constitution which forbid the levy of any tax on property except in proportion to its value."

One must regret that the court did not spend a little time in demonstrating that the statute sub judice did impose a property, and not a franchise, tax. The real nature of the tax was the crux of the case. If it really was a franchise tax, it could as well be measured by mileage as by any other standard.

A state law levying a tax upon the gross receipts of foreign insurers against fire losses and water perils, as a property tax pure and simple, and not as a license tax or condition upon which such foreigners are permitted to do business within the state, no matter by what name it may be called by the legislature, when no tax is laid upon the gross receipts of domestic insurers or of any other kind of business,—is void for want of conformity to constitutional requirements of equality and uniformity of taxation. Parker v. North British & M. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 428, 7 So. 599.

In the case of Crow v. State, 14 Mo. 237, Birch, J., was of the opinion that a statute requiring merchants to pay a license tax graduated according to their sales when they sell merchandise not grown, produced, or made within the state conflicted with the provision in the state 60 L. R. A.

Constitution requiring all property to be taxed ad valorem. He held that the statute laid a property tax no matter what it was called, and that the constitutional prohibition could not be escaped by calling it a license. While Napton, J., who dissented, did so on the ground that the tax in question was a license, and not a tax upon property, and, therefore, was not affected by the constitutional provision cited.

A statute taxing railroad cars not owned by operating railroads, but running within the state, when the burden of the tax rests upon the cars themselves, and not upon their owners, however complicated and ingenious the method devised for assessing and levying the charge, imposes a property tax, and not a license or privilege tax; and, when the tax is a specific percentage upon the aggregate assessment and valuation of such cars greatly in excess of the rate of tax on property as limited by the Constitution, it is void. State ex rel. Armour Packing Co. v. Stephens, 146 Mo. 662, 48 S. W. 929.

In the note in this series on the Taxation of corporate franchises in the United States (div. VI.), Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 57 L. R. A. 33, are collated the cases dealing with the question whether or not a given tax was one upon property or an excise upon a privilege or franchise; and in the note on the Taxation of capital stock of corporations in the United States, to State Bd. of Equalization v. People (Ill.) 58 L. R. A. 513, are discussed the cases wherein a disputed tax was, on the one hand, laid directly upon capital stock as the sum of the corporate possessions, and was, therefore, a tax on property, or, on the other hand, was laid primarily upon the corporation on account of its franchises, privileges, business, etc., and was, therefore, an excise, license, or privilege tax in which capital stock was merely resorted to as a standard of measurement. From what has been said and hereafter appears in this note, and from the statements in the two notes just mentioned, it will be manifest that in all cases the rule of uniformity and equality of taxation has or has not application once the nature of the tax is determined. If the tax be one upon property, even upon intangible property,—upon a franchise as property,—it will apply. If the tax be a privilege tax pure and simple, it will not apply. The controversy in any particular case ever turns upon the nature of the tax. The principle is generally conceded.

In Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904, and Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 state." This contention cannot be sustained. In Bonaparte v. Baltimore City Appeal Tax Ct. 104 U. S. 592, 26 L. ed. 845, the question the court was asked to decide was whether the registered public debt of one state, exempt from taxation by the debt- or state, or actually taxed there, is taxable by another state, when owned by a resident of the latter state. The court said: "We know of no provision of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits such taxation. . . . It is insisted, however, that the immunity asked for arises from article 4, § 1, of the Constitution, which provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts of every other state. We are unable to give such an effect to this provision. . . . While the Constitution of the United States might have been so framed as to afford relief against such a disability, it has not been; and the states are left free to extend the comity which is sought, or not, as they please." It was further remarked in the case that: "No state can legislate except with reference to its own jurisdiction. One state cannot exempt property from taxation in another." In Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 547, it was said: "The constitutional power to tax shares of stock owned by our citizens in corporations located without the state does not depend on whether the capital of the corporation is or is not taxed in the state where the corporation is created. The power is the same whether the capital of the corporation is there taxed or not; otherwise, the power of taxation conferred by the constitution would be made to depend upon the operation of laws of a foreign jurisdiction,—a proposition so obvi-

L. ed. 907, the question was in each case whether the disputed tax was properly to be regarded as a tax upon property, or an excise upon privileges or franchises. The tax in neither was proportional, and hence, if a property tax, was plainly unconstitutional. Each tax was sustained, and only could be sustained as a privilege tax. The dissenting justices took the ground that these taxes were true property taxes, not excises, and were void because disproportionate.

Notwithstanding an opinion about to be referred to, the Supreme Court of the United States consistently adheres to this doctrine. An inheritance tax not being one on property, but on the succession, and the right to take property by descent or devise being the creature of law,—not a natural right, but a privilege, and, therefore, a privilege upon which the authority conferring it may impose conditions,—it follows that states may tax such privilege, may discriminate between relatives and between these and strangers, and may grant exemptions, and are not precluded from so doing by constitutional provisions requiring uniformity and equality. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1087, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594.

If the force of what has been stated in this division can be increased, the opinions of the several members of the New Jersey court of errors and appeals in the great contest over railroad taxation that was waged in that state several years ago will have that effect. The New Jersey railroad tax act of 1884 imposed a tax upon property, including the corporate franchises, and provided a complete system of assessment and valuation. Such a tax was plainly subject to the constitutional rule of uniformity and equality. All the judges agreed as to this. As to the taxability of franchises. They are undoubtedly property, and as such taxable. The act provides that the state board of assessors shall ascertain the value of the franchises separately. They are to ascertain their true value. They have a value which can be estimated. Runyon, Chancellor. There can be no question that this law imposes a tax on property, and it is not a franchise tax. The value of the franchise is to be estimated and included in ascertaining the true value of all property used for railroad and canal purposes, and the tax is imposed on this total valuation. All is designated in the act as property, and is within the scope of this paragraph of the Constitution. That the franchise of a railroad or canal company may be thus valued and assessed for general taxes is abundantly settled by authority 60 L. R. A.

and precedent in legislative acts, and in the decisions of the courts. It has an appreciable market value, not in all cases easy to measure, and not always determinable by the same rule or estimate. Scudder, J. Nor is the act invalid because, in the ascertainment of the value of the property of the companies, the franchise is to be taken into account as one element of value. The supreme court rightly holds "that this subject is not debatable at the present day, and the doctrine has become already accredited by many decisions as well of the Federal as of the state courts." Parker, J. It is clear that the case in hand is subject to the provision of the state Constitution that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value,—that is, it is one wherein property is assessed for taxes. Dixon, J. The tax laid by the act of 1884 is a tax upon property. The tax to be assessed and levied has none of the qualities of a tax in personam,—none of the characteristics of indirect taxation for franchisees. The franchises of the corporations are made taxable on the true value thereof as property, and as part of the property of such corporations. The counsel on both sides discussed the case on the assumption that the taxation by the act was taxation upon property, and in that view I concur. Depue, J. (dissenting). State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578, Reversing 48 N. J. L. 1, 57 Am. Rep. 516, 2 Atl. 789.

The dissenting opinion follows further the subject of the present inquiry, and, so far as it is confined to this branch, correctly states the law. The constitutional provision invoked, continues Judge Depue, relates only to taxation upon property. It leaves unimpaired that branch of the taxing power which consists in the imposition of indirect taxes for the exercise of franchises or the pursuit of business, trades, or occupations. Over this subject the discretion of the legislature is unrestrained save, only, by the need of conforming to that essential quality of taxation that, when a class of persons or things is selected for taxation, the tax must be imposed upon individuals of the class under a rule of uniformity. Ibid.

And, he adds, continuing his argument: Another class of cases cited from Federal and state courts is also inapplicable to this subject. I refer to decisions on the legislative power of indirect taxation by taxes on privileges, franchises, trades, and occupations, and excise duties, of which Society for Savings v. Colte, 3 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 897; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 594, sub nom. Edye v. Robertson, 28 L. ed. 798, 802, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247; Com.

ously ill founded that the moment it is stated its falsity becomes apparent." See also Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen, 316, where the same doctrine is laid down. Cooley, in his work on Taxation, lays down the same rule. He says: "The shares owned by residents in foreign corporations may be taxed to the owners, even though the corporations themselves are taxed in the jurisdictions where their operations are carried on." Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 57.

The writ must be denied.

Montgomery, Ch. J., and Hooker and Moore, JJ., concur with Long, J.

Grant, J., dissenting:

The conceded facts in this case are: The New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company is a corporation organized under the laws of New York. Its property, personal and real, is situated in that state. It has no property subject to taxation in Michigan. All its property, including its capital stock, is taxed in the state of New York. Its tax in that state for the year 1900 was $2,345,526.08, which it paid. This includes the tax on its capital stock, which tax amounted to $237,816.71. The total tax amounted to 2 per cent on its entire capital stock, and to 11.4 per cent on its net income. The relator is a citizen of this state, residing in the city of St. Clair. He owns a number of shares of the capital stock of that company, for which he holds its certificate. This stock has been assessed to him in St. Clair, presumably at its cash value. The rate of taxation in that municipality is about 3 per cent on the assessed value of property. The constitution of

v. Cary Improvement Co. 98 Mass. 19; Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 20 Am. Rep. 654; New Orleans v. Kaufman, 29 La. Ann. 283, 29 Am. Rep. 328; and Kiltanning Coal Co. v. Com. 79 Pa. 100,—are types. This branch of the legislative power of taxation is universally admitted not to come within the equality clauses in constitutional provisions relative to taxation upon property; and in constitutions which simply provide that all taxation shall be equal a distinction is made between taxes on property and taxes on franchises, occupations, and pursuits, for the reason that in property there is always present the element of market value as the basis on which equality in taxation can be attained by the application of a uniform rate on such values; but in franchises, trades, or occupations there is no such element of value in common; and, hence, the rule of equality is not violated by taxation on these subjects by a rule which is uniform as to each class. Ibid.

In the light of all this, it is somewhat discouraging to find Mr. Justice Brown, in the Supreme Court of the United States, as late as November, 1901, in Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Hewes, 183 U. S. 66, 46 L. ed. 86, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26, without a word of dissent from his brethren, confusing two quite distinct things, as he reasons thus: "By § 18 of the company's charter of 1882 it was declared 'that such company, its stock, its railroad, and appurtenances, and all its property in this state necessary or incident to the full exercise of all the powers herein granted, shall be exempt from taxation for a term of twenty years from the passage of this act.' This undoubtedly implies an exemption from privilege, as well as ad valorem taxes; and such has been the construction given to it by the supreme court of Mississippi. Grand Gulf & P. G. R. Co. v. Buck, 53 Miss. 246. But, as we have already held, this section must be construed as subservient to § 13, article 12, of the Constitution of 1869, providing that 'the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation.' Now, if privilege taxes are taxes upon the property of corporations, an exemption from such taxes was subject to repeal as much as we have already held an exemption of ad valorem taxes to be. Whatever may have been the fluctuations of opinion upon this subject,—and it is not to be denied that there are many cases in the state courts holding that a privilege tax is not a tax upon property,—the law in this court, so far as concerns railway franchises, must be deemed to have been settled by the case of Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568 in which an exemption in the charter of the Wilmington & Raleigh Railway Company, of 'the property of said company and the shares therein' from taxation was decided to extend to a tax upon the franchise and rolling stock. In delivering the opinion of this court, Mr. Justice Davis observed: 'It is insisted, however, that the tax on the franchise is something entirely distinct from the property of the corporation, and that the legislature, therefore, was not inhibited from taxing it. The position is equally unsound with the others taken in this case. Nothing is better settled than that the franchise of a private corporation,—which in its application to a railroad is the privilege of running it and taking fare and freight,—is property, and of the most valuable kind, as it cannot be taken for public use, even without compensation. It is true it is not the same sort of property as the rolling stock, roadbed, and depot grounds, but it is, equally with them, covered by the general term, "the property of the company," and therefore equally within the protection of the charter.' To the same effect are Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 195, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, and Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 547, 19 L. ed. 482, 487. This also appears to be the law in Mississippi, Coulson v. Harris, 43 Miss. 728; Drysdale v. Pradat, 45 Miss. 445. In West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 507, 534, 12 L. ed. 535, 546, the franchise of a bridge company was held to be property subject to condemnation under the law of eminent domain." Then, citing additional authorities to the point that corporate franchises are property, both within the law of eminent domain and for taxing purposes, Justice Brown concludes: "It follows, then, that privilege taxes, being taxes upon property, are subject to the constitutional limitations of 1869, and their exemption was equally repealable as that of ad valorem taxes."

It certainly is true that there is an almost unbroken line of authority to the effect that corporate franchises are property for the purposes of taxation; but there is an equally long and equally unbroken line of authority to the effect that privilege taxes are not taxes upon property. There has been practically no fluctuation of opinion upon either proposition.

"The franchise that is taxed as property is the privilege enjoyed by a corporation of exercising certain powers derived from the state, whereas the franchise with which we have to do is the right to exist in corporate form without reference to the powers that, under such form, the company may exercise. This distinction, although formulated by Mr. Justice Field in Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S.

Michigan provides that: "The legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation, except on property paying specific taxes, and taxes shall be levied on such property as shall be prescribed by law." Art. 14, § 11. The statute of Michigan provides that: "For the purposes of taxation, personal property shall include: . . . (5) All goods, chattels and effects belonging to inhabitants of this state, . . . except that property actually and permanently invested in business in another state shall not be included. . . . (7) All shares in corporations organized under the laws of this state, when the property of such corporations is not exempt, or is not taxable to itself; or when the personal property is not taxed. . . . (9) All shares in foreign corporations, except national banks, owned by citizens of this state." Comp. Laws 1897, § 3831.

Can this taxation be sustained under the above provision of the constitution of Michigan? Double taxation is unequal taxation, under our constitution. Were this railroad company a Michigan corporation, with all its property in Michigan, and assessed at its cash value, and taxes paid thereon, and were its stockholders in Michigan again taxed upon the capital stock owned by them at its cash value, this would be double taxation, and therefore unequal, and clearly prohibited by the constitution. To illustrate: The real estate of the Calumet & Hecla Mining Company, situated in Houghton county, is assessed at $55,274,920; its personal property, at $6,550,000; making a total of $61,824,920. Assuming that the rate of taxation in Houghton county, including 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593, was not strictly adhered to in his subsequent expressions, probably because there was nothing in that case to call for a nice use of terms. In this state we tax each of these so-called franchises. The former, as in the case of the right to own and operate a railroad, is taxed as property having a true value, which it is the duty of the state board to ascertain for the purposes of constitutional assessment. On the other hand, the naked right of existing in corporate form is taxed, as in the case before us, not at its true value, as it would have to be if it were property, but at a sum arbitrarily imposed by the legislature as an annual fee, the amount of which is to be computed by reference to the capital of the company as a criterion. It is, in short, a poll tax levied upon domestic corporations for the right to be. Such a tax is not upon property or assets, and does not in any way concern the nature of the business the company may be authorized to carry on." Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co. v. State Board, 55 N. J. L. 529, sub nom. State, Lumberville Delaware Bridge Co., Prosecutors, v. State Board, 25 L. R. A. 184, 26 Atl. 711.

Ad valorem taxation and privilege taxation are different things, having no necessary connection. They are distinct burdens laid by the government upon those receiving its protection, and, when legally imposed, must be borne as a recompense for that protection. The same person may be subject to both, or to one and not the other. Subjection to one does not mean subjection to the other; nor does exemption from one include exemption from the other. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

IX. Classification.

a. In general.

1. The power to classify.

The most important qualification of constitutional rules of uniformity and equality of taxation resides in the universally conceded power of legislatures to classify taxpayers and the subjects of taxation, imposing different rates upon the classes formed, and assessing these by different methods. It is admitted that such a power should exist to a greater or less extent, but it is manifest that, if it is wholly unrestrained, it may be so exercised as completely to nullify a constitutional mandate enjoining equality and uniformity. Such a mandate is nugatory if a legislature may classify, divide, and subdivide without limit, and levy varying taxes upon the artificial and arbitrary divisions made.

The right and power generally of legislatures to select and classify the subjects, and prescribe the methods of taxation and of the assessment and collection of taxes at will, is undenied. Pine Grove Twp. v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 668, 22 L. ed. 227; Barber v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 82, 28 L. ed. 925, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 821, sub nom. *Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. state, county, and municipal, amounted to 3 per cent, the corporation would pay the present year taxes amounting to $1,854,747.-60. If the stockholders in Michigan were again assessed upon the cash value of their stock, their property, clearly, would be taxed twice; for the value of their stock is represented by the value of the property of the corporation. That this would be in violation of the constitution is clear. The stock has no value not based upon the value of its property. Furthermore, the stockholder in either event pays the taxes. It matters not what you choose to call the stock; it is but the evidence of his property. The stockholders are the owners in fact of all the property of the corporation. All profits made belong to them. The surplus, upon the winding up of its affairs, belongs to them. Although the taxes levied may be paid out of the earnings of the company, and out of its treasury, they are just as much paid by the stockholder as though he had been assessed his pro rata share for the payment of the taxes. This was distinctly held in People ex rel. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594. The constitution of that state provided that "all property . . . not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." Is there any difference in meaning between that provision and our own, which declares that taxation shall be equal? Taxation in proportion to value means equality, and equality means taxation in proportion to value. So it has been held that the taxation of the property of a bank and of its capital stock at the same time is double taxation, forbidden by the organic law found in the dec-

"No statute provision shall be so construed as to subject any stock to double taxation." Under that act the municipal authorities assessed stock in the Michigan Central Railroad Company to a citizen of New Hampshire. The court held that this stock was not taxable in New Hampshire. Kimball v. Milford, 54 N. H. 406. In New York the provision of their statute, "that the shareholder shall not be taxed in respect to his shares in any corporation whose capital stock is taxed," was held to apply to cor-

From the multitude of cases, a few selected citations are especially apt as illustrations of the stated principle.

The 14th Amendment does not prohibit legislation which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed, or by the territory in which it is to operate. Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 71, 30 L. ed. 580, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350.

A state may, without conflicting with the prohibition in the 14th Amendment against denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, distinguish, select, and classify objects of legislation; and, necessarily, its power in this respect must have a wide range of discretion; yet it is not wholly without limitation. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594.

We need not repeat the commonplaces as to the large latitude allowed to the states for classification upon any reasonable basis. Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491.

The legislature has a discretion, with which the courts cannot interfere, to classify for the purposes of taxation. Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 66 N. J. L. 86, 48 Atl. 580.

In the legitimate exercise of the power of taxation, persons and things have always been, and may constitutionally be, classified. No one has ever deuced this proposition. Durach's Appeal, 62 Pa. 491.

The Pennsylvania Constitution does not withdraw the power of classification from the legislature. The power to impose taxes for the support of the government, subject to the limitations of the Constitution, belongs to the legislature. The selection of the subjects, their classification, and the methods of collection are purely legislative matters. Com. v. Delaware Division Canal Co. 123 Pa. 594, 2 L. R. A. 798, 16 Atl. 584.

It has been settled, said the supreme court of that state in 1894, that the legislature can, without making a revenue statute obnoxious to the Constitution, classify corporations for the purposes of taxation; may sever a small class from a larger one; may subject one class to taxation and leave others untaxed. Com. v. Sharon Coal Co. 164 Pa. 304, 30 Atl. 127, 128.

The Tennessee Constitution recognizes only two general kinds of taxation,—ad valorem and privilege. These cover the whole domain of taxation, and beyond these the legislature may not go in the imposition of taxes. In respect of the subjects of the latter kind, the legislative discretion has a very comprehensive range. At least any occupation, business, employment, or the like affecting the public may be classed and taxed as a privilege. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

There is no longer any ground for questioning, in the state of Georgia, the constitutional power of the general assembly, in the imposition of specific taxes upon occupations, to classify the subjects of taxation,—taxing some and omitting to tax others; or for asserting that the uniformity clause in the article of the Constitution of the state relating to taxation is violated, so long as a given tax is made uniform on all individuals belonging to the particular class on which it is imposed. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497, 25 S. E. 249.

porations organized in other states, where their property and business were located. People ex rel. Trowbridge v. New York City & County Tax & A. Comrs. 4 Hun, 595. I quote the following language from that case: "Such corporations are taxable, and we must presume, in the absence of proof, that taxes in their respective home states are duly assessed and collected upon their capital stock or property. The stocks in such corporations, held by individuals here, are simple representatives of capital or property employed in business in other states, the title of which is vested in and controlled by the artificial person created by and residing in such states. They represent an interest which is or may become a membership in the corporation, and evidence of a right to participate in divided profit, and in the ultimate dividend of surplus after the payment of all debts and obligations of the corporation. The stock certificates are not themselves the property, but are evidences of the rights just mentioned, to be possessed, enjoyed, and enforced, under and in conformity with the laws of the state which created the body corporate. The property of the corporation, whether real or personal, in which these certificates of legal or equitable rights are outstanding, is not 'within this state,' which, by the general statute, is the test of taxability; but, if any portion of it were, that fact would not affect the question now before us, for then, under our statutes, it would be taxable here, because of its situs, to its possessor or owner, but not to the mere holders of stock in the corporation." That case was affirmed by the court of appeals in a memorandum opinion, found in 62 N. Y. 630. Justice Cooley says: "It

2. The Limitations.

What, then, are the limitations upon the legislative power to classify for the purposes of taxation? Certainly a constitutional mandate commanding uniformity and equality of taxation is not a mere counsel of perfection addressed to the legislature to which the judicial branch of the government cannot give force.

"Clear and hostile discriminations," cautiously remarked Mr. Justice Bradley, "against particular persons and classes, especially such as are of an unusual character unknown to the practice of our governments, might be obnoxious to the constitutional prohibition," & c., against denying the equal protection of the laws. Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 184 U. S. 232, 38 L. ed. 892, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582.

It is apparent, says Mr. Justice Brewer, that the mere fact of classification is not sufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of the equality clause of the 14th Amendment; and that in all cases it must appear, not only that a classification has been made, but, also, that it is one based on some reasonable grounds,—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification,—and is not a mere arbitrary selection. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 185 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, Reversing 87 Tex. 19, 26 S. W. 985.

The question always is, when a classification is made, whether there is any reasonable ground for it, or whether it is only and simply arbitrary, based upon no real distinction and entirely unnatural. If the classification be proper and legal, there is the requisite uniformity in that respect. Nicol v. Ames, 173 U. S. 509, 43 L. ed. 786, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522.

Classification cannot be resorted to for the purpose of justifying an evasion of the constitutional mandate that all property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value. The legislative discretion to classify subjects for the purposes of taxation is limited to a classification resting upon substantial differences. So long as the public burden is imposed proximately according to the true value of the property bearing it, the courts cannot interfere with the legislative discretion to classify, upon substantial differences, subjects of taxation, not to provide varying methods of assessment in each class that have a reasonable basis in convenience of levying and collecting the taxes. Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 66 N. J. L. 86, 48 Atl. 580.

Classification, to be valid, must rest on some reason of public policy, some substantial difference of situation or circumstances that would naturally suggest the justice or expediency of diverse legislation with respect to the objects classified. State ex rel. Dawson County v. Farmers' & M. Irrig. Co. 59 Neb. 4, 80 N. W. 53.

Whilst the legislature may, under conditions, create classes, and subject all persons coming within the classification to burdens or duties not imposed upon individuals outside of the classes, these classifications must not be arbitrary or unreasonable, but must rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect of which the classification is proposed. Luman v. Hitchens Bros. Co. 90 Md. 14, 46 L. R. A. 393, 44 Atl. 1051.

Classification is a legislative question, subject to judicial revision only so far as to see that it is founded on real distinctions, and not on artificial or irrelevant ones used for the purpose of evading the constitutional prohibition. If the distinctions are genuine, the courts cannot declare the classification void, though they may not consider it to be on a sound basis. The test is not wisdom, but good faith in the classification. Seabolt v. Northumberland County, 187 Pa. 318, 41 Atl. 22.

The real test of the validity of an objection to a tax law as violating the rule of uniformity is not whether the classification is wise or just, but whether the legislature acted arbitrarily,—whether, without an adequate determining principle, it divided the subject of the tax into two classes, and then sought to deprive one of these classes of the equal protection of the laws. If there is a genuine and substantial distinction between the two classes, the classification is lawful. Rosenbloom v. State (Neb.) 57 L. R. A. 922, 89 N. W. 1053.

To justify judicial interference, the classification adopted must be based upon an invidious and unreasonable distinction or difference with reference to similar kinds of property. People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

The provision of the Michigan Constitution requiring uniformity in the levying of taxes has for its object the prevention of unjust discrimination. It prevents property from being classified and taxed as classed by different rules. All kinds of property must be taxed uniformly, or be entirely exempt. The uniformity must be co-extensive with the territory to which the tax applies. If a state tax, it must be uniform all over the state. If a county or city tax, it must be uniform throughout such county or city. Pine Grove Twp. v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 668, 22 L. ed. 227.

Equality and uniformity of taxes on occupations to the approximate extent which is rea-is a fundamental maxim in taxation that the same property shall not be subject to a double tax, payable by the same party either directly or indirectly." Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 227. Justice Champlin, in Taggart v. Sanilac County, 71 Mich. 26, 38 N. W. 642, said: "The rule of uniformity forbids that taxation should be double. No person can be twice assessed upon the cash value of the same property, to defray a public burden." This opinion was concurred in by Justices Morse and Long. Justice Campbell, in the same case, said: "No tax law can be valid which does not provide for securing such uniformity. Of course, it is not necessary to attempt impossibilities. Uniformity, as well as value, may involve some exercise of opinion or discretion, and cannot be absolute. But a law which does not provide directly for satisfying these conditions as far as practicable cannot be a valid exercise of the taxing power, and cannot be upheld as conforming to the constitution. . . . It cannot be possible to have double taxation valid under our constitution. It not only destroys uniformity of burdens, but in so doing involves the other considerations referred to."

It is not contended that under the constitution of this state the property of a domestic corporation and the stock of the shareholders, whose value depends upon the value of its property, can be taxed. But it is contended that, if the corporation and its property are located in another state, then the evidence of property known as "stock" can be assessed and taxed to the individual shareholders residing in Michigan. That is the important question in this case. Let us suppose that the Calumet & Hecla Mining reasonably attainable is required by a constitution containing the usual pertinent provision, and is an essential element in the power of taxation; but discrimination in occupations and classifications of them, so far as seem to be proper and reasonable to the legislature for the purpose of apportioning such taxes equally and uniformly, do not admit of interference from the courts so long as the legislature does not plainly transcend its authority and disregard the constitutional restrictions. And, inasmuch as the legislature may at will create municipal corporations, and clothe them with powers adequate to the purposes of their creation, among which is the power to tax, a municipal ordinance imposing discriminating occupation taxes is valid when a like legislative act would be so. Blessing v. Galveston, 42 Tex. 641.

What is the test of the reasonableness of a classification,—of one based upon "some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification, and is not a mere arbitrary selection?" Legislation special in character is not forbidden by the 14th Amendment. There is no precise application of the rule of reasonableness of classification, and the rule of equality permits many practical inequalities. And necessarily so. In a classification for governmental purposes there cannot be an exact exclusion or inclusion of persons and things. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594.

In a late case in the Supreme Court of the United States involving the constitutionality of a state law, challenged on the ground that it denied the equal protection of the law, Mr. Justice Brewer, for the majority, after remarking that, upon the one hand, legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application if, within the sphere of its operation, it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the 14th Amendment; and, on the other hand, that it was equally true that the equal protection guaranteed by the Constitution forbids the legislature to select a person, natural or artificial, and impose upon him or it burdens and liabilities not cast upon others similarly situated; that it cannot make a classification of individuals or corporations which is purely arbitrary and impose upon such class special burdens and liabilities,—proceeds to say: While cases on either side, and far away from the dividing line, are easy of disposition, the difficulty arises as the statute comes near the line of separation. Is the classification prescribed thereby purely arbitrary, or has it some basis in that which has a reasonable relation to the object sought to be accomplished? It is not at all to be wondered at that, as these doubtful cases come before this court, the justices have been divided in opinion. To some the statute presented seemed a mere arbitrary selection; to others it appeared that there was some reasonable basis of classification. But the division in all of them was not upon the principle or rule of separation, but upon the location of the particular case one side or the other of the dividing line. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, Affirming 58 Kan. 447, 49 Pac. 602.

There is a further limitation. When a reasonable and proper classification has been made, all the members of the class set apart must be taxed alike.

While the 14th Amendment, in forbidding states to deny to any person within their jurisdictions the equal protection of the laws, only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents in each class so that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances; while, too, it does not prohibit legislation limited either in the objects to which it is directed or by the territory in which it is to operate, but merely requires that all subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike under like circumstances and conditions, both in privileges conferred and liabilities imposed,—it is still a question: What is the test of likeness and unlikeness of circumstances and conditions? "These expressions," says Mr. Justice McKenna, "have almost the generality of the principle they are used to expound, and yet they are definite steps to precision and usefulness of definition when connected with the facts of the cases in which they are employed." Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594.

Legislation, which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, is not within the 14th Amendment if, within the sphere of its operation, it affects alike all persons similarly situated. Barbler v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 32, 28 L. ed. 925, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357.

The 14th Amendment merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike under like circumstances and conditions. Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 71, 30 L. ed. 580, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350.

When legislation applies to particular bodies or associations, imposing upon them additional liabilities, it is not open to the objection that it denies to them the equal protection of the laws if all who are brought under its influence are treated alike under the same conditions.

Company were located across the boundary line in Wisconsin, and its property assessed the same as it now is in Michigan; would the assessment of Michigan stockholders at the cash value of their stock be any less double taxation, or any less unequal, than if located within the state? It must be borne in mind that all the property of the corporation would be taxable in Wisconsin, and nowhere else. Or suppose that the Upper Peninsula were organized into a separate state; it would then follow, if respondent's contention be correct, that all the stock of the shareholders in the old state would at once be taxable. Is it possible that the framers of the constitution, and the people who adopted it, supposed that they were adopting a constitution capable of such oppression and injustice? I cannot so hold, even if there are decisions of other courts to the contrary. There are occasions when precedents from other tribunals, however learned they may be, should not be followed. The value of railroad, mining, and manufacturing corporations is based upon their property, which is taxed where they are located. There is no more justice in taxing the stockholder upon his stock in such a corporation located in another state than there would be in taxing the stock in the hands of a stockholder of a domestic corporation. It is as unjust and unequal in the one case as it is in the other. I cannot sanction that fiction of the law which separates the stock, calls it personal property, and assesses it, regardless of the fact that all the property which the stock represents has been assessed by the authorities where its property is located. It is common knowledge that all such corporate property is, and always has been,

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161.

The 14th Amendment, forbidding any state to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, does not prevent the classification of property for taxation,—the subjecting of one kind of property to one rate of taxation, and of another kind to a different rate; the distinguishing between franchises, licenses, and privileges, and visible, tangible property, and between real and personal property,—provided all property in the same class is treated alike. Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1026, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593.

The 14th Amendment was not intended to compel the states to adopt an iron rule of equality in respect of taxation,—to prevent the classification of property for taxation at different rates, or to prohibit legislation in that regard special either in the extent to which it operates or the objects sought by it to be attained. It is enough if there is no discrimination in favor of one as against another of the same class. Glozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657, 37 L. ed. 599, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 721.

A tax law which operates alike on all property and persons similarly situated, and under which the assessment is made by a judicial officer after notice and opportunity to be heard by the persons interested, does not conflict with the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Wallace v. Myers, 4 L. R. A. 171, 38 Fed. 184.

The general requirement of uniformity of public burden is satisfied in a tax upon business, when such tax bears upon all business of a like kind, whether followed by foreign or domestic corporations, or by resident or nonresident individuals. State v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 73 Me. 518.

Excises and duties undoubtedly must be equal; that is, they must operate upon all persons who exercise the employment which is so taxed. A tax upon one particular moneyed capital would unquestionably be contrary to the principles of justice, and could not be supported; but a tax upon all banks is justifiable. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252.

A constitutional provision that all property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value does not take away from the legislature the power of selecting the subjects of taxation, but it does require that all the members of the class selected shall be included in the taxing law, and that the rule applied thereto shall be uniform as to the whole class, and that the assessment shall be made at the true value of the property 60 L. R. A.

constituting the class. A law, therefore, which taxes a class of property separately is not unconstitutional if it embraces all property of that class, applies to it uniform rules, and taxes it according to its true value. The constitutionality of such a law is to be determined in the same way in which it would be determined if the property taxed were the only property taxed in the state. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578, Reversing 48 N. J. L. 1, 57 Am. Rep. 516, 2 Atl. 789.

A law which operates alike upon all persons under like circumstances is not obnoxious to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbidding the states to deny the equal protection of the laws to persons within their jurisdictions. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421, Affirmed in 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122.

The Illinois supreme court declares it well settled, by its repeated decisions, in that state, that the state, in its sovereign capacity, and the cities and villages thereof by grants of the legislature, have ample power to exact license fees from trades and occupations mentioned in the Illinois Constitution of 1870, art. 9, § 1, for either regulation or revenue. But, whether the license fee is for one purpose or the other, it is essential that the law which exacts it be so framed as to apply uniformly to the whole class upon which it operates. Banta v. Chicago, 172 Ill. 204, 40 L. R. A. 611, 50 N. E. 233.

Laws public in their object may be confined to a particular class of persons if they be general in their application to the class to which they apply; provided, the distinction is not arbitrary, and rests upon some reason of public policy growing out of the conditions or business of such class. Allen v. Pioneer Press Co. 40 Minn. 117, 3 L. R. A. 532, 41 N. W. 936.

Where the method adopted for subjecting property to taxation is a tax based upon valuation, the rate imposed must be uniform, and apply alike to all who are thus taxed. The property of one citizen may not be taxed at a greater rate than that of another. And, however difficult it may be to obtain equality in other respects, a uniform rate may and must be imposed in this class of taxation. State v. Canada Cattle Car Co. 85 Minn. 457, 89 N. W. 66.

If the same method of taxation is applied without discrimination throughout the state to the valuation of all property in a particular class, there is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Constitution. People ex rel.

assessed in the state in which it is located. It was common knowledge when our constitution was framed and adopted. Counsel for respondent cite Cook on Stock and Stockholders: "Aside from constitutional restrictions, it unquestionably is within the power of the state to levy not only a double tax, but even a treble or quadruple tax, if it so chooses." As authority for the text the author cites Toll-Bridge Co. v. Osborn, 35 Conn. 7. His comment upon this case is: "Evidently corporations were not popular in Connecticut in 1868, except for taxation purposes." Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 567, note. Such a result is not possible under the constitution of Michigan. One more illustration may not be out of place: Ten men, five living in Indiana and five in Michigan, are engaged as co-partners in a manufacturing business located in Indiana.

The real estate and all the personal property are in Indiana, and are there taxed. The property cannot be taxed in Michigan. They conclude to form a corporation. Each receives his proportionate share of the stock. The property is taxed in Indiana to the corporation, the same as it was taxed to the co-partnership. The result of the respondent's contention would be that the five stockholders in Michigan, who could not be taxed as co-partners, would pay the same tax in Indiana on their corporate property as they did upon it when partnership property, and would then be taxed again in Michigan, on the theory that their property has been converted into personalty, and is therefore taxable in Michigan. Is not this a species of bald legerdemain? Is it consistent with a constitution prohibiting unequal taxation? Is it the act of an honest and just govern-

Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

Equality and uniformity in taxation require that individuals in classes be treated alike; and, while it may be stated generally that, under a constitutional provision therefore, a wide discretion is given to the legislature in laying taxes on classes of property and persons, yet there must be uniformity in the application of the rule adopted for the class among individuals and property of the same character in the class. Pullman State Bank v. Manring, 18 Wash. 250, 31 Pac. 464.

Legislation which affects alike all persons pursuing the same business under the same conditions is not such class legislation as is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States or that of Oregon. Re Oberg, 21 Or. 406, 14 L. R. A. 577, 28 Pac. 130.

The legislature has a right to classify and impose license taxes upon trades and occupations, and may delegate to municipalities the power to do so; and, provided all pursuing the same occupations are taxed alike and equally, it is no objection to the tax that it does not apply to all business pursuits and every kind of occupation. Rankin v. Henderson, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 361, 7 S. W. 174.

When a state Constitution provides that all property shall be taxed according to its value as determined in a manner directed by the legislature, so that taxes shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, and no species of property be taxed higher than any other of the same value, every citizen is brought, for the purpose of taxation, into one constitutional class, and it is not competent for the legislature, under the form of classification, to divide this class and violate the Constitution by providing that taxes be assessed upon some on a different basis than value, and at an unequal and multimetric rate in proportion to value. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor, 86 Fed. 168.

When a tax is imposed on vocations or privileges, or on the franchises of corporations, it must be equal and uniform; but the equality and uniformity consist in the imposition of the like tax upon all who follow the same vocation, or who enjoy the same privilege subjected to the tax, and, if it be a franchise tax, upon all corporations belonging to the class upon which it is imposed. Phoenix Carpet Co. v. State, 118 Ala. 143, 22 So. 627.

If all in the same class are taxed alike, the requirement of the Mississippi Constitution, of uniformity and equality of taxation, is met. 60 L. R. A.

Vicksburg Bank v. Worrell, 67 Miss. 47, 7 So. 219.

Licenses and occupation taxes must be equal and uniform upon every member of the same class subjected thereto, when there is a constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity of taxation. State v. Emdon, 23 La. Ann. 663.

Under a constitution requiring uniformity and equality in taxation, but permitting the legislature to levy an income tax upon all persons pursuing any occupation, trade, or calling, and that all such persons procure licenses as provided by law, the legislature has power to select for taxation any trade, occupation, or calling, but is not competent, when taxing a calling, to exempt from the tax any one party who follows that calling. The tax must burden equally all in the selected calling. New Orleans v. Louisiana Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 31 La. Ann. 637.

b. In the concrete.

1. Reasonable classifications.

The wide discretion conceded to legislatures in classifying the subjects of taxation necessarily impels courts in the majority of cases to uphold a given classification adopted. Classifications that have been sustained vary all the way from natural and obviously proper divisions to those which are barely justifiable, or even dubious.

Corporations generally may be put in a single class. People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328; Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 594, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593; People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387; People v. Gold & Stock Teleg. Co. 98 N. Y. 67; Coal Run Coal Co. v. Finlen, 124 Ill. 666, 17 N. E. 11; State, Trenton Iron Co., Prosecutor, v. Yard, 42 N. J. L. 357; Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 220.

They may be subdivided according to the rate of their dividends. Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 1 Dauphin Co. Rep. 257.

Their capital stock may be treated as a distinct class of investments. Com. v. National Oil Co. 157 Pa. 516, 27 Atl. 374; Com. v. Mill Creek Coal Co. 157 Pa. 524, 27 Atl. 375; Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin, 66 Ohio St. 578, 64 N. E. 564.

Their stockholders may be constituted a separate class of taxpayers. Wiley v. Salisbury, 111 N. C. 397, 16 S. E. 542.

ment? Chancellor Kent thus states the doctrine: "Every person is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of his property, not only from invasions of it by individuals, but from all unequal and undue assessments on the part of government. It is not sufficient that no tax or imposition can be imposed upon the citizens but by their representatives in the legislature. The citizens are entitled to require that the legislature itself shall cause all public taxation to be fair and equal in proportion to the value of property, so that no one class of individuals and no one species of property may be unequally or unduly assessed." 2 Kent, Com. 331. This is not a question of allowing the laws of another state to interfere with the right of taxation in this. The case presents no such question. The question is, rather, whether, under our constitution, evidences or representatives of property can be taxed in this state, while the property they represent is not, never has been, and cannot be, taxable here, but is, and always has been, taxable in the state where located. Is a certificate of stock any more property than a deed of land or contracts of co-partnership? All are evidences of property, and nothing more.

I will now discuss the authorities cited in my Brother Long's opinion, and others cited in the brief of the attorney general:

In Youngblood v. Seaton, 32 Mich. 407, 20 Am. Rep. 654, the right to impose a tax upon the liquor traffic, as a condition to the right to carry on the business, was involved. It was a personal tax, and not one upon property. It was in effect a license tax, which every dealer was required to pay before entering into the traffic. The court expressly

As it was substantially said in the New Jersey court of errors and appeals, railroad and canal property necessarily used for corporate purposes in an interlocking entirety is a natural class by itself, and of universal recognition as different from other classes. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578.

Express companies may be put in a separate class. American Union Exp. Co. v. St. Joseph, 66 Mo. 675, 27 Am. Rep. 382.

And may be differentiated from other transportation companies doing an express business. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 44 Fed. 310, 142 U. S. 339, 35 L. ed. 1035, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 810, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250.

Banks and bankers may be made another separate class (Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252), and be further divided according as they may or may not be organized under a free banking act (New Orleans v. People's Bank, 32 La. Ann. 82), and, doubtless, according to the nature of the business they do.

As savings banks in one class. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907; Suffolk Sav. Bank, Petitioner, 151 Mass. 103, 23 N. E. 728; Union Five Cents Sav. Soc. 13 Ohio C. C. 131.

And trust companies in another. Montpelier Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Montpelier, 73 Vt. 364, 50 Atl. 1117; Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 66 N. J. L. 86, 48 Atl. 580.

Gas companies may be made another distinct class. Ottawa Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Downey, 127 Ill. 201, 20 N. E. 20; Sterling Gas Co. v. Higby, 134 Ill. 557, 25 N. E. 660; Williams v. Rees, 9 Blm. 405, 2 Fed. 882.

All corporations may, for some purposes, be put in one class. So may all manufacturing corporations. But this is not the limit of divisibility. Manufacturing corporations are of diverse kinds; and there is no reason why the legislature may not, if it pleases, put into one class, and tax, companies which make liquor or gas, while leaving all other manufacturing companies untaxed. Com. v. Germania Brewing Co. 145 Pa. 83, 22 Atl. 240.

A uniformity and equality clause does not preclude the legislature from exempting manufacturing corporations from a state tax to which held that it was a uniform tax, and that "uniformity is the very basis of this tax. It is levied entirely without discrimination; and the real objection made to it is, not that it lacks uniformity, but that the legislature were unjust in making it uniform, instead of levying it by some standard of discrimination." The law was attacked as unjust and unequal, in that it was not levied in proportion to the business done. The language quoted in my brother's opinion does not apply to a case where taxation is conceded to be double, but to uniform tax laws, which cannot be made to operate justly in all cases, because of the infirmities of human judgment. In State v. Lathrop, 10 La. Ann. 398, a tax was imposed upon a foreign corporation as a condition to its doing business in the state of Louisiana. A like tax was imposed upon home companies, but in a less amount. The decision is based expressly upon the right of the state to impose any condition it pleases upon foreign corporations desiring to do business within the state. That there be no mistake about this, I quote from the decision: "If this state has thought fit to recognize foreign charters of incorporation to the extent of permitting foreign corporations to transact business in their corporate name, through agents, within our limits, the legislature had an undoubted right to attach what conditions it thought fit to the privilege." In Insurance Co. v. New Orleans, 1 Woods, 85, 89, Fed. Cas. No. 7,052, the same question was involved, and the Federal court followed and quoted from State v. Lathrop. The same question was involved in Hughes v. Cairo, 92 Ill. 339, and the decision was expressly planted upon two grounds: (1) corporations in general are liable. Hawes Mfg. Co.'s Appeal, 1 Monaghan, 353, 17 Atl. 219.

The legislature may go further. It may exempt those manufacturing corporations that carry on their manufacturing within the state, and may tax manufacturing corporations that do their manufacturing outside of the state, and yet not thereby come in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, sub nom. New York ex rel. Parke, D. & Co. v. Roberts, 43 L. ed. 323, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58, affirming 149 N. Y. 608, 44 N. E. 1127.

Mining and mines may be separately classified. Kittanning Coal Co. v. Com. 79 Pa. 100; People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

The sewing-machine business may be singled out for separate taxation in one form or another. St. Louis v. Bowler, 94 Mo. 630, 7 S. W. 434; Quartlebaum v. State, 79 Ala. 1; Slinger Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497, 25 S. E. 249; Slinger Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 33 Fed. 121.

A corporation engaged in the general business of refining raw sugars purchased by itself, or intrusted to it by others for that purpose, is in a different class from a sugar planter who grows and grinds the cane upon his own plantation and refines the product into sugar; since the former is a manufacturer, and the latter is a farmer or planter. A state, therefore, which discriminates between the two by taxing the corporate manufacturer and exempting the individual planter upon the sugar either refines, does not thereby deny to the corporation the equal protection of the laws in contravention of the 14th Amendment. American Sugar Ref. Co. v. Louisiana, 179 U. S. 89, 45 L. ed. 102, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43, affirming 51 La. Ann. 565, 25 So. 447.

2. Unreasonable classifications.

The cases are not numerous wherein a tax law has been adjudged void because it made a classification repugnant to the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity. But occasionally a piece of legislation is so incurably vicious that it cannot stand. Such was the Missouri statute, purporting to regulate business and trade, of May 16, 1899, known popularly as the anti-department store act, imposing license taxes,—a law which the supreme court of the state annulled without a dissenting vote. Robinson, J., who expressed, in the main, the views of the court, attacked with vigor the classification made by the act as "wholly without reason or necessity." He characterized it as "so arbitrary and unreasonable as to defy suggestion to the contrary;" as "classification run wild." The simple statement of its creation, said he, is a most fatal blow to its continued existence. State ex rel. Wyatt v. Ashbrook, 154 Mo. 375, 48 L. R. A. 265, 55 S. W. 627.

There was a similar adjudication by the supreme court of Pennsylvania concerning the Pennsylvania act of June 15, 1897, regulating the employment of unnaturalized male foreigners, and imposing a per diem tax for each of such employees, to be deducted from his wages. The law was held to be repugnant to the 14th Amendment as a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and also violative of art. 1, § 9, of the state Constitution, commanding all taxes to be uniform upon the same class of subjects. Juniata Limestone Co. v. Fagley, 187 Pa. 193, 42 L. R. A. 443, 40 Atl. 977.

The United States circuit court in the western district of that state had previously reached the same conclusion. Fraser v. McConway & T. Co. 6 Pa. Dist. R. 555.

Sometimes a classification is so indefinite and so broad as to work, necessarily, an unequal burden, and the law is held void for that reason. That was the vice with an ordinance of a Virginia municipality laying a specific tax on every 1,000 lbs. of tobacco bought each month. The price of tobacco in that market ranged from 1 cent to $1 per pound, and some dealers dealt only in the cheaper grades, and others entirely in the more expensive ones. Danville v. Shelton, 76 Va. 325.

A municipal ordinance in Pennsylvania suffered from a like infirmity, and was annulled for similar reasons. By its terms the assessors were directed to assess all offices and posts of profit, professions, trades, and occupations according to the income derived from them. It did not divide the several subjects of taxation, but grouped them all as occupations, and left the assessors to guess at the amount of the tax without guiding rules. The supreme court of the state deemed it hopelessly and incurably vicious. Banger's Appeal, 109 Pa. 79.

In Pennsylvania the legislature is held incompetent to fix an arbitrary valuation of property in one city, or in certain cities of the state, differing from the valuations in other cities therein. Pittsburgh's Petition, 138 Pa. 401, 21 Atl. 757, 759, 761.

Under a constitution forbidding any species of taxable property to be taxed any higher than another of equal value, and giving the legislature power to tax merchants, peddlers, and privileges, and authorize municipalities to

That the constitution of Illinois expressly provides that the general assembly may tax insurance interests or business, and persons or corporations owning or using franchises and privileges, in such manner as it shall from time to time direct, by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates; and (2) that the legislature could impose any conditions it saw fit upon foreign corporations, as a condition to their right to do business in the state. In the above cases taxation of property subject to general taxation was no more in issue than it was in the case of Union Trust Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 125 Mich. 487, 84 N. W. 1101, involving the validity of the inheritance tax law. All such cases do not involve the question of the assessment of property. They are license taxes, pure and simple, upon the right to do business and the statutory right to inherit. The question now before us was not raised in Graham v. St. Joseph Twp. 67 Mich. 652, 35 N. W. 808. The plaintiff there was the owner of stock in a foreign corporation whose sole property was two steamboats, which were assessed at Benton Harbor, a city adjoining St. Joseph, where plaintiff lived. The court held that, if the boats were taxable at Benton Harbor, plaintiff's stock could not be taxed at St. Joseph, and held that the boats were not taxable in Benton Harbor, and the stock was therefore taxable in St. Joseph. The case of Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 29 L. ed. 240, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1014, arose in Ohio. Sturges was the owner of some stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company. He claimed exemption because some of the property of the telegraph company was situated in Ohio, and was there taxed. The court followed the impose taxes for governmental purposes in such manner as may be prescribed by law, all property to be taxed ad valorem upon the same principles that govern state taxation; and under a charter authorizing a city to license, tax, and regulate merchants and certain other occupations, and to levy and collect taxes upon all privileges taxed for state purposes,—a municipal ordinance, declaring the business of selling goods by sample a separate vocation, and requiring from those who follow it a license charged for at $300 and a bond in a penalty of $5,000, to pay 1 per cent of sales, with an additional section making it apply only to merchants out of the city, and not dealing in agricultural products of their own growth, with provisions for a fine if it is not obeyed,—is void, because a municipality has no power to create a privilege in order to tax it, and because it cannot constitutionally discriminate between persons exercising the same privilege,—between resident and nonresident merchants. Nashville v. Althorp, 5 Coldw. 554.

c. Constituents of the same class.

It has already been noted that all members of the same class must be treated alike in tax laws; but that the legislature may carry the process of subdivision into classes to a very great length. The courts divide, therefore, upon the question as to whether a discriminating tax law merely discriminates between classes, or between members of the same class. If the former it is constitutional, if the latter, it is not.

1. Justifiable discrimination.

While a tax act which divides, for the purposes of taxation, the railroads operating in the state into two classes, to wit, those not paying an ad valorem tax to the state, and those which do, is undoubtedly class legislation, it is not of the vicious or forbidden kind, because it applies equally to all corporations that are, or may be, in like situation or circumstances; and it makes a natural and reasonable, not an arbitrary, classification, notwithstanding that out of a total of seventy-five railroads in the state only two are in the first class. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 58 L. E. A. 921 43 S. W. 115.

A similar discrimination was sustained in Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 89 Ga. 574, 15 S. E. 293, Affirmed in 151 U. S. 470. 38 L. ed. 238, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396.

The legislature is competent to put the debts of corporations in a different class from the 60 L. R. A.

debts of individuals for the purposes of taxation. Com. v. Delaware Division Canal Co. 123 Pa. 594, 2 L. R. A. 798, 16 Atl. 584; Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 33 L. ed. 892, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533; Chester v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 240, 33 L. ed. 896, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 538; Jennings v. Coal Ridge Improv. & Coal Co. 147 U. S. 147, 37 L. ed. 116, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282.

The equal protection of the laws is not denied by a state statute for the taxation of stock in foreign railroad corporations and the exemption of all stock in domestic ones and in others which list the great bulk of their property for taxation. Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 401.

Contracts of insurance, generally considered, possess such distinctive attributes as justify their classification separately from other contracts; and not alone that, but insurance contracts, as between themselves, may be classified separately, depending upon the nature of the insurance, the character of the property covered, and the extent of the loss that may supervene. Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Dobney, 189 U. S. 301, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, Affirmed 62 Neb. 218, 86 N. W. 1070.

A statute enacting that there shall be paid to the treasurer of a city fire department for its use and benefit, annually on a stated day, by every person who acts in such city as agent for or in behalf of any individual or association of individuals not a domestic corporation to effect insurances against fire in such city, although his principal may be a foreign corporation existing for that purpose, $2 on the $100, and at that rate upon the amount of all premiums received,—is not repugnant to the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution as an arbitrary discrimination against a class of citizens pursuing a lawful vocation, vis., those acting for unincorporated or foreign associations, who are burdened with a tax from which others in the same calling, representing domestic corporations, are free, when both have equal rights before the law; because unincorporated and foreign associations of this character receive the same benefits as, without being subject to the burdens of, domestic incorporated ones, and the legislature has a right to classify them apart. New York Fire Department v. Stanton, 159 N. Y. 225, 54 N. E. 28.

Under constitutional provisions requiring taxation to be equal and uniform, but permitting the legislature to levy a license tax, and, when it does so, to graduate the amount thereof to be collected from those pursuing the taxed trades, callings, and professions, it is competent for decision of the Ohio court in Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 547, where it was held that the stock of a foreign corporation, owned by a resident of Ohio, was not included in the act exempting from taxation shares of capital stock which was taxed in the name of the corporation. The constitution provided: "Laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, and joint-stock companies or otherwise." [Ohio Const. art. 12, § 2.] In Bradley v. Bauder it is said: "Both the constitution and the statute expressly designate 'investments in stocks' as one of the subjects of taxation, without any restriction or limitation as to the place or state where such 'stocks' may be authorized or issued." Taxation of both domestic and foreign stocks, therefore, was expressly authorized by the constitution of Ohio. The right to tax was not in question. The sole question was whether the fact that some of its tangible property had its situs in Ohio, and was there taxed, brought the case within the exemption of the statute. The same question again arose in Lee v. Sturges, 46 Ohio St. 153, 2 L. R. A. 556, 19 N. E. 560, and was held to be governed by Bradley v. Bauder. That case was decided in 1889. On page 161, 46 Ohio St., is this language: "Whether shares of the stockholders and the capital of the company constitute the same or different species of property has been the subject of much discussion in a great number of cases. But the weight of authority we believe to be in favor of the proposition that shares of stock constitute property distinct from the capital or property of the company." Two of the five justices dissented.

the legislature to divide into classes those who follow the insurance business, and tax them according to the amount of premiums collected,—the greater the premiums the greater the tax. State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 40 La. Ann. 463, 4 So. 504.

It is competent for the legislature, in imposing privilege or occupation taxes, to make the amount graduated according to the business done, and to exempt all following a taxed business whose incomes from it are less than a stated sum. That is, the tax may be laid upon those, only, whose incomes exceed a specified amount, without violating the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity of taxation, provided, the tax bears equally upon all having the same income. Cobb v. Durham County, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338.

A statute imposing an occupation tax upon the business of dealing in stocks and bills of exchange, and fixing the amount thereof five times as high when followed in any city or town of a stated population, or greater, as the sum charged in a city or town having a less number of inhabitants, does not violate a constitutional requirement that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state. Although such a constitutional provision is dominant and must be respected in the levy of all taxes for general revenue purposes, either ad valorem property taxes, or income and occupation taxes, yet, as the Constitution lays down no rule by which the required uniformity is to be secured, and the same specific tax upon all persons following a given occupation no matter how variant the conditions attending its pursuit would produce the grossest inequality, it is for the legislature to say how best to secure uniformity of burden. Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. v. State, 42 Tex. 636.

(The fallacy in this reasoning is obvious. Because a certain method which was not adopted would have resulted in great inequality, therefore, the method actually adopted, which also resulted in great inequality, was valid. This kind of ratiocination has been aptly styled "grotesque reasoning.")

A statute imposing a license tax upon the business of buying and selling fresh meats from stores, offices, and vehicles, graduated according to the population of the cities in which it is conducted; having no application outside of city limits; and exempting therefrom farmers who kill and sell their own stock,—is not void for want of constitutional uniformity. It bears equally upon all in the same class. State v. Carter, 129 N. C. 560, 40 S. E. 11. (See, contra, Georgia Packing Co. v. Macon, 22 L. R. A. 775, 4 Intern. Com. Rep. 508, 60 Fed. 774, and St. 60 L. R. A.

Louis v. Spiegel, 75 Mo. 145, infra, div. IX., c. 2.)

2. Improper discrimination.

Under a constitution commanding all taxable property to be taxed ad valorem, and the legislature to enact laws for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and to prescribe by general laws regulations to secure a just valuation so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property, with a proviso that a deduction of debts from credits may be authorized,—a statute allowing the deduction of all bona fide debts from the gross amount of all the taxpayers' credits except bank stock is unconstitutional so far as it refuses such deduction to bank stocks, for these are credits within the meaning of the Constitution, and entitled to be taxed uniformly and equally with other credits. Pullman State Bank v. Manning, 18 Wash. 250, 51 Pac. 464.

Conceding that trust companies may be classified for taxation separately, there is nothing in the character of their property or the uses to which it is devoted which differentiates it from like property of other owners not in the same class. Therefore, the stocks, bonds, notes, mortgages, and other securities belonging to a trust company must be taxed at their true value the same as if an individual was their owner. Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 66 N. J. L. 36, 48 Atl. 580.

When the Constitution requires all taxation to be equal and uniform upon the same class of subjects, and all taxable property to be taxed ad valorem within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and taxes to be levied and collected under general laws, a municipal ordinance which, in terms, imposes a higher rate of tax upon bank stock than upon personal property generally is void. Savannah v. Weed, 84 Ga. 683, 8 L. R. A. 270, 11 S. E. 235.

State bank stockholders are entitled to the same deductions that national bank stockholders are accorded in the Alabama tax laws. State Bank v. Montgomery County Bd. of Revenue, 91 Ala. 217, 8 So. 852.

A municipal ordinance providing for the payment by insurance companies doing business in the city, of a license tax graded from $750 to $6,000 annually according as the amount of premiums received varies between $150,000 or under and $1,000,000 or over, is unconstitutional and void for want of equality and uniformity. Licenses, as well as taxes, must be equal when imposed upon the same class or call-

In the construction of state constitutions and state statutes, the Supreme Court of the United States follows the decisions of the state courts, where they are not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Several cases are cited by the attorney general from the Supreme Court of the United States, and from other courts, holding that the shares held by stockholders are distinct from the capital stock of the corporation, and that taxation of both is not always necessarily double taxation. Among them is New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265, 30 L. ed. 411, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198, where it was expressly held that the assessment of a tax upon shares or shareholders in a corporation, which the company was required to pay irrespective of any dividends or profits payable to the shareholders out of which it might repay itself, was substantially a tax upon the corporation itself. Counsel quote from that case as follows: "It is well settled by the decisions of this court that the property of stockholders in their shares and the property of the corporation in its capital stock are distinct property interests, and, where that is the legislative intent, clearly expressed, that both may be taxed." In other words, such legislation by the states does not conflict with the Constitution of the United States. That case quotes with approval the language of the same court in Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645, wherein it was held that a state statute exempting the capital stock of a railroad company from taxation exempted the shares of stock in the hands of holders. The language quoted is as follows: "In corporations, four elements of taxable value are

ing. New Orleans v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 23 La. Ann. 449.

A tax laid pursuant to the authority to the legislature to levy an income tax upon all persons pursuing any trade, occupation, or calling, and to the requirement that all such persons obtain a license as provided by law, in the Louisiana Constitution, must be equal and uniform on all who follow the business taxed; and, therefore, it can be imposed but once upon any single taxpayer no matter how many separate places of business such taxpayer may have. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Blandin, 24 La. Ann. 112.

A tax levied, assessed, and collected as a property tax upon the gross receipts of a foreign insurance company, when the receipts of other companies are left untaxed, is unconstitutional. Parker v. North British & M. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 428, 7 So. 599.

To the same effect, holding void a municipal ordinance discriminating in the same way between resident and nonresident insurance companies, regardless of whether in point of fact there were any resident companies, was the case of Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. v. Augusta, 109 Ga. 73, 35 S. E. 71.

A municipal ordinance requiring every agent for every insurance company not located in the city to procure a separate license for each company represented by him, but allowing any resident of the city who has procured such a license to employ as many solicitors as he chooses, is void for unjust, partial, and unequal discrimination against nonresidents and agents of ultra-urban companies. Simrall v. Covington, 90 Ky. 444, 9 L. R. A. 556, 14 S. W. 369.

The Indiana act of March 9, 1891, to create a fireman's pension fund by exacting a tax from such foreign insurance companies as did business in counties wherein were cities with paid fire departments was held unconstitutional because, applying, as it did, to only some of the foreign insurance companies in parts of the state, and burdening these for the benefit of a particular class, it violated the equality and uniformity clause. But that statute was also considered to violate another provision of the Constitution forbidding the enactment of a law embracing a subject not expressed in the title. Henderson v. London & L. Ins. Co. 135 Ind. 23, 20 L. R. A. 827, 34 N. E. 565.

The Nebraska act of 1899, chap. 47, which discriminated between domestic and foreign insurance companies, taxing the former upon the excess of premiums over losses and current expenses in lieu of other taxes, except those upon real estate and those others provided for in the general revenue law, and taxing the latter certain fees, and, in addition, 2 per cent of their gross premiums in full of all fees and taxes except on real estate,—was held unconstitutional because in conflict with the uniformity and equality clause of the state Constitution. State ex rel. Cornell v. Foynter, 59 Neb. 417, 81 N. W. 481.

An act taxing personal judgments, except those in foreclosure, for labor performed, and for materials furnished to build upon or improve lands, is void for violating a constitutional provision requiring a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation without inclusive exceptions. Hamilton v. Wilson, 61 Kan. 511, 48 L. R. A. 238, 59 Pac. 1069.

An exemption of notes or bills for work or labor done from a tax imposed upon all other notes or bills is unconstitutional for want of equality and uniformity of taxation among members of the same class. Fox's Appeal, 112 Pa. 355, 4 Atl. 149.

A revenue act authorizing the levying and collecting of a specific tax upon wagons, drays, carriages, etc., graded according to the number of animals employed in their traction, is void because it does not bear equally and uniformly on all members in the same class. State v. Endom, 23 La. Ann. 663.

Municipal ordinances imposing upon wholesale and retail dealers in meats license taxes and burdensome restrictions as to times when, places where, and quantities of, sales, having the effect necessarily to hamper dealers in dressed meats from other states, from all of which burdens, charges, and restrictions all who sell meats from animals of their own raising are free,—are void for denying the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. Georgia Packing Co. v. Macon, 22 L. R. A. 775, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 508, 60 Fed. 774, Appeal Dismissed in 9 C. C. A. 262, 13 U. S. App. 592, 60 Fed. 781.

A constitutional provision that taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax renders invalid a municipal ordinance imposing license taxes upon meat shops, differing in amounts according to their location in various parts of the city. St. Louis v. Spiegel, 75 Mo. 145.

(The reader should compare the two cases just cited with that of State v. Carter, 129 N. C. 560, 40 S. E. 11, supra, div. IX., c. 1, and read all three in connection with American Sugar Ref. Co. v. Louisiana, 179 U. S. 89, 45 L. ed. 102, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43, affirming 51 La. Ann. 565, 26 So. 447.)

sometimes found: 1, Franchises; 2, capital stock in the hands of the corporation; 3, corporate property; and 4, shares of the capital stock in the hands of the individual stockholders. Each of these is, under some circumstances, an appropriate subject of taxation; and it is, no doubt, within the power of a state, when not restrained by constitutional limitations, to assess taxes upon them in a way to subject the corporation or the stockholders to double taxation. Double taxation is, however, never to be presumed. Justice requires that the burdens of government shall, as far as is practicable, be laid equally on all; and, if property is taxed once in one way, it would ordinarily be wrong to tax it again in another way, when the burden of both taxes falls on the same person. Sometimes tax laws have that effect, but, if they do, it is because the legislature has unmistakably so enacted. All presumptions are against such an imposition." I do not deem it necessary to enter into an analysis of the other cases cited from the United States Supreme Court. Some of them arose under the national banking act, where the state had taxed the stock of these banks in the hands of their shareholders. Of those cases it is sufficient to say that the banking act expressly provided for such taxation. But when the state law did not comply with the national act the state law was held void. This was the case in Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall. 573, sub nom. Churchill v. Utica, 18 L. ed. 229. In other cases it was insisted that the state taxation was in violation of contracts which the state and the corporation entered into, and was therefore in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Where such a. Constitutions.

Mr. Justice McKenna, of the Supreme Court of the United States, significantly said, in the course of one of his opinions, that what satisfies equality in the clause of the 14th Amendment which prohibits a state from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws has not been, and probably never can be, precisely defined. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1087, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594.

And, as this remark will apply with equal pertinency to the various clauses respecting uniformity and equality of taxation in state Constitutions, the investigator in this field is obliged to collate and place in juxtaposition a large number of cases in which the courts have construed constitutions and laws in relation to particular facts.

Neither the Federal, nor the Iowa, Constitution requires taxes imposed upon foreign corporations as a condition upon which they may enter and do business within the state to be uniform and equal upon all engaged in the taxed business. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 109 Iowa, 606, 80 N. W. 865.

Under a constitution providing that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territory of the authority levying the tax, and be levied and collected under general laws securing a just valuation for taxation of all property, real and personal; but that mines and mining claims of precious metals shall be exempt for ten years, and may be taxed thereafter,—when the legislature afterwards taxes mines and mining claims it is bound to do so conformably to the rest of such constitution. People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

The power given by the Massachusetts Constitution to the legislature to impose and levy proportionate and reasonable assessments upon all the inhabitants of, and persons resident, and estates lying, within the commonwealth, requires for its exercise an estimate or valuation of all the property within the commonwealth, and then an assessment of each individual according to his proportion of that property. To select any individual or company, or any specific article of property, and assess them by themselves, would be a violation of this provision. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252.

And of the like provision in the Constitution of New Hampshire, Chief Justice Doe, of that state, declared, in 1880, that "the unconstitutionality of unequal taxation is too plainly declared by our Constitution, and too well settled by repeated decisions made during the last fifty-three years, to be debatable." Boston, C. & M. R. Co. v. State, 60 N. H. 87.

Constitutional provisions that, while the public expenses shall be assessed on polls and estates a general valuation shall be taken, at least decennially; and that all taxes on real estate assessed by authority of the state shall be apportioned and assessed equally according to the just value thereof,—forbid the levying of taxes for private purposes, as to give or loan to individuals; and they require equality and uniformity in taxing the same class of subjects. Brewer Brick Co. v. Brewer, 62 Me. 62, 16 Am. Rep. 395.

A constitutional provision that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules ad valorem requires, not only that the assessment be under general laws, but that it shall be by uniform rules also; but it does not require that all property shall be assessed for taxes, but that, when assessed, it shall be so according to the constitutional mandate. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 378.

The terms "property" and "all property" are not interchangeable, and courts are not warranted in substituting one for the other. Ibid.

A constitutional provision requiring the property of all corporations to be taxed in the same manner as the property of an individual will not permit the deduction of the corporate debt in assessing a corporation upon its entire property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, including its franchise, under the general designation of capital stock, when individual taxpayers are allowed no debt deductions. Henderson Bridge Co. v. Com. 99 Ky. 623, 29 L. R. A. 73, 31 S. W. 486, Affirmed in 166 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 953, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532; Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken County, 105 Ky. 172, 49 S. W. 178.

A constitutional provision that all property shall be taxed is not self-executing. The mode of taxing must be prescribed by the legislature, and the statute strictly followed. De Witt v. Fays, 2 Cal. 463, 56 Am. Dec. 352.

A constitutional provision requiring the property of private corporations and of individuals to be taxed at the same rate is not self-executing; so that when, by statute, the incomes of natural persons are taxed, it becomes imperative to tax railroad incomes at the same rate without any legislative enactment therefor. State v. Mobile County, 73 Ala. 65.

A constitutional provision that taxation, save contracts were clearly made, the state laws taxing them were held to be in violation of such obligations, under the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. Where no such contract relations existed, the power of taxation was held to be a matter for the state to determine, and its action and the judgment of its courts thereon were binding. Others are cases where it has happened that one's property had been taxed in two jurisdictions. While this is recognized as a hardship, it seems to be occasionally unavoidable. This is the case in Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 524, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, where forest products intended for exportation to another state, and partially prepared for that purpose, were taxed because their situs was there, while during the same year they were assessed to their owner, as a part of his general estate, in the state to which they were to be exported and where he resided. This involves another rule, viz., the undoubted right of the state to tax personal property situated within its borders.

In most of the cases cited by counsel for respondent from the courts of other states the question now presented does not appear to have been raised. Whether at the time those decisions were rendered the constitutions of such states contained a provision similar to that of our own, I have not taken the time to investigate. If they did, the decisions could be of little value as precedents upon a question which was not brought to the attention of the courts. We are not dealing with a case where the value of the property, which represents the value of the stock, has not been taxed, or perhaps could not be taxed, in a foreign jurisdiction, the as therein provided, whether imposed by state, counties, or municipalities, shall be equal and uniform, and all property, both real and personal, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as prescribed by law; and that no one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value,—is not self-executing so as to empower counties to assess county taxes upon railroad property within their limits independently of any express legislative authority. Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Washington County, 80 Gratt. 471; New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Northampton County, 92 Va. 661, 24 S. E. 222.

The uniformity and equality provision of the Mississippi Constitution of 1890, § 112, applies to city, as well as to state and county, taxes. Adams v. Mississippi State Bank, 75 Miss. 701, 28 So. 395.

And that of the North Carolina Constitution relates only to taxes for ordinary purposes, and does not apply to special taxes authorized to enable a town to meet its subscription for railway stock. Jones v. Person County, 107 N. C. 248, 12 S. E. 69.

The last clause of the uniformity and equality provision of the Illinois Constitution (art. 9, § 1), empowering the legislature to tax certain designated occupations and corporations owning or using franchises or privileges in such manner as it shall from time to time direct by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates, in no wise limits the first clause requiring proportionate taxation, but merely authorizes the prescription of various methods for assessing and collecting such taxes. People's Loan & Homestead Assn. v. Keith, 153 Ill. 609, 28 L. B. A. 65, 39 N. E. 1072.

b. Statutes.

1. Consistent laws.

One of the earliest of taxing statutes to be construed with respect of a constitutional provision for uniform and equal taxation was the act of the Massachusetts legislature that was before the court in the old case of Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252. That case was decided in 1815, and construed a provision in the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780,—a provision that was unchanged when, in 1867, Mr. Justice Clifford, writing for the United States Supreme Court in a later case, made his lucid review of the decision. The act of 1812, said that jurist, in substance, required incorporated banks to pay the state treasurer annually a tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on the amount of the 60 L. R. A.

original stock issued to the stockholders, and it was attacked by the Portland Bank upon the grounds: (1) That the tax was illegal because not equal and proportional; (2) that the bank was not liable to it because chartered before the statute; and (3) that the legislature was powerless to select specific property to tax and assess its owner separately from his proportional share of the taxes required of all inhabitants. And that the court unanimously held: (a) That the statute was constitutional; (b) that the regulation upon the bank could not be justified under the first branch of the powers conferred upon the legislature, viz., to impose and levy proportional and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes upon all the inhabitants of, and persons resident, and estates lying, within the commonwealth, because it did not meet the condition that assessments, etc., should be proportional upon all; (c) that the legislature could not select any company or individual, or any specific article of property, and assess them or it separately, because this would not be proportional; (d) that, as the charter of the bank contained no waiver of the right to tax it, a duty or an excise might be laid upon it; and (e) that, while the operation and effect of the term "excise" were limited to any produce, goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities, yet the word "commodities" embraced everything taxable, and included "convenience, privilege, profits, and gains;" and that, under such a construction, the legislature had, without complaint, for thirty years, exacted money annually from auctioneers, attorneys, tavern keepers, and liquor sellers, and might tax the privilege of following, and impose conditions upon, the pursuit of any business, employment, or handicraft. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Massachusetts, 6 Wall. 611, 18 L. ed. 907.

A railroad corporation subjected to a state tax imposed under a separate classification for the purpose, under a law styling its property real estate, yet treating it as distinct from other forms of real estate, such as farms and town lots, and treating it, too, differently from the property of other corporations,—mining, manufacturing, gas, water, bridge, and street railway companies,—is not thereby denied the equal protection of the laws. Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, sub nom. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 29 L. ed. 414, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57.

A statute exacting from foreign corporations which do not invest or use their capital within the state (except insurance companies) an an-situs of all its property, or where its value does not consist of tangible property, but largely of its franchisees, like that of the Western Union Telegraph Company, doing business in every state of the Union, in Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511, 29 L. ed. 240, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1014; or like that of an express company, in Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305; or like that of a turnpike road, wherein the court, to justify the assessment of the stock of a foreign corporation, said: "The beneficial interest, the valuable property, consists in the franchise and right to receive tolls; and whether the right of the company in the soil of their road be technically a fee, or a perpetual easement, makes no difference." Great Barrington v. Berkshire County, 16 Pick. 572. As a reason for the power to tax shares of stock of corporations, the supreme court of Ohio, in Lee v. Sturges, said: "The shares of stock may be worth much more than the property of the corporation; that is, the franchise may be very valuable, while the visible capital may be of but little value; and dividends may be greatly out of proportion to the tangible property, as frequently occurs in regard to street railroads, gas companies, electric light companies, etc." This language was used as applicable to domestic as well as foreign corporations. It could not apply in this state, where we have just held that franchisees may enhance the value of corporate property, which is to be assessed as a unit, and at its cash value. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809. There may be cases where such stock is properly and justly assessable under the nual tribute of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mill upon every dollar of their authorized capital stock before they can have an office in the state for their stockholders, officers, agents, or employees does not deny the equal protection of the laws within the purview of the 14th Amendment. Pembla Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737.

A state law subjecting to an annual tax all moneyed securities not issued by corporations and not corporate bonds, at a stated sum on their actual value, and corporate securities at the same sum on their nominal value, is not violative of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States as a denial of the equal protection of the laws to those subjected to taxation upon corporate obligations, because all corporate securities are treated alike; and, if discriminated against in respect of other securities, the state is competent to make such a discrimination. And where such a tax is collected through the corporation by deduction from interest payments, there is no discrimination, since, when the interest is paid, the bonds are of full value, and when it is not, there is no tax. Bell's Gap R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 184 U. S. 232, 33 L. ed. 862, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533.

Such a law is no more repugnant to a provision in the state Constitution that all taxes shall be equal and uniform upon the same class of subjects than it is to the 14th Amendment. Com. v. Delaware Division Canal Co. 123 Pa. 594, 2 L. R. A. 798, 16 Atl. 584; Coal Ridge Improv. & Coal Co. v. Jennings, 127 Pa. 397, 17 Atl. 986, affirmed in 147 U. S. 147, 37 L. ed. 116, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282; Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 129 Pa. 429, 18 Atl. 406, 410.

The rule of uniformity and equality of taxation is not violated by taxing a foreign express company upon the business it does within the taxing state by contract wholly over railroads and steamboat lines that it does not own, while the same business, done by the railroad and steamboat companies upon their own account, is not thus taxed, for the reason that railroad and steamboat companies pay equivalent taxes upon roadbed, rolling stock, boats, etc. Nor is such taxation any denial of the equal protection of the laws. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Selbert, 142 U. S. 339, 35 L. ed. 1035, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 810, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250.

The equal protection of the laws is not denied to railroads, nor are they unjustly discriminated against, when they, alone, are taxed to meet the salaries and expenses of railroad commissioners whose services are deemed essential to the public in consequence of the existence 60 L. R. A.

of the railroads and of the privileges they exercise and have obtained at their own request, and which services, when properly performed, are beneficial to the public, and entail the faithful discharge of duty by the railroads for the public safety and convenience. Charlotte, C & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S. 386, 35 L. ed. 1051, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255.

A corporation of one state, which does some business in another, is not denied the equal protection of the laws in the latter, when it is therein subjected to a state tax, from which manufacturing corporations are exempt, under a statute thereof laying a tax upon all foreign and domestic corporations upon their business or franchise, computed by a percentage upon their capital stock, either at par or at actual value according as their dividends have or have not equaled 6 per cent. Such a tax is valid wholly regardless of the volume of business such a foreign corporation may transact in the taxing state, or of the amount of capital stock it employs therein, or of the extent to which it is benefited or protected by its laws. Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 148 U. S. 306, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403.

A statutory system of railroad taxation for county purposes, under which are required from railroads that are not exempt from property taxation reports of the aggregate value of their whole property, the value of their real estate and trackage, of their rolling stock, and of all their other personal property, and the separate value of their property in each county through which their roads run; whereupon they are to be subject to a property tax in each of such counties to the same extent and in the same manner that all other property is taxed, and are to be assessed upon the property located in each county, first, upon the basis of the value thereof as they report it, and, second, on such proportion of their rolling stock and other personal property as the value of their property in the particular county bears to the value of all their property, real and personal; and under which are required from railroads that are exempt from property taxation, and are taxable upon income, reports of their total mileage and of their mileage in each county in which they operate; whereupon this class is to be assessed at the rates prescribed in their charters for each county upon such proportions of their incomes as the lengths of their roads in such county bears to the whole length of their respective lines,—does not in any wise conflict with the prohibition of the 14th Amendment against a denial of the equal protection of the statute and the constitution. But we are dealing with a case where the value of all property which the stock represents, and of which its certificate is evidence, is all assessed and taxed by and in the state where it is situated, and where all such property has been assessed and taxed, in accordance with the custom of all the states from the foundation of the government to the present time, and where alone it can be taxed. I have endeavored to demonstrate that this is double, and therefore unequal, taxation. The question is new in this state, having never before been presented to its courts.

To interpret the constitution so as to include such taxation must be conceded to result in the accomplishment of a gross injustice, and to violate that rule of just taxation which lies at the foundation of honest government. It is a narrow construction. It violates the spirit of that instrument. To hold that such taxation is excluded by the constitution does justice to all its citizens, in subjecting them to equal taxation, and does injustice to none. In my judgment, the constitution, both in letter and in spirit, prohibits such taxation. I think the writ should issue.

laws. Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 151 U. S. 470, 38 L. ed. 238, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396, Affirming 89 Ga. 574, 15 S. E. 293, Followed in Sparks v. Macon, 98 Ga. 301, 25 S. E. 459.

A section in a state Constitution providing that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, unless exempted by the Constitution; that all corporate property shall pay the same rate of taxation paid by individual property; and that nothing in such Constitution shall be construed to prevent the legislature from providing for taxation based on income, licenses, or franchises,—does not preclude the taxation of corporate intangible property of a character never owned by individuals. Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 171, 41 L. ed. 960, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527.

Statutes requiring every corporation, joint-stock company, and association, domestic and foreign alike, which does business in the state, except manufacturing or mining ones, whether domestic or foreign, wholly engaged in manufacturing or mining ores within such state (the excepted entities being expressly exempted), to pay a state tax upon its franchise or business, are not objectionable upon the ground that they deny the equal protection of the laws to a foreign manufacturing corporation doing its manufacturing in its home state and sending its output for sale to a market in the enacting state, and thereby subjected to the tax thus imposed. New York v. Roberts, 171 U. S. 658, sub nom. New York ex rel. Parke, D. & Co. v. Roberts, 43 L. ed. 323, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58, Affirming 149 N. Y. 608, 44 N. E. 1127. The prevailing opinion in this case lays stress upon the fact that the statutes challenged made no discrimination between foreign and domestic corporations. That they taxed impartially, regardless of the state of their origin, all corporations not in terms exempted. That they exempted only those wholly engaged in manufacturing or mining within the state. A domestic corporation manufacturing outside of the state was just as liable to the tax as was a foreign one. A foreign corporation wholly engaged in manufacturing within the state was just as exempt as was a domestic one. There was no discrimination to the detriment of foreign corporations. Mr. Justice Harlan, who dissented, points out the superficiality of this view. The real question involved was not one of discrimination between domestic and foreign corporations, but between corporate manufacturers or miners within and without the state. The state discriminated in favor of its own products and against those produced in other states, when the producer was a corporation, either of its own or of another's creation. The majority opinion does not touch this question, and the dissentient rightly insists that it is crucial.

That by a special statute the state comptroller, who is charged by the general laws with 60 L. R. A.

the duty of assessing railroad taxes, is directed to assess the railroads of the state for taxes for certain past years in which they escaped taxation, and no similar act is passed with respect of other property generally assessable by local assessors, which had also escaped taxation in the same years, does not amount to a denial of the equal protection of the laws to the railroads, in contravention of the 14th Amendment. Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 183 U. S. 471, 46 L. ed. 283, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 176.

An Indian reservation, although attached for judicial purposes to an organized county, is not a part of the same taxing district, so as to fall under the same tax law, and be subjected to the same taxation upon the principle of equality and uniformity. The foundation of the rule which generally obtains, that there shall be uniformity in taxation of the same kind of property in the same taxing district, rests on the assumption that in such district the circumstances regarding the property to be taxed are ordinarily the same in substance, although there may, and necessarily must, be some differences as to the extent to which the different owners of property may be benefited by the taxes collected thereon, and it is to be assumed that an alteration as to rate would work an unjust and illegal discrimination in taxing property situated alike. When the difference is deep and radical between the two domains in which the same kind of property may be situated, the law which makes them one district for taxation, so that all property of the same kind in the same district must be taxed alike, and no reasonable distinction be permitted, must itself be so plain and urgent that no other intention can be suggested. Foster v. Pryor, 189 U. S. 325, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 549, Affirming 11 Okla. 357, 66 Pac. 348.

The New York statute for raising state revenue by taxing certain corporations, etc. (Laws 1881, chap. 361, amending Laws 1880, chap. 542), does not deny to those taxed thereunder the equal protection of the laws, nor conflict with any other provision of the Federal Constitution. People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328; People v. Equitable Trust Co. 96 N. Y. 387; People v. Gold & Stock Teleg. Co. 98 N. Y. 67.

(The statute referred to was the one that inaugurated the present system in vogue in New York, of taxing, for state purposes, corporations generally, both domestic and foreign, upon their franchises or business according to capital stock and dividends.)

A taxing statute enacting that all the real and personal estate of every domestic corporation, whether specially chartered or organized under the general corporation laws, shall be taxed the same as the real and personal estate of an individual is not shorn of its character as a general law for taxation according to a constitutional mandate by a proviso excepting from its operation railway, turnpike, insurance, canal, and banking property, savings banks, cometeries, churches, and purely charitable and educational associations. State, Trenton Iron Co., Prosecutor, v. Yard, 42 N. J. 857.

A general statute for the taxation of railroad and canal property, which, leaving property not used for railroad or canal purposes to be taxed by local assessors in the same way and to the same extent as other property, separates and places in a class by itself all such property necessarily used for the purpose of railroading and operating canals, which, after due appraisal at its true value,—as is the rule with all property,—by a state board of assessors, is subjected to a tax for state purposes and to another for county and municipal purposes,—does not contravene a constitutional mandate requiring property to be assessed for taxes under general laws by uniform rules, according to its value. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578.

A statute concerning trust companies, enacting that they shall be taxed upon the amount of their capital stock issued and outstanding, does not mean that they shall be assessed at the par value of the shares, but that the whole number of shares outstanding shall be assessed at their actual value. Otherwise construed, such an act would conflict with the constitutional mandate that all property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value. Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 66 N. J. L. 86, 48 Atl. 580.

A tax upon the franchise of a corporation, measured by its business, viz., by the number of tons of coal mined or purchased and sold by it,—one not laid upon the coal itself,—does not violate the constitutional rule of uniformity. Such a tax is uniform. It is at the same rate on every gross ton mined, or purchased and sold. Kittanning Coal Co. v. Com. 79 Pa. 100.

A tax law imposing taxes upon capital stock of corporations, at one rate upon the actual cash value thereof when no, or less than 6 per cent, annual dividends have been paid thereon, and at another rate upon the par value thereof for each 1 per cent of dividends when 6 per cent or more dividends have been paid thereon, whereby, in practice, stock upon which less than a 6-per-cent dividend has been paid is often valued above par, and the companies whose stock is thus valued pay a higher tax than they would if they had paid higher dividends, and more taxes proportionately than do other companies paying larger dividends; and when, too, owing to varying conditions in corporate affairs, property, and business, the rate of dividends is an uncertain measure of value for corporate stock,—is, still, not unconstitutional for want of uniformity and equality. Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 1 Dauphin Co. Rep. 257.

An act for the taxation of corporations according to the value of their capital stock, embracing their property, assets, and franchises, is not rendered unconstitutional for conflict with the requirement that taxes be uniform upon the same class of subjects, by the existence of another act exempting real estate generally from state taxes, notwithstanding a part of such capital stock has been invested in, and represents, real estate. Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 220.

There is no repugnancy to the article in the Maryland Bill of Rights declaring that every person in the state, or holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of public taxes for the support of the government according to his actual worth in real and personal property, in a statute levying a state tax annually, of a stated per cent, upon the gross receipts of all domestic steam railroads. For aught that appears such a tax is not unequal 60 L. R. A.

or unjust. State v. Northern C. R. Co. 44 Md. 131.

Nor is that Bill of Rights infringed by the taxing of corporate bonds and debt certificates, although individual mortgage debts are left exempt. This is not a discrimination against a special kind of property within the terms of that instrument. Simpson v. Hopkins, 82 Md. 478, 33 Atl. 714.

Legislation designed to carry into effect a constitutional provision that taxation, whether imposed by the state or by counties or municipalities, shall be equal and uniform; and that all property, real and personal, shall be taxed ad valorem, ascertained as prescribed by law; and that no one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of equal value, by making railroad property bear its just share of local as well as state taxation, although the language employed is not so clear and explicit as to put the liability of all classes of railroad property beyond doubt,—will be given effect as authorizing local taxation of railroads, when, under the uniform interpretation of the public authorities from the time of its enactment, continuously, local taxes have been laid upon railroad property, and the official interpretation has inferentially received judicial sanction, and the railroads during the whole time have paid such local taxes. Atlantic & D. R. Co. v. Lyons (Va.) 42 S. E. 932.

A municipal ordinance imposing a tax upon every railroad running through the municipal limits, whether such tax is called a privilege tax or by another name, taxes a business within the municipality, and does not violate the principle of uniformity of taxation embedded in the North Carolina Constitution. Piedmont R. Co. v. Reidsville, 101 N. C. 404, sub nom. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Reidsville, 2 L. R. A. 284, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 416, 8 S. E. 124.

A statute fixing the situs, for taxation, of domestic corporate stock at the principal office of the corporation, and requiring it to be listed in the corporate name as capital stock, when the stockholders need not list it, and are not taxable upon it at their respective domicils, conforms to the constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity of taxation. Wiley v. Salisbury, 111 N. C. 397, 16 S. E. 542.

A statute laying an annual tax of a specific sum upon every sewing-machine company selling or dealing in sewing machines within the state by itself or through agents, and upon all wholesale dealers in sewing machines made by companies that have not paid such tax; and requiring such companies and wholesale dealers to furnish a list of their respective agents in each county, and pay an annual fee for each one,—does not conflict with a constitutional mandate for equal and uniform taxation. In imposing taxes upon privileges and occupations, the legislature may classify the subjects of the tax, and is only required to make a given tax uniform upon all who are in the particular class taxed. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497, 25 S. E. 249.

Nor does such a statute come in conflict with the 14th Amendment as a denial of the equal protection of the laws to foreign corporations, when there are no domestic ones in the sewing-machine business in the state. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 33 Fed. 121, Appeal Dismissed in 141 U. S. 696, 35 L. ed. 906, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 103.

The case of Quartiebaum v. State, 79 Ala. 1, which arose upon a similar statute, is very much to the same effect as the two Georgia cases just cited.

A statute which imposes a license tax upon all refiners of manufactured sugar and molasses who purchase the crude sugar to refine and sell again, while exempting from such tax farmers and planters who refine their own sugar, is not objectionable upon the score of denying the equal protection of the laws, since such refiners and the farmers or planters are in different classes, and the tax bears equally upon all in the same class. State v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 51 La. Ann. 562, 25 So. 447, Affirmed in 179 U. S. 89, 45 L. ed. 102, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43.

A municipal ordinance laying license taxes on occupations in the city, by which foreign insurance companies are required to pay twice as large sums, each, as are domestic ones, was held in one case not to violate a constitutional article declaring that taxation should be equal and uniform throughout the state, since, it was said, the legislature was not thereby prevented from classifying for taxation, and foreign and domestic insurance companies may well constitute separate classes. Nor does such ordinance, the case further held, conflict with the 14th Amendment, forbidding any denial of the equal protection of the laws to any person within the jurisdiction of a state; for the alleged reason that corporations are not persons within that amendment. Insurance Co. v. New Orleans, 1 Woods, 86, Fed. Cas. No. 7,062.

Whether the decision in this particular case was right or wrong, the reasoning upon which it rests is clearly unsound.

Under a Constitution requiring all taxation to be equal and uniform throughout the state, and all property therein, except such as may be exempted by a two-thirds vote of both houses of the legislature, to be taxed ad valorem ascertained as directed by law, but conferring upon the legislature power to tax incomes, trades, occupations, and professions,—a statute taxing sellers of goods and merchandise a specific sum on each $100 of value of such goods and merchandise when purchased for sale, or received for sale, as agent or auctioneer, and requiring sworn reports under penalty, is to that extent constitutional as an occupation tax law. Whether the other part of it, providing that the specific tax it imposes shall not be construed to exempt the goods and merchandise from the ad valorem taxes imposed elsewhere in the act is valid, is an open question, not decided. State v. Stephens, 4 Tex. 187; State v. Bock, 9 Tex. 369.

When the Constitution requires taxation to be equal and uniform, authorizes occupations other than mechanical and agricultural to be taxed, and limits local occupation taxes to one half those imposed by the state; and the state lays occupation taxes upon fire, life, and marine insurance companies, with a provision that receipts for the payment thereof shall be authority to pursue the occupation in any county of the state for which a receipt is held,—a city empowered, by a statute passed at the same session, to assess certain named occupations, and such others, not specifically named, as may be taxed by the laws of the state, may lawfully ordain an occupation tax, less than half the state tax, upon every fire and marine insurance company within its limits. The payment of the tax under the state law, and possession of a receipt for it for that county, do not authorize the carrying on in the city of an insurance business without payment of the municipal tax. Ex parte Schmidt, 2 Tex. App. 196.

When the tax laws of a state require the assessment of both corporations and individuals upon the intangible property they own at its fair cash value, as required by the Constitution unless exempted by that instrument, they are consistent with the constitutional requirement that taxation shall be equal and uniform in spite of the fact that, in virtue thereof, corporations are taxed upon intangible property which does not, and, from its nature, never can, belong to natural persons. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Norman, 77 Fed. 13.

The fact that a general taxing statute containing separate sections for the taxation of banks and other corporations and of individuals allows the individuals to deduct their debts, and does not allow the corporations to do so when the state Constitution not only commands equality and uniformity of taxation, but, in terms, declares all property to be subject to taxation without deduction, does not render void the provisions for taxing banks, but merely nullifies the sections discriminating in favor of individuals. Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1.

The Ohio Constitution, in requiring banks and bankers to be so taxed that all property employed in banking shall bear a burden of taxation equal to that laid upon the property of individuals, is not violated by the statute (Rev. Stat. § 2759) requiring savings societies to make tax returns, deducting deposits from their cash, stocks, and bonds. Collett v. Springfield Sav. Soc. 13 Ohio C. C. 131.

Neither is the provision of such Constitution, requiring all property to be taxed by a uniform rule, violated by the statute (Rev. Stat. § 2417) directing no charge to be made by water-works trustees for water supplied to hospitals and charitable institutions for relieving the poor, aged, infirm, or destitute, or orphans. Gallipolis v. Gallipolis Waterworks, 2 Ohio N. P. 161.

A constitutional requirement that the general assembly shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of taxation is met in a taxing law when the same basis of assessment is fixed for all property, and the same rate of taxation is fixed within the taxing district. There are uniformity and equality of taxation and assessment when the property is to be assessed at its true cash value, and the same rate is fixed on all property subject to assessment for the tax,—when the rate of a state tax is the same all over the state, and the same rule is applied to counties and townships. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 38 N. E. 421, Affirmed in 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122.

A general statute empowering cities with organized fire departments, to tax or license for the support of such departments, foreign insurance corporations doing business within their limits to the extent of 2 per cent of their gross premium receipts in the city conforms to a constitutional provision empowering the legislature to tax the owners and users of franchises and privileges, but only by general law uniform as to the class upon which it operates. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364.

A Constitution which, while requiring proportionate ad valorem property taxation, authorizes the taxation of certain named callings and certain privileges and franchises by general law operating uniformly upon the respective classes, and then provides that the designation of the subjects of taxation shall not prevent the legislature from taxing other subjects consistently with such principles, justifies taxing livery-stable keeping, although that business was not among those named as taxable without a valuation. Howland v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 496.

A statute which, by one section, provides for the valuation by a state board of equalization, for the purposes of taxation, of the capital stock of all domestic companies or associations (except certain specified ones left to be assessed by local assessors), at its fair cash value, determined according to rules that such board adopts for the purpose, containing an exemption of shares of stock, and a provision for the assessing by local assessors in the same manner that they assess individual's property of manufacturing, stock raising, and newspaper printing and publishing companies; and which, by another section, provides that banking, gas, and certain other designated companies, with all other domestic companies and associations (except banks organized under the general banking laws and corporations assessable by local assessors as provided in the former section), shall each in addition to other property required to be listed, also make a sworn statement of its name, location, amount of its authorized and the number of shares of its capital stock, the amount paid up, the market value, if any, and the actual value otherwise of the shares, total indebtedness save for current expenses not additions to plant, and assessed valuation of tangible property,—makes gas companies, although they are manufacturing companies, liable to assessment and taxation upon their capital stock on valuation by the state board. Williams v. Rees, 9 Biss. 405, 2 Fed. 882.

A statute enacting that, in computing the taxable property of every domestic insurance company, the value of the real property upon which the company pays taxes shall be deducted from its net assets above liabilities as determined and shown by the last report of the insurance commissioner, and that the remainder shall be the amount of the personal property for which the company shall be assessed, is not violative of a constitutional requirement that the legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation, except on property paying specific taxes, and that taxes shall be levied on such property as shall be prescribed by law; also that all assessments shall be on property at its cash value. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hartz (Mich.) 8 Det. L. N. 882, 88 N. W. 405.

When, by an express provision in the state Constitution, the people reserve absolutely to themselves the whole power over statutes relating to banks and banking, an act which has been submitted to, and approved by, a popular vote in the manner prescribed by such Constitution, and which provides for a tax upon banks so repugnant to the uniformity and equality provisions of such Constitution as to be void if an ordinary act of the legislature, must be sustained because it is outside and independent of such provisions. State ex rel. Reedsburg Bank v. Hastings, 12 Wis. 52.

A statute for assessing and taxing railroads, which provides that a state board shall assess all the property of each railroad in the state, and, as an aid thereto, that the railroad's officials shall make a sworn statement detailing its property of every kind in each county and showing the amount of its rolling stock and gross earnings; and then, that such property shall be valued at its true cash value, and an assessment made on the entire road in the state, including right of way, roadbed, bridges, rolling stock, station grounds, etc., and all other real and personal property exclusively used in the operation of the road, the valuation being made in the same ratio as that of individual property; and then, that such state board shall transmit to county supervisors where the road runs the length of its main track in their respective counties and the assessed value per mile as fixed by a pro rata distribution by mileage of the whole property of the road; and then, that such supervisors, in their turn, shall apportion that assessed value to each taxing district, the amount to constitute the taxable value of the railroad's property in each district for all taxable purposes; and finally, that all such railroad property shall be taxable upon said assessment at the same rates, by the same officers, and for the same purposes as the property of individuals in the several districts,—is in conformity with a constitutional provision that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, notwithstanding that, in apportioning according to mileage, localities where machine shops, depots, and other permanent properties are situated get less than their share for local taxation. Dubuque v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 196.

A statute requiring insurance companies to pay, as taxes, a certain percentage of the premiums they receive, classifying such companies so that domestic corporations pay the smallest rate, corporations of other states in the Union a somewhat higher rate, and corporations of foreign countries a rate highest of all, does not violate constitutional requirements that all laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation; that the legislature shall not grant any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which shall not belong equally to all citizens upon the same terms, nor pass local or special laws for the collection of taxes, nor in any case where a general law can be made to apply; since the legislature has a right to make such a classification, and impose any terms and conditions it chooses upon foreign corporations seeking to do business within its borders. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 109 Iowa, 606, 80 N. W. 665.

And, for the same reasons, such statute does not conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, nor the civil rights act passed to give it effect. Ibid.

A statute providing a general system of railroad taxation for state, county, municipal, and all other purposes, by a state board of equalization, embracing all the railroads in the state, and all the property of each, real, personal, and mixed, assessed ad valorem, and apportioning such taxes upon the mileage basis to the several political subdivisions of the state,—is not violative of a constitutional provision requiring taxation on property to be uniform. State ex rel. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. E. Co. v. Severance, 55 Mo. 378.

Such a statute is not open to an objection that it contravenes such a constitutional provision by apportioning according to mileage to several counties railroad rolling stock in constant flux to and fro along the line instead of assessing it all in the city where the company has its head office, upon the theory that personal property has its taxable situs at the domicile of its owner. That theory is but a convenient fiction that the legislature may at any time change. Ibid.

A municipal ordinance requiring every express company, or agency thereof, doing an express business within the city, to pay an ad valorem tax equal to that levied within the same limits upon real estate for general and special purposes upon the gross amount of all money received in the city as compensation for the transaction of express business during the preceding calendar year, when ordained under statutory authority to tax, license, and regulate express companies or their agencies and other designated businesses,—is valid, notwithstanding a constitutional requirement for uniformity and proportional property taxation, and the existence at the same time of another municipal ordinance, passed under the same authority in the same city, taxing merchants on their stock of goods on a stated day at actual cash value and the same as real estate. American Union Exp. Co. v. St. Joseph, 66 Mo. 675, 27 Am. Rep. 382.

A municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon all sewing-machine agents without discrimination neither violates a constitutional provision requiring taxes to be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territory of the authority levying the tax, nor does it amount to a denial of the equal protection of the laws merely because no such tax is imposed upon agents for other chattels. St. Louis v. Bowler, 24 Mo. 630, 7 S. W. 434.

A state law for the assessment and collection by state officers of taxes upon railroad property in unorganized counties is not unconstitutional under a clause in the organic law which commands the legislature to provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and exempts governmental, religious, charitable, educational, etc., property; when such Constitution (unlike Constitutions in other states where the contrary has been held) neither expressly commands that all property shall be taxed, nor expressly limits the exemptions that the legislature may grant; merely because no machinery has been provided for assessing and taxing other property in the unorganized counties, and, in consequence, such other property necessarily escapes its just share of the public burdens. Francis v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 19 Kan. 303.

In reaching this conclusion, the court was not at all sure of its ground. To hold the act constitutional seemed to conflict with the general idea of uniformity which common justice, as well as the general understanding of both legislatures and courts, places as the foundation of all valid taxation. To decide the contrary, if the decision was carried to its logical results, seemed productive of "an effect so startling, and so fatal to all taxation from the commencement of our state history, as to compel the clearest conviction" before such a decision could be rendered. The court said, quite candidly: "The conclusions we have reached are by no means entirely satisfactory to us. We hold the section to be constitutional and valid, not because it is clear to us that it is so, but because it is not clear to us that it is not." Ibid.

A statute does not violate the constitutional requirement of uniformity and equality of taxation by authorizing in some counties a larger rate of taxation than is provided for by law generally throughout the state; provided, of course, that the rates in the specified counties are equal and uniform throughout the territory to which they apply. Midland Elevator Co. v. Stewart, 50 Kan. 378, 32 Pac. 33.

A law providing for the levy the next year of an additional tax to make up a deficiency in the tax of the preceding year from failure to collect all the taxes assessed in that year for state purposes in such counties as were delinquent in meeting the state tax apportioned to them, and to the extent in each of its particular deficit, does not violate a constitutional rule of uniformity. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 60 Kan. 831, 58 Pac. 561.

A statute adding interest at the rate of 50 per cent per annum to delinquent taxes where an injunction against their collection has been granted and afterwards dissolved does not violate the constitutional provision for uniformity of taxation, as the charge is in the nature of a penalty. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Labette County, 62 Kan. 550, 64 Pac. 56, affirming 9 Kan. App. 545, 59 Pac. 383.

A territorial statute enacting that from and after its passage no taxes shall be assessed, levied, or collected in any unorganized county, district, or reservation which is or may be attached to any county for judicial purposes, except taxes for territorial or court funds, and repealing inconsistent or conflicting laws, is not beyond the legislative power by the provisions of the organic act of Congress extending such power to all rightful subjects not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, forbidding any law to be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil, any 60 L. R. A.

tax to be imposed upon Federal property, any taxation of the lands or other property of non-residents higher than those of residents, any law to be enacted impairing private property rights, or making unequal discriminations in taxing different kinds of property, and requiring all property subject to taxation to be taxed in proportion to its value. Such organic act neither limits the legislative power to exempt from taxation, nor requires uniformity in taxation. Pryor v. Bryan, 11 Okla. 357, 66 Pac. 548.

Such an organic act does not prevent a territorial legislature from separately classifying railroads for taxation, and commuting their taxes for a percentage of their gross earnings. A territorial taxing act therefore, relating alone to railroads, classifying them by themselves, and imposing upon them a percentage tax upon their gross earnings in lieu of all other taxes upon their property of every kind, real, personal, and mixed, thus exempting, not only property essential to railroad operation, but also lands held speculatively for sale and profit,—is valid. Neither does such taxing act amount to a denial of equal protection of the laws, inhibited by the 14th Amendment, because lands of the same character which belong to individuals are otherwise taxed. Northern P. R. Co. v. Barnes, 2 N. D. 310, 395, 51 N. W. 386, 786.

A constitutional requirement that all property be assessed and taxed in the manner prescribed by law, and that laws be passed taxing by uniform rule all property according to its true value in money, does not prevent the legislature from providing for the taxation of tangible personal property within the state, such, for example, as grain stored in warehouses and elevators, by assessing the person, firm, corporation, or company having possession of it on the date or which the law speaks, regardless of who may be the owner. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. v. Trall County, 9 N. D. 213, 50 L. R. A. 266, 82 N. W. 727.

A statute which, after providing a mode of assessment of railroad, telegraph, ferry, and bridge companies, provides that the stock of all other domestic corporations or joint-stock companies not therein otherwise provided for, whether held by resident or alien stockholders, shall be assessed and taxed the same as all other taxable property in the precinct where such company may have its principal office, without deduction for corporate debts, but with due allowance for corporate real estate taxed where located,—in no wise conflicts with a constitutional provision requiring the legislature to provide needful revenue by levying a tax by valuation, so that each property owner shall pay in proportion to the value of his possessions, to be ascertained in a manner provided by law, and authorizing the imposition of occupation taxes by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates. Mortensen v. West Point Mfg. Co. 12 Neb. 197, 10 N. W. 714.

A division by statute of mines and mining claims for precious metals into two classes for the purpose of taxation, according as they produce more or less than a stated sum annually, does not contravene a constitutional command for uniform and equal ad valorem taxation upon the same class of subjects within the same jurisdictions. People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

A statutory scheme of taxing railroad property in municipalities according to mileage, rather than values, is not violative of such a constitutional command, since other parts of the Constitution authorize classification, and sanction different modes of assessment, while directing a legislative prescription of rules to secure a just valuation for taxation of all property. Ames v. People, 26 Colo. 83, 56 Pac. 656.

2. Inconsistent laws.

Probably the most conspicuous successful contest against a discriminating tax is that waged by the railroads in California in the Federal courts. The California Constitution provided that all property in the state not exempt by the laws of the United States, with some exceptions not here material, was to be taxed in proportion to its value to be ascertained as prescribed by law; but, in the ascertaining of property values, a distinction was made between railroads and other owners. By one article (13) a mortgage or other security for debt was, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, treated as an interest in the property affected by it, and, except as to railroads and other quasi-public corporations, such property, less the security, was taxable to the owner, and the security was taxable to his creditor. By the same article (§ 4) the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads operating in more than one county in the state were assessable at actual value without deduction for mortgages. The assessment of the property of such railroads was committed to a state board, to be, when completed, apportioned among the counties according to mileage. Other property was assessable by the local assessors. In assessing railroads, the state board was neither required to give notice of its intended action, nor were the railroads afforded any opportunity to be heard. With respect of other property, county supervisors were constituted boards of equalization in their several counties, and there was a like board for the entire state, each of which boards was able to act only according to set rules and on notice to taxpayers. The section concerning railroad taxation was held by the California courts to be self-executing and operative without legislation. The railroads attacked the provisions relating to them, and resisted taxation in pursuance thereof, because: (1) Being allowed no deduction for their mortgages as were individual taxpayers, they were denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to all persons; and (2) that, without notice or chance of hearing upon their assessments, taxation under these circumstances was, within the same amendment, a deprivation of property without due process of law. These contentions of the railroads were sustained, and the taxes assessed against them were declared invalid. San Mateo County v. Southern P. R. Co. 8 Sawy. 238, 13 Fed. 722, Appeal Dismissed in 116 U. S. 138, 29 L. ed. 539, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 317; Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 9 Sawy. 166, 13 Fed. 385, Affirmed in 118 U. S. 394, 30 L. ed. 118, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1132.

A constitutional provision that laws shall be passed taxing, by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, and investments, and also all real and personal property, according to its value in money, is violated by a statute exacting from every corporation operating a railroad within the state a so-called fee for general state revenue of $1 per mile for each mile of main, branch, double, or side track operated in the state; and the statute, therefore, is void. Such a statute plainly imposes a tax for revenue; it does not assess for benefits, nor charge for services; neither is it a police regulation. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 49 Ohio St. 189, 18 L. R. A. 380, 30 N. E. 435.

A statute creating a system of railroad taxation whereby all the property, real, personal, and mixed, of each corporation, including the length of the entire line, roadbed, switches, and side tracks, and such fractions thereof as lie in different counties, are to be scheduled and returned to a state officer with details of rolling stock, gross receipts, depots, warehouses, machine shops, tools, and machinery, and the location of every species of such property, and all other corporate possessions as a basis for assessment by railroad assessors; and which then provides that, after the deduction of a constitutional tax exemption of $1,000, and the real cash value of individual stockholdings, the aggregate value left shall be divided by the number of miles in the total length of the road to fix, for taxation purposes, the value of each mile; and thereupon the state tax is fixed by multiplying the quotient by the total number of miles in the state, and the local taxes by multiplying the quotient by the mileage in each locality,—is void for conflicting with the constitutional provisions respecting uniformity and equality of taxation. Chattanooga v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 7 Lea, 561. The court rested this decision mainly upon two grounds: (1) That some localities had valuable stations, warehouses, machine shops, etc., and others only bare tracks, so the former got less, and the latter more, taxes, than either was entitled to; and, (2) that, deducting the value of individual stock holdings, the constitutional mandate that all property should be taxed, was not obeyed.

The Kansas statute (act 1895, chap. 263), authorizing the laying of a tax to prevent prairie fires, was held unconstitutional because it rested upon railroad property which was not allowed any benefit from it. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 60 Kan. 831, 58 Pac. 561.

To single out and specially penalize railroads only among delinquent taxpayers is to violate the constitutional mandate that taxes shall be levied and collected under general laws. Atlanta & F. R. Co. v. Wright, 87 Ga. 487, 13 S. E. 578.

A statute enacting that from every person, firm, or association owning or running any palace, sleeping, or dining car, there shall be collected an annual tax of $2 per mile for each mile of any and all railroads in the state over which such cars shall run, imposes neither a tax upon property, nor upon persons, but one upon a business, and one that is of the class designated as occupation taxes; but, inasmuch as it relates to those who own, or who operate and control, cars on railways which they do not own, and subjects them to taxation, while it leaves free from taxation those who own such cars and use them upon their own railroads, it violates the constitutional requirement that all occupation taxes shall be equal and uniform upon the same class of subjects within the limits of the authority levying the tax, and is therefore void. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. State, 64 Tex. 274, 58 Am. Rep. 758.

A statute, by the terms of which every railroad expressman is required to pay annually to the state for a license, either a specified percentage of the gross receipts of his business, or else a specific sum per mile of road over which he operates, is an exercise of the taxing power, and not a police regulation; and, because it constitutes an unequal division of the public expense, and the only authority of the legislature to tax is limited by a constitutional provision to the imposing and levying of proportional and reasonable rates, assessments, and taxes, it is void. State v. United States & C. Exp. Co. 60 N. H. 219.

While a section of a statute exacting annually from each freight line and equipment company doing business or owning cars operated in the state a sum in the nature of an excise or license tax, to be computed by taking 2 per cent of the amount fixed by a state board of appraisers as the value of the proportion of the capital stock representing the corporate capital and property owned and used in the state, less the value of its locally assessed and taxed real estate, is, when read in connection with other sections of such statute, to be construed as an act imposing a tax upon property, and not an excise upon the privilege of transacting business, and, therefore, not in conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, because the legislature has a right to tax property, even if it is employed in interstate commerce, although no right to tax such commerce itself; nevertheless, inasmuch as such section imposes a specific and arbitrary tax instead of a general tax ad valorem at the general rate, it does conflict with the state constitutional requirement that all taxes to be raised be as nearly equal as may be; and that all property upon which taxes are levied shall have a cash valuation, and that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, hence, it is void. State v. Canda Cattle Car Co. 85 Minn. 457, 89 N. W. 66.

A provision in a statute designed to tax the franchisees of a corporation by taking the total value of the capital stock as indicated by the aggregate market value of the shares less the total value of the tangible property, which directs that the corporate indebtedness, except for current expenses, also, be deducted, is in conflict with such a constitutional provision, for the reason that indebtedness affects the value of the corporate stock as directly as do the assets of the corporation. The debt depreciates, the assets appreciate, the value of the shares, and the practical effect of allowing a deduction of corporate debts is double exemption, and necessarily results in inequality between the corporation and other taxpayers. State v. Duluth Gas & Water Co. 76 Minn. 96, 57 L. R. A. 63, 78 N. W. 1032.

When a state Constitution declares that the property of corporations, except educational and charitable ones, existing at the time of its adoption, or afterwards created, shall be forever subject to taxation the same as the property of individuals, legislation limiting the power of municipalities to tax corporations within them to a stated rate, while the municipalities have the right generally to tax, and do tax, individual property higher, is unconstitutional, and will not save corporations otherwise liable from local taxation at the general rate. Mobile v. Stone-wall Ins. Co. 53 Ala. 570.

A state law requiring every domestic fire insurance company, and agency of every foreign one, in a named city, to be taxed annually a stated sum, to be collected by the state tax collector of that city, and, as collected, paid into the city treasury to the credit of the local fire department for equal distribution among the several fire-fighting companies, conflicts with a constitutional provision for equal and uniform taxation, and is void. State v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 12 La. Ann. 802.

A law laying a percentage tax upon the gross earnings of domestic insurance companies, and exempting them from all other taxation, state and local, except upon real estate and special assessments, is, so far as it confers exemption, unconstitutional for violating a constitutional provision that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals. Hawkeye Ins. Co. v. French, 109 Iowa, 585, 80 N. W. 660.

A law refusing to allow banks and insurance companies any deduction from their assessments for real-estate mortgages otherwise taxed violates the Michigan constitutional requirement of uniformity of taxation and ad valorem assessments. Standard Life & Accl. Ins. Co. v. Detroit, 95 Mich. 466, 55 N. W. 112.

A statute providing that no city or town shall impose or collect a greater tax on banks or solvent credits than the state tax for the same year is void for repugnancy to a constitutional provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, and property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law. That constitutional provision applies to, and governs, municipal, as well as state, taxation. Adams v. Mississippi State Bank, 75 Miss. 701, 23 So. 395.

A law making it unlawful for any domestic coal-mining company or association to transport for sale to any place in the state or elsewhere, by rail or canal, or upon waters, coal mined within the state, until a state tax of 2 cents a long ton is first paid on such coal to the carrier for the state; requiring every carrier to collect such tax in advance on taking on such coal; and containing appropriate provisions for returns and payments, and penalties for defaults and for remissions to mining companies taxed upon their capital stock,—is void for violating the constitutional Bill of Rights of Maryland providing for equal and proportional taxation according to worth in property, because such law imposes a specific tax upon property regardless of its value. State v. Cumberland & P. R. Co. 40 Md. 22. Three judges dissented in this case because they deemed the tax one upon the corporation, not upon its coal,—an excise upon business measured by output; a license tax, not a tax on property.

An act providing that persons who procure insurance upon their property within the state from foreign corporations that have not been authorized to do business within the state shall report to the insurance superintendent their policy contracts for the purpose of taxation, and that all such contracts shall be taxed a sum equal to 10 per cent of the premiums thereon, to be paid by the policy holder, and to be a lien upon the insured property, imposes a tax upon property, and not a license charge upon a franchise, privilege, or occupation; and, while the legislature may lawfully tax insurance policies, yet such act is violative of the constitutional restriction upon all taxation not uniform and equal, and it is, therefore, void. Re Page, 60 Kan. 842, 47 L. R. A. 68, 58 Pac. 478. The court reasoned that the act in question laid a specific tax, without regard to value, upon insurance policies, and, moreover, that it taxed one, and not another, resident policy holder, because the one had his policy written out of the state by an unlicensed company, and the other did not, although both might insure property side by side of the same kind and value and liable to the same casualties.

When a state Constitution requires all property to be taxed equally and uniformly according to its value, the legislature is powerless to authorize a state officer to levy and collect taxes for past years when, in his opinion, those assessed and collected through the regularly constituted authorities were levied and paid upon too low a valuation. State Revenue Agent v. Toneyka, 70 Miss. 701, sub nom. Adams v. Toneyka, 22 L. R. A. 346, 14 So. 17.

3. Retaliation laws.

The practice has been followed in some states of singling out certain foreign corporations and imposing upon them the same burdens, by way of taxation or otherwise, that their own states impose upon like corporations from other states. The constitutionality of these retaliation statutes has generally been sustained upon the principle that a state may lawfully impose upon foreign corporations any terms and conditions it chooses as conditions upon which it will grant permission to enter and transact business within its territory. Some of the attacks upon statutes of this character have been based upon constitutional provisions commanding equal and uniform taxation, or because they were alleged to be a denial of that equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. These objections to laws of this class are held generally to be unfounded. People v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 92 N. Y. 312, 44 Am. Rep. 380; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Welch, 29 Kan. 672; State ex rel. Baldwin v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 115 Ind. 257, 17 N. E. 574; Blackmer v. Royal Ins. Co. 115 Ind. 291, 17 N. E. 580; Home Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 104 Ill. 653; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Durfee, 164 Ill. 186, 45 N. E. 441.

In Alabama, however, such a statute was held unconstitutional for conflicting with the clause in the Constitution of that state making the property of private corporations, associations, and individuals forever taxable at the same rate, and because, also, it was deemed an unwarrantable delegation of the lawmaking power to the legislature of another state. Clark v. Port of Mobile, 67 Ala. 217.

The Illinois supreme court, in Home Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 104 Ill. 653, pronounced this decision unsound.

XI. The conflict in Wisconsin.

The legislature of Wisconsin, April 1, 1854, passed an act requiring all railroad companies and plank-road companies which were or should be organized within the state to pay the state treasurer annually, for the use of the state, a sum equal to 1 per cent of the gross earnings of their respective roads. In that act it was declared that this amount of tax should take the place, and be in full, of all the taxes of every name and kind upon such roads, and the property belonging to such companies, or the stock held by individuals therein, and that it should be unlawful to levy or assess thereupon any other or further assessment or tax for any purpose whatsoever. Ignoring this act, officials in Waukesha county assessed and levied taxes for the year 1854 upon the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company as if no such law existed, and the company sued out an injunction to restrain the collection thereof. Upon demurrer to the bill, the question was raised as to the constitutionality of this statute under the Wisconsin Constitution (art. 8, § 1) declaring that "the rule of taxation shall be uniform, and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe." It was contended that the rule of taxation was not uniform, because the act (1) made a rule for taxing railroad and plank-road property different from the general rule applying to other property,—laid a tax upon income instead of a ratable tax upon value; (2) levied a state tax and gave an exemption from local taxes; and (3) established a new mode of levying taxes. The circuit judge, in overruling the demurrer, said the contentions against the act were founded upon the error of looking to the first part of the pertinent section of the Constitution without regard to the qualifying and controlling effect thereon of the last part authorizing taxes to be levied upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe. "No property," he said, "can be lawfully taxed until the legislature authorizes and requires it to be done; and, of course, no property can be taxed when the legislature prohibits its being done. The legislature is vested with the absolute power of declaring what property throughout the state shall be, and what shall not be, subject to taxation." This decision was affirmed upon review by the supreme court of the state, in a very brief opinion, without extended reasoning. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Waukesha County, 9 Wis. 431, note.

Very soon afterwards, the supreme court was called upon to pronounce upon the validity of another statute discriminating in taxation, and concluded that it was in conflict with the section of the state Constitution just mentioned, and could not stand. That statute was the charter of the city of Janesville of 1854, which, inter alia, provided that the rule of taxation in that city should be uniform, but that in no case should the real or personal property within the territorial limits of the city, and not included in the recorded plat of the village of Janesville or of any addition to said village which might be used, occupied, or reserved for agricultural or horticultural purposes, be subject to an annual tax to defray the current expenses of the city, exceeding $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent, nor for the repair and building of roads and bridges and the support of the poor more than $\frac{1}{2}$ as much ad valorem as should be levied for such purpose on the property within such recorded plats; and it was also provided that farming and gardening lands should not be subject to any other taxes for any city purposes whatever. The general taxing power conferred upon the municipality was to levy annually upon all the taxable property in the city a tax not exceeding 1 per cent for current expenses, and an additional tax so far as necessary for the repair and building of roads and bridges and for the support of the poor. The argument to sustain this law was that, as it fixed a uniform rate without, and another uniform rate within, the recorded plats, thus taxing all the property without alike and all the property within alike, the Constitution was not violated; in other words, that the legislature had the right to classify property in a city according to its use or geographical location or both, and, provided the separate classes were each uniformly taxed, the law was constitutional. Knowlton v. Rock County, 9 Wis. 410 (Judge Cooley's dissent from this decision [Cooley on Taxation, 118, note 3] is approved by Justice Peckham in the Supreme Court of the United States in Foster v. Pryor, 189 U. S. 325, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 549, affirming 11 Okla. 357, 66 Pac. 348).

Upon the authority, however, of the Knowlton Case, when next the railroad and plank-road statute came before the state supreme court, the earlier case was overruled and the statute held unconstitutional. "It is very clear," reasoned the court in reaching this conclusion, "that a rule taxing horses at one rate, cattle at another, and land at a third would not be a uniform rule. The fact that all horses were taxed alike would not make it so, because the mode of taxing horses would be only a part of the rule. That part might be uniform with itself, but the moment a change was made to other property, there the rule changed and the uniformity ceased. By any other construction there might be as many different modes and rates of taxation as there may be classes of property, and yet the rule of taxation be uniform,—a proposition which is a self-evident contradiction." State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Winnebago Lake & F. River Pl. Road Co. 11 Wis. 85.

About this time the court in Weeks v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 248, held that the omission from the city tax list of a large amount of real property, intentionally, pursuant to the express terms of an ordinance so providing, vitiated and rendered void the whole general levy. In that case, and in the case of State ex rel. Reedsburg Bank v. Hastings, 12 Wis. 47, distinguished on the facts, the court cited and approved the Knowlton Case.

The constitutionality of the act of 1854 respecting railroad and plank-road taxation came before the court again soon afterward in Kneeland v. Milwaukee, 15 Wis. 454, wherein, in reliance upon the decision in the Weeks Case, the plaintiff contended that the omission to tax the railroad property in the city rendered the whole levy void; that such omission was intentional because the local assessors obeyed the act of 1854, and that act, as decided in the Winnebago Lake & Fox River Plank-Road Case, was unconstitutional and void, hence no justification whatever. The court below, appalled at the logical consequences of this doctrine, had sought to find a way of escape by holding the omission to assess the railroads was inadvertent and the result of an error or mistake, not of purpose or deliberate, and, therefore, did not vitiate the entire levy, but the supreme court declined to assent to this theory, and at first reversed the judgment. Mr. Justice Cole, who had dissented in the Winnebago Lake & Fox River Plank-Road Case maliciously said that it logically and inevitably followed from that case, the Knowlton Case, and the Weeks Case, that the taxes then before the court were unconstitutional and void. He added: "It is true, I did not concur in the decisions in the two former cases, and my views upon the question there decided remain unchanged; but still, assuming the construction there given to be correct, I see no possible escape from the conclusion stated." The consequences of such a ruling were so startling, and entailed a practical paralysis of governmental functions from inanition, that the court found its position untenable, and was compelled to retreat. It granted a reargument, and affirmed the judgment upon the doctrine of stare decisis. Kneeland v. Milwaukee, 15 Wis. 691.

And, although it still insisted that the old case of Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Waukesha County, 9 Wis. 431, note, was wrongly decided and unsound, upon that doctrine it followed it with respect of the effect of omitting railroad property from the tax rolls when done obediently to the provisions of the act of 1854. Dean v. Gleason, 16 Wis. 1; Bond v. Kenosha, 17 Wis. 284.

But so recently as 1890 the Wisconsin supreme court still held to the doctrine that the deliberate and intentional omission from the tax roll of a piece of taxable property makes the entire levy invalid for that year. It so decided where an assessor neglected to assess a vacant lot owned by a church because he supposed it was exempt. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Outagamie County, 76 Wis. 587, 45 N. W. 536.

The whole subject of the power of the legislature of Wisconsin to classify subjects of taxation, and tax the classes at different rates by diverse methods, and to grant exemptions in view of the Constitution, was opened again in a suit brought by the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company against Taylor county and its officials to restrain the execution of deeds on certificates of sale of its lands for alleged delinquent taxes, upon the ground that such lands were by law exempt. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled in the first instance, and judgment was ordered for the railroad. The lands involved were originally a part of the public domain, and granted by act of Congress to Wisconsin in trust for the aid of railroads, and by the state in turn to the plaintiff's predecessors, and confirmed to the plaintiff. The statutes in point respecting the exemptions were: (1) An exemption of such lands from all taxation whatsoever for ten years, unless sooner sold, in the act of incorporation of, and land grant to, the Winnebago & Lake Superior Railroad Company, of April 6, 1866; (2) a like exemption in the similar act of the same month relating to the Portage & Lake Superior Railroad Company, and (3) an act respecting the plaintiff (Laws 1877, chap. 21) extending the exemption three years, and declaring its object to insure the completion of the road and the advantages thereof, and that the privileges and exemptions were in consideration and on the express condition that the work of construction be renewed and the road completed to Lake Superior in 1877. The constitutionality of these statutes was fully sustained. The court construed the provision of the Constitution in point as having the meaning of, "Taxes shall be levied upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe by a uniform rule." Or, "The rule of taxation shall be uniform upon such property as the legislature shall prescribe." And it concluded, among other conclusions, that the legislature not only has power to prescribe the property to be taxed, but the rule by which it must be taxed, and the only limitation upon that power is that the rule so prescribed shall be uniform. And that the power to prescribe what property shall be taxed necessarily implies the power to prescribe what property shall be exempt. The court took pains to reaffirm, and again install, as an authority resting in sound reason and in principle upon all the points involved, Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Waukesha County, 9 Wis. 431, note, and to distinctly and emphatically overrule State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Winnebago Lake & F. River Pl. Road Co. 11 Wis. 35; and it declared that Kneeland v. Milwaukee, 15 Wis. 454, 691, in going back to the former case reluctantly upon the doctrine of stare decisis, should have gone farther and recognised the decision as right. Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. Taylor County, 52 Wis. 37, 8 N. W. 833.

The opinion of Cassoday, J., in this case is one of learning, and evinces much research. Starting from the basic principle that constitutions are not in the states of the Union grants of power, but restraints on sovereignty, he takes up the clauses respecting equality and uniformity of taxation in other state Constitutions, and shows that these are generally couched in broader and more restrictive language than the similar clause in the Constitution of Wisconsin; and, as this is particularly the case in respect of Ohio, the authority relied upon by Faine, and Dixon, J.J., and the only one (Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 15), to sustain their decision in the now discredited case does not justify their conclusion. But the learned judge went further. In effect, he held that there was absolutely no limit upon the legislative power to classify subjects of taxation, no matter how arbitrary, artificial, and unreasonable might be the classification adopted. He was, therefore, for overruling Knowlton v. Rock County, 9 Wis. 410, the Janesville classification case. He insisted that the act involved in that case was a valid exercise of the taxing power. His colleague, Orton, J., dissented from this doctrine, and asserted that the Constitution required taxation to be uniform in a broad sense; that, if a certain class of property is made taxable at all, it must not only be taxed at a uniform rate, but that all of it must be taxed at such rate without partiality or discrimination. "Any other construction," he said, of the constitutional provision, "would emasculate it of all of its force and effect; and, as a restriction upon the legislative power, it was not worthy of adoption, and is not worth preserving." Ibid.

It is worth while noting that Judge Casso day's view that the Janesville city taxing act was valid finds support in a decision rendered several years afterwards by the Maryland court of appeals, which held it competent for the legislature of Maryland, notwithstanding art. 15 of the Bill of Rights of that state provided that every person, or person holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of public taxes for the support of the government according to his actual worth in real and personal property, upon enlarging the boundaries of the city of Baltimore to make the added territory a special taxing district distinct from the old city, and to exempt, for a limited time, the property situated therein from the ordinary municipal taxes assessed in the old city, and continue for such time the taxation thereof at its former and lower rate. Daly v. Morgan, 69 Md. 467, 1 L. R. A. 757, 16 Atl. 287.

XII. Commutations and exemptions.

Whether or not a legislature of a state whose Constitution contains an equality and uniformity of taxation clause can enact special laws granting the privilege of commuting taxes or exempting certain subjects from taxation, and, if so, what are the limits upon its power in either particular; and again, the power being admitted, whether or not, when it has been exercised, a given tax, or a tax upon a given subject, is valid or invalid,—are all questions dependent upon such a variety of circumstances for answers that no general principle of universal application can be formulated. There are cases in point upon opposite sides of each of these questions, but they are not necessarily conflicting because of essential differences in the factors of the problems whose solutions were essayed in the respective litigations.

Land owned by a railroad outside of its right of way, and not used in the course of its operations as a common carrier, but which were granted it by the government to aid in its construction, and which have actually contributed to the building of it by securing some of the funds raised for that purpose, although they are, and always have been, held for sale, and not for use, are not merely property owned by a railroad like unto real estate owned by individuals, but are railroad property in the same sense as are rights of way, stations, etc.; and, hence, the competency of the legislature to include them in classifying railroads for taxation by exacting a percentage of gross earnings in lieu of all other taxes and assessments is beyond question, notwithstanding a provision in the organic law that no discrimination shall be made in taxing different kinds of property, but that all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to the value of the property taxed. McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 42 L. ed. 614, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242.

Notwithstanding a general constitutional requirement that the legislature shall provide for the levying of a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property, to be ascertained by some person or persons to be elected or appointed in such manner as the legislature shall direct, and not otherwise, when the fundamental law also authorizes the taxation of occupations, toll bridges, ferries, and persons using and exercising franchises and privileges in such manner as the legislature shall from time to time direct; and also the taxation of other objects and subjects in such manner as may be consistent with the principles of taxation fixed in such Constitution,—the legislature has the power to commute by statute the taxes to be paid by a railroad company by providing in its charter for the annual payment of a gross sum, ascertained by a fixed rule of computation. Illinois C. R. Co. v. McLean County, 17 Ill. 291.

A territorial statute taxing the gross earnings of railroads in lieu of all other taxation does not conflict with a provision in the organic law that all taxes shall be equal and uniform, and no distinction shall be made in the assessments between different kinds of property, but these shall be ad valorem. Such a statute prescribes no rule of taxation, and the right of the legislature to exempt the property of any person or corporation is undoubted. Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Chilberg, 6 Wash. 612, 84 Pac. 163.

A statute for the taxation of banks, whose purpose is to impose a tax measured by the entire assets in lieu of all other taxes, is constitutional, and all banks which pay in accordance with its requirements secure immunity from other taxes. Vicksburg Bank v. Worrell, 67 Miss. 47, 7 So. 219; Bank of Oxford v. Oxford, 70 Miss. 504, 12 So. 203.

Notwithstanding a provision in the state Constitution requiring taxation to be equal and uniform, it is competent for the legislature, in chartering a corporation, to exempt it from payment of all licenses and taxes whatever in consideration of the payment annually to the state treasury of a substantial sum for the benefit of the public-school fund. Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. New Orleans, 24 La. Ann. 86.

The legislature has power to exempt property from taxation on account of its use, when such exemption is based upon a substantial classification, as, for instance, property used for religious, benevolent, and educational purposes, without violation of a constitutional requirement that all property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578.

The Maryland Declaration of Rights that every person in the state, or holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of public taxes for the support of the government according to his actual worth in real and personal property, and which all agree necessarily implies equality of taxation on all taxable property, and which has been a part of every Constitution adopted in that state,—has always been held to be no restraint upon the legislature in exempting from taxation such property as, in its judgment, a sound policy might require. Daly v. Morgan, 69 Md. 467, 1 L. R. A. 757, 16 Atl. 287.

Simpson v. Hopkins, 82 Md. 478, 38 Atl. 714, affirming the constitutionality of a statute exempting from the tax imposed upon corporate debts secured by mortgages shares of homestead and building and loan associations represented by mortgages, is to the same effect.

A city ordinance requiring the agents of every insurance company, whether foreign or domestic, in the city, to take out a license and give a bond to render an account of and pay a percentage on the premiums received as a license tax, but not exceeding $100, under penalty of recurring fines for each day's neglect to comply; but which contains an express exemption from its provisions of a particular company in consideration of its continuing to pay, as in the past it had paid, an annual sum, exceeding $100, to the local fire department,—is not rendered invalid by such exemption and exception, when the statute empowering the city to require licenses of insurance companies and their agents generally, not exceeding $100 in amount annually, does not authorize exemptions of any kind, and the state Constitution enjoins equality and uniformity in taxation; for the reason that the excepted company actually pays more. Com. v. Milton, 12 B. Mon. 212, 54 Am. Dec. 522.

A constitutional provision that all lands liable to taxation, held by deed, or entry, town lots, bank stock, etc., and such other property as the legislature may from time to time deem expedient, shall be taxable, does not deprive the legislature of power to stipulate for total or partial exemptions from taxation in corporate charters, although there is, beside, a constitutional restriction upon the legislative power to grant special privileges, immunities, and exemptions, with a proviso that it shall not affect the granting of such corporate charters as may be deemed expedient for the public good. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Hicks, 9 Baxt. 442.

The Tennessee legislature is declared, in State v. Butler, 13 Lea, 400, to have had power, under the Constitution of 1834, to grant corporations it created either partial or total immunity from taxation for any length of time it might deem proper; and that this had been held by the uniform current of decisions in that state, and also of the Supreme Court of the United States. Freeman, J., however, dissented upon the ground that the constitutional command that all property be taxed, and the uniformity and equality clauses, had shorn the legislature of power to grant the exemption claimed in that case.

The exception in the Wyoming statute of a merchant's goods brought within that jurisdiction to fill up his stock in trade, from taxation, along with other personal property brought in after the regular assessment has been made, is not an unlawful discrimination in taxation forbidden by the organic law. Frontier Land & Cattle Co. v. Baldwin, 8 Wyo. 784, 31 Pac. 403.

The uniformity and equality provisions of the Minnesota Constitution have not operated to prevent the legislature of that state from modifying the terms of laws for the payment of a percentage of the gross earnings of railroads in lieu of other taxation in cases where that mode of taxing railroads had been established prior to the adoption of such constitutional provisions. First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Patcher, 14 Minn. 297, Gil. 224; State v. Wilnons & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 315; St. Paul v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 469; Stevens County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 36 Minn. 467, 31 N. W. 942.

There is quite as long a line of authorities holding commutation or exemption acts unconstitutional.

A statute imposing a tax upon savings banks, gauged by the amount of their deposits, with certain deductions, because of the business they do or the franchisees they enjoy, and not upon the property they own, in so far and to the extent that it is declared to be in lieu of all other taxes, thereby exempting property which, if held by others, would be taxable, conflicts with a constitutional provision commanding property to be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules ad valorem. This is chiefly because the exemption does not run to an entire class. State, Trenton Sav. Fund Soc., Prosecutor, v. Richards, 52 N. J. L. 156, 18 Atl. 582.

When a Constitution requires equality and uniformity of taxation, and specifies only certain kinds of property,—governmental, educational, charitable, religious, etc.,—that may be exempted, a municipality has no power to contract for commutation of taxes upon property not embraced among the kinds that it is permissible to exempt. New Orleans v. New Orleans Sugar Shed Co. 35 La. Ann. 548.

The Georgia statute taxing building associations a particular way, and providing that these shall be in lieu of other taxation, are held to be beyond the legislative power because of the constitutional requirements that all property be taxed ad valorem and uniformly. Georgia State Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Savannah, 109 Ga. 63, 35 S. E. 67; Atlanta Nat. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Stewart, 109 Ga. 80, 35 S. E. 73.

A general statute authorizing such railroads as accept the terms of the act to pay 1½ per cent of their gross earnings in lieu of all taxation upon their property for a period of ten years, no matter how much public needs may require increased taxation of other property, is void for repugnancy to a constitutional provision requiring all property to be taxed ad valorem, and taxation to be equal and uniform throughout the state. Ellis v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 8 Baxt. 530.

A statute enacting that every foreign insurance company, other than life, shall, at a stated time, pay to the insurance superintendent as taxes 2 per cent of the gross amount of premiums received by it for business done in the state during the preceding year, such payment to be a condition precedent for the privilege of doing business in the state, and a license certificate to issue therefor, and the taxes thus imposed to be in full of all taxation, state and local, except that of real estate and reciprocal taxes required by law; with a proviso that, where fire insurance companies pay to cities and villages with organized fire departments a tax of 2 per cent or less upon their premium receipts in such cities and villages, the sums so paid shall be deducted,—violates the Illinois Constitution, and confers upon a company complying with it no immunity from municipal taxes duly assessed under prior statutes. Raymond v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 196 Ill. 329, 63 N. E. 745.

The Michigan statute (Pub. Acts 1881, No. 168) taxing telephone and telegraph lines upon assessments by a state board according to the average rate, state and local, throughout the state, of the previous year, in lieu of all other taxes, imposes a tax upon property, not an excise upon business, privilege, or occupation,—an ad valorem, not a specific, tax. The Michigan Constitution, in providing for a uniform rule of taxation except on property paying specific taxes, and that all assessments shall be upon property at its cash value, requires uniformity of taxation in a tax of the character imposed by such statute. And, inasmuch as such statute does not comply with this requirement, because, although the property is taxed upon a cash valuation, the rate is determined in a different way and the tax differs in amount from taxes imposed upon other property, it is unconstitutional and void. Pingree v. Auditor General, 120 Mich. 95, sub nom. Pingree v. Dix, 44 L. R. A. 679, 78 N. W. 1025.

While, under the Minnesota Constitution, requiring equal and uniform taxation on all property at a cash valuation, and the passage of laws taxing all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise, also all real, and personal property ad valorem, the method of securing these results is left to the legislature, which is at liberty to take any special class out of the operation of the general tax laws of the state,—the method adopted must secure substantial equality of taxation of all the property in the class thus selected; and the legislature cannot, directly or indirectly, exempt from taxation of any property which the Constitution does not in terms permit to be exempted. An act, therefore, of special application to building and loan associations, exempting their personal property upon the theory of a substituted tax upon the shares, but which does not subject to taxation shares held by nonresidents, and expressly forbids taxing those upon which loans or advances have been made, is unconstitutional. State v. Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. 63 Minn. 80, 65 N. W. 138.

A municipal ordinance wherein a city agrees with a water company to pay all municipal taxes assessed against its property as a return for a certain supply of water for city purposes is void for repugnancy to the constitutional provisions requiring equality of taxation upon property having a cash valuation, and all taxation of real and personal property according to its money value. Little Falls Electric & Water Co. v. Little Falls, 74 Minn. 197, 77 N. W. 40.

Under a Constitution providing that all taxes to be raised in the state shall be as nearly equal as may be, and that all taxable property shall have a cash valuation and be equalized and uniform throughout the state, a statute providing that all domestic mining corporations mining in the state may pay into the state treasury annually, in lieu of all taxes and assessments upon their capital stock, real and personal property connected with, set apart or used for, the mining business,—a specific tax per ton of ore mined, shipped, and disposed of is void. State v. Lakeside Land Co. 71 Minn. 283, 73 N. W. 970. The court said in this case: "It would be difficult to conceive of a system of taxation more obnoxious to the Constitution."

When a Constitution declares that all property subject to taxation ought to be taxed in proportion to its value, and that no property, real or personal, shall be exempt unless used for public schools or Federal, state, or local governmental purposes, a statute relating to life insurance companies, providing for the payment by them of certain state fees for the support of the state insurance department in lieu of all taxes, fees, and licenses whatsoever collected for the benefit of the state, and all other fees and taxes except upon paid-up capital stock, is, in so far as it attempts to exempt such companies from taxation upon their assets, void for want of competency in the legislature to grant the immunity. The legislature has no power to impose a commutation tax as a substitute for general and ordinary taxation upon property. Life Asso. of America v. St. Louis County, 49 Mo. 512.

The circuit court of the United States for North Dakota held, in Northern P. R. Co. v. Walker, 47 Fed. 681, that a territorial act providing that, in lieu of all taxes upon any railroad or the equipment, appurtenances, or appendages thereof, or upon other property in the territory belonging to a corporation owning or operating a railroad, there should be paid annually a percentage tax on the gross earnings arising from the operation of the road,—was void for conflicting with the organic act forbidding the legislature to pass any law impairing rights of private property, or to make any discrimination in taxing different kinds of property, and requiring all property subject to taxation to be taxed ad valorem, to the extent that it exempted from taxation railroad lands not essential to the franchise of a common carrier, but held merely for sale. It was further of the opinion that such statute was void under the provisions of the 14th Amendment for denying the equal protection of the laws because it was not in the legislative power to classify the same property according to ownership, and exempt it when it belonged to a railroad, and tax it when it did not. The bill was, however, dismissed for want of equity in that it did not show payment or tender of the gross earnings percentage tax. The bill was against a dozen counties, and was objected to as multifarious; but the court held this objection not well taken, as the bill proceeded upon a common ground for a common relief. Upon certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States, that tribunal held that, forasmuch as it did not appear by the record in the case that any or all of the twelve counties sued claimed as much as $2,000 of taxes, the jurisdiction of the Federal courts was not apparent; but, as this defect was curable by amendment, it reversed and remanded the case instead of dismissing the bill. Northern P. R. Co. v. Walker, 148 U. S. 391, 37 L. ed. 494, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 650.

The decision of the circuit court is now to be regarded as overruled by McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 42 L. ed. 614, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242.

The uniformity and equality of taxation provisions of the Oregon Constitution (art. 1, § 32; art. 9, § 1) absolutely deprive the legislature of power to exempt, directly or indirectly, by contract, commutation, or otherwise, any property whatever, except the specifically enumerated classes, from bearing a just proportion of the burdens of the government. Hence, a section of a railroad charter commuting the corporate taxes for twenty years in consideration of the free carriage of state troops and munitions of war is void. Hogg v. Mackay, 23 Or. 339, 19 L. R. A. 77, 31 Pac. 779.

The equality and uniformity provisions of the Arkansas Constitution render void so much of a statute for the assessment and taxation of railroads as directs the omission from the real and personal property to be valued, of embankments, tunnels, cuts, ties, trestles, or bridges, these not being enumerated among the property which such Constitution permits to be exempted. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Worthen, 120 U. S. 97, 30 L. ed. 588, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469.

The Ohio Constitution, requiring the general assembly to provide by law for taxing the notes and bills discounted or purchased, money loaned, and all other property, effects, or dues of every description, without deduction, of all banks and bankers, so that all property employed in banking shall always bear a burden of taxation equal to that imposed on the property of individuals, is violated by a statute for taxing unincorporated banks and bankers, under which they are to be assessed by deducting from the total average amounts of their collectible notes accounts and bills receivable discounted or purchased in the course of business, cash and cash items in possession or transit, and all stocks, bonds, and evidences of debt held as an investment, or representing assets, with the assessed value of the real estate, the average amount of all deposits and other accounts payable and of United States and other exempt securities, and then adding to the remainder the true value in money of all furniture and other nonenumerated property. But such statute is not wholly void, but only to the extent and in so far as it allows the deduction from the average amount of cash or cash items of the average deposits and other accounts payable. Fayette County Treasurer v. People's & Drovers' Bank, 47 Ohio St. 503, 10 L. R. A. 196, 25 N. E. 697.

An act declaring that, inasmuch as all money paid to building and loan associations is at once loaned out and invested in taxable property, and the shares of stock in such associations and notes given on such loans being simply evidences as to where such money has been placed, therefore, such stock and notes shall not be subject to taxation,—is so in conflict with the uniformity and equality of taxation provisions, and the prohibitions against exemptions and commutations, of the Constitution of Illinois that it cannot stand. People's Loan & Homestead Asso. v. Keith, 153 Ill. 609, 28 L. R. A. 65, 39 N. E. 1072.

A statute discharging a railroad corporation, in consideration of the payment of a gross earnings tax, from the payment of municipal taxes theretofore lawfully levied upon its road-bed, track, right of way, necessary buildings and rolling stock, contravenes a constitutional provision subjecting the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit to taxation the same as that of individuals. Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 56.

A statute authorizing the levy in a township of taxes only upon the property of citizens therein, thereby exempting, or leaving untaxed, the property therein belonging to others not citizens,—nonresidents and corporations,—is unconstitutional for violating the equality and uniformity rule of taxation. Marion & McP. R. Co. v. Champlin, 37 Kan. 682, 16 Pac. 222; Manhattan, A. & B. R. Co. v. Burgoyne, 37 Kan. 685, 16 Pac. 223.

The decisions of the supreme court of Mississippi in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40, and Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Lambert, 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33, holding that the provisions of the Constitution of that state, that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit should be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, and that taxation should be equal and uniform throughout the state, and all property be taxed ad valorem, permitted the legislature to grant corporate exemptions, though not to make them irrevocable; that is, that corporate property should ever be subject to taxation, but not necessarily always subjected thereto,—were explicitly overruled afterwards, and the contrary decided in the subsequent litigations with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company. Adams v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 77 Miss. 194, 24 So. 200, 317, 28 So. 956, Affirmed in 180 U. S. 1, 45 L. ed. 395, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240.

A constitutional provision requiring taxation to be equal and uniform, and expressly authorizing the legislature to exempt from taxation property actually used for church, school, or charitable purposes, impliedly inhibits the legislature from exempting any other property. New Orleans v. People's Ins. Co. 27 La. Ann. 519.

A constitutional provision for equal and uniform taxation applies to municipal as well as state taxes; and a municipal ordinance exempting property is void. Austin v. Austin Gas-light & Coal Co. 69 Tex. 180, 7 S. W. 200.

XIII. Double taxation.

If a statute imposes the same tax more than once upon the same subject and taxpayer, it is obviously unequal and multifarious. In states whose Constitutions prescribe equality and uniformity of taxation such a statute must ever be held unconstitutional. But the courts cannot hold a taxing statute invalid merely because it imposes double taxation, when there is no constitutional restraint upon the legislature, although, when a statute is couched in such terms that a judicial construction will avoid such a result, the courts will so construe it. New Haven Toll-Bridge Co. v. Osborn, 35 Conn. 7.

Unless the Constitution forbids it, double taxation does not invalidate a tax. Pacific Nat. Bank v. Pierce County, 20 Wash. 675, 56 Pac. 936.

Double taxation may be oppressive, unequal, and unjust, but it is not necessarily unconstitutional. State, Fish, Prosecutor, v. Branin, 28 N. J. L. 484.

In New York, where the Constitution does not command equal and uniform taxation, it has been well said: The rule against double taxation is a rule of legislation, not of law. It is a question of expediency, not of power. And, while the court will not infer an intention to impose a double tax, but, rather, will construe a statute otherwise where that can be done without forcing, still the power of the legislature is undoubted. People ex rel. New York C. & H. 60 L. R. A.

R. R. Co. v. Roberts, 32 App. Div. 113, 52 N. Y. Supp. 859.

Justice requires that the burdens of government shall, so far as practicable, says Chief Justice Waite, be laid equally on all; and, if property is taxed once in one way, it would ordinarily be wrong to tax it again in another way when the burden of both taxes falls on the same person. Sometimes tax laws have that effect; but, if they do, it is because the legislature has unmistakably so enacted. All presumptions are against such an imposition. Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

In People v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. 51 Cal. 243, 21 Am. Rep. 704, taxes upon mortgages were held invalid because they imposed a double burden upon the owners of the property mortgaged, and so conflicted with the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity. Although the Constitution, as well, provided that all property be taxed, the court held that debts were not property within the meaning of this provision. By taxing the debtor and the creditor too, the one property pledged for the debt was twice taxed in the view of the court, and this was not proportional taxation. The earlier cases, of People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432, and People v. Eddy, 43 Cal. 336, 13 Am. Rep. 143, holding credits were property for the purposes of taxation, were overruled. One member of the court, Rhodes, J., dissented, but the grounds of his dissent do not appear in the report. The case is against the weight of authority in holding a tax upon a credit in the hands of the creditor secured by pledge of his debtor's property, when the debtor is also taxed upon that property, is duplicate taxation.

Double taxation of bank and corporate properties has been held in Ohio violative of the constitutional provision that corporate property be taxed like that of individuals. Cleveland Trust Co. v. Lander, 62 Ohio St. 266, 56 N. E. 1036.

In the cases of alleged duplicate taxation there is always the preliminary question: Is the tax now disputed really double? Of course, if it is not; if it rests upon different subjects although the same taxpayer must pay it; or, if it rests upon different taxpayers although a burden upon the same property; or, if it is laid by different governments,—then, it does not violate the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity of taxation. The courts in general have found reasons for answering this question in the negative.

Taxation is not double unless it bears upon the same property within the same jurisdiction. Bradley v. Bauder (Ohio) 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 774.

It is not double taxation for a state in which it is doing business to tax a foreign corporation upon the same subjects that it is taxed upon in its home state. Com. v. Central Petroleum Co. 1 Pearson (Pa.) 386.

It is not double taxation when the same property is taxed for the same year in two different states or taxing jurisdictions, where each has a right to lay taxes thereon. Grigsby Constr. Co. v. Freeman, 106 La. 435, 58 L. R. A. 349, 32 So. 399.

Each taxing jurisdiction may decide for itself how to lay its taxes; and the fact that the same property is subjected to taxation in two jurisdictions does not make either tax illegal. Prairie Cattle Co. v. Williamson, 5 Okla. 483, 49 Pac. 937.

Funds belonging to a corporation that owns a bridge between two states, and that has been chartered by both, set aside from its profits to provide for reconstruction and repairs, are taxable in the state where they are deposited and where the corporation's toll office is situated.

although the dividends on its stocks are also taxed for the same purpose, and the corporation is also subjected to taxation in the other state as well. Boston Bridge v. County, 9 Pa. 415.

It is the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of several of the states, that the capital stock of a corporation, and the shares into which that capital stock is divided and held by its stockholders, are separate subjects of taxation, and that both may be taxed without resulting duplicity. Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall. 573, sub nom. Churchill v. Utica, 18 L. ed. 229; New York v. New York City & County Tax & A. Comrs. 4 Wall. 244, 18 L. ed. 344; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. In those jurisdictions, therefore, the subject of capital stock of corporations, and of shares of stock of their stockholders, to the same tax are held not repugnant, either to the uniformity and equality of taxation clauses in the state Constitutions, or to so much of the 14th Amendment as forbids a state to deny the equal protection of the laws to any person within its jurisdiction.

In other states taxation of this character is held to be double, and not allowable. Stroh v. Detroit (Mich.) 9 Det. L. N. 228, 90 N. W. 1029; State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 37 Mo. 268; State v. Simmons, 70 Miss. 485, 12 So. 477; Louisville & E. Mail Co. v. Barbour, 85 Ky. 73, 9 S. W. 516; Whitaker v. Brooks, 90 Ky. 68, 13 S. W. 355; *Gillespie v. But these cases have not all involved a constitutional question. The doctrine of the earlier cases in Pennsylvania, and as late as 1882, when Com. v. Standard Oil Co. 101 Pa. 119, was decided, was that the capital stock of a corporation, and the shares of stock belonging to its stockholders, were separate subjects of taxation; but the decisions since have been that, when a corporation is taxed upon its capital stock, its stockholders are not to be taxed upon their shares, and vice versa. Com. v. Pennsylvania Co. for Ins. on Lives & G. A. 137 Pa. 411, 15 Atl. 456; Com. v. Fall Brook Coal Co. 60 L. R. A.

156 Pa. 488, 26 Atl. 1071; Com. v. United Gas Improv. Co. 162 Pa. 602, 29 Atl. 667; Com. v. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. 162 Pa. 608, 29 Atl. 664; Com. v. American Waterworks & Guarantee Co. 8 Pa. Dist. R. 268; Com. v. Provident Life & T. Co. 9 Pa. Dist. R. 479.

There is also a diversity of opinion as to whether the capital stock of a corporation, and the aggregate of its property and assets in which its capital has been invested, constitute separate subjects of taxation that may both be taxed without duplicate taxation resulting.

In some jurisdictions the prevailing view has been that they do not. Bank of Commerce v. McGowan, 6 Lea, 705; Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645; Hyland v. Brasil Block Coal Co. 128 Ind. 335, 26 N. E. 672; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 80 Mo. 550; State v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 203; Lewiston Water & P. Co. v. Asotin County, 24 Wash. 371, 64 Pac. 544; State v. Simmons, 70 Miss. 485, 12 So. 477.

But elsewhere it is thought that they do. Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Hewitt, 112 Ala. 546, 20 So. 926; Com. v. New England Slate & Tile Co. 13 Allen, 391; Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. v. People, 161 Ill. 101, 43 N. E. 779.

It is generally admitted that a corporation may be subjected at one and the same time to privilege or license taxes and to taxes upon its property ad valorem, without being thereby doubly taxed. Owensboro Nat. Bank v. Owensboro, 178 U. S. 664, 43 L. ed. 850, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537; Southern Gum Co. v. Laylin, 66 Ohio St. 578, 64 N. E. 564; Cobb v. Durham County, 122 N. C. 307, 30 S. E. 338; Carbon Iron Co. v. Carbon County, 39 Pa. 251; Troy Fertilizer Co. v. State, 184 Ala. 333, 82 So. 618.

It is not unconstitutional to tax a manufacturing corporation engaged in vending its products upon both its stock in trade as property and its sales as business. Keystone Bridge Co. v. Pittsburgh (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 153.

A foreign insurance corporation subjected to a municipal tax on its net premium receipts in the city at the rate imposed on property therein, and also to an annual license tax of a percentage of its gross premiums, is not doubly taxed. One tax is on the privilege of doing business, and the other on the property invested in such business. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364; St. Joseph v. Ernst, 95 Mo. 360, 8 S. W. 538.

And an insurance company may be taxed certain fees to support a state insurance department, and upon its capital stock for local purposes the same as other property in the same locality, and also upon its loans, securities, and bonds. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. St. Louis County, 56 Mo. 503.

And, as an insurance company and its agent are different personalities, and the business of one is to write risks and settle losses, while that of the other is to solicit insurance and collect premiums, it is not double taxation to require licenses from both such a company and its agent. Farmington v. Rutherford (Mo. App.) 68 S. W. 83.

To the same effect is Memphis v. Carrington, 91 Tenn. 511, 19 S. W. 673.

But it is double taxation to lay a tax upon both the gross premiums of an insurance company and its net earnings. Com. v. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. 1 Dauphin Co. Rep. 233.

Double taxation of railroads operating interstate lines, asserted to result under a tax law because it provides that the railroad track and rolling stock shall be listed and taxed in the several counties, the one in proportion that the length of the main track in each county bears to the whole length of the road within the state, and the other in proportion that the main track used in such counties bears to the entire length of the road, for the alleged reason that the assessing board may, and in effect does, import to the rolling stock and railroad track values belonging wholly to the corporate property in other states,—does not take place, because the value of railroad track and rolling stock in an operating railroad depends to a great extent upon their relations as parts of a whole system, and not as separate isolated things. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 38 N. E. 421, Affirmed in 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Intern. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122.

But when, by specific acts of the legislature, a foreign railroad corporation is authorized to construct a part of its line within the state, and granted other privileges for which it is to pay a special annual tax of $10,000, together with such further rate of taxation of its stock to an amount equal to the cost of constructing that piece of road that similar property is subjected to in the state, it is not liable to state and county taxes, imposed under general laws upon property included in the cost of construction, and built and used for railroad purposes, without an express statute subjecting it thereto; because it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to impose double taxation. New York & E. R. Co. v. Sabin, 26 Pa. 242.

It is not double taxation to tax tolls paid to a railroad company as rentals, by another railroad leasing and operating the line, although the latter corporation has been taxed upon its receipts for transportation upon the leased line. Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 145 Pa. 38, 22 Atl. 212.

Nor is it double taxation to tax a railroad upon embankments, tracks, and other works for railroad purposes, constructed on the land of another, and at the same time tax the owner of the fee of said land ad valorem. State, Hoboken R. Warehouse & S. S. Connecting Co., Prosecutor, v. State Board, 62 N. J. L. 561, 41 Atl. 728.

And without double taxation a municipality may impose upon a railroad operating within its limits a license or occupation tax for each of two main lines of railroad which it so operates. Anniston v. Southern R. Co. 112 Ala. 557, 20 So. 915.

A statute subjecting every express company, incorporated or unincorporated, doing business in the state, to the payment of a state tax upon each dollar of its gross receipts from express business done wholly within the state, does not impose double taxation simply by allowing no deduction for such part of the receipts as in current operation is paid out immediately to other corporations, common carriers, for express matter carried, when such carriers are by the same act in turn taxed upon their gross receipts inclusive of such payments. Com. v. United States Exp. Co. 157 Pa. 579, 27 Atl. 396, Affirming 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 225.

Under statutes that apply to private corporations, and impose a tax upon dividends earned or declared and undivided, and another tax upon the annual incomes, gains, or profits of every resident of the state, a corporation is liable to taxation upon its income, gains, or profits during the year preceding the assessment, and also upon the undistributed dividend fund on hand at the beginning of such year. This is not double taxation, because one tax is upon income and the other upon property accumulated from income. If corporate profits are divided among the stockholders, the accumulation does not exist to be taxed as such, but has been converted into income of the stockholders; and, in that case, both recipients, first the corporation, and next its shareholders, are taxable upon such income, but not both for the same year. Montgomery County Bd. of Revenue v. Montgomery Gaslight Co. 64 Ala. 269.

To tax a bank upon its real estate, and its stockholders upon its capital and surplus, is not double taxation; nor is it unequal and multi-form because banks that own no real estate are not subject to such a tax. Second Ward Sav. Bank v. Milwaukee, 94 Wis. 587, 69 N. W. 359.

The payment of an illegal state tax will not extinguish liability for a legal local tax upon the same subject upon the ground that the levy of the latter under the circumstances amounts to a double taxation. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. People, 136 Ill. 660, 27 N. E. 200.

Although New York has erected no constitutional safeguard against double taxation, its jurists condemn the imposition of it. In a recent case Earl, Ch. J., of the court of appeals, in discussing the taxability of banks and their depositors upon deposits, says: "The Revised Statutes neither exempted the bank nor the depositors therein. But there could not be double taxation. If that had been attempted, some way would have been found to defeat it, as that would be against public policy, the purpose of the laws, and natural justice. While the legislature may constitutionally impose double taxation, its purpose to do so can never be inferred, but must plainly appear. The bank is in some sense a trustee of the depositors, and takes their money and invests it, and pays them the net interest which it earns; and it cannot be supposed that there is any system of laws under which taxation can at the same time be imposed upon a trustee and the beneficiary in respect of the same property." People ex rel. Savings Bank v. Coleman, 135 N. Y. 231, 31 N. E. 1022.

XIV. Assessments at full value when valuations generally are less.

It is true in a sense that a taxpayer whose property is assessed for taxation at no more than it is fairly worth suffers no wrong. Yet, if his neighbors are habitually and continually assessed upon their property at less than it is worth, it is plain that he pays more than his proportion of taxes, and that the rule of equality and uniformity of taxation is violated. There are cases holding that such a taxpayer cannot be relieved from a tax imposed under such circumstances, and there are other cases wherein, under such circumstances, the tax laid upon him has been held invalid. Notwithstanding the conflict of opinion disclosed in the decisions, it is confidently thought that one general principle can be formulated that will usually prove controlling when a new case of this character arises. That principle is this: That whenever it can be established indisputably by competent and sufficient evidence that a given assessment upon an aggrieved taxpayer's property has been laid upon a distinctly higher valuation than the assessments in the same jurisdiction upon the property of taxpayers in general, and that this discrimination was intentional and pursuant to a well-recognized and persistent practice of the assessors, the courts will intervene to reduce or annul the tax to the extent necessary to place the complaining taxpayer upon a plane of equality with others in his class, even though the subject of his tax has not been valued beyond its actual worth. That is to say, relief will depend upon the proof of discrimination in practically all cases.

Whatever may be the remedy, if there be any, says the Massachusetts supreme court, when it is shown that the assessors have intentionally assessed the property of part or all of the inhabitants at less than its fair cash value, we are of the opinion that, in a petition for the abatement of taxes on the ground of overvaluation of the property of the petitioner and the disproportionate taxation arising from such overvaluation, the question is whether the property has been valued at more than its fair cash value, and not whether it has been valued relatively more or less than similar property of other persons. Lowell v. Middlesex County, 152 Mass. 875, 9 L. R. A. 856, 25 N. E. 469.

Considered by itself, this decision goes no farther than to say that, in the proceeding there undertaken, the scope of the inquiry and measure of relief were limited to cases within the strict letter of the pertinent statute.

In Kentucky, however, the courts go farther. A tax upon a railroad in that state is not rendered invalid under a constitutional provision for uniform and equal taxation by evidence showing that other railroads which have been assessed at the same amount per mile are worth more than is this particular railroad, without proof that the complaining road is worth less than it has been assessed. This, it is said, may afford reason for increasing the assessments of other roads, but none for reducing that of the complaining one. Evansville, H. & N. R. Co. v. Com. 9 Bush, 438.

A corporation, assessed a franchise tax by a state board upon its capital stock at the full value thereof, less the assessed value of all its tangible property, cannot escape liability by showing that the local assessors value individual property at only two thirds of its real worth; the Constitution and laws of the state providing that all property be assessed at its fair cash value, and that the property of corporations be rated no higher than that of individuals. Paducah Street R. Co. v. McCracken County, 105 Ky. 472, 49 S. W. 178.

By a statute passed in 1891 Missouri required shares of bank stock, bank reserves, undivided profits, etc., to be treated, for the purposes of taxation, as so much money, less the taxable value of the real estate and fixtures, and subject to the right of parties in interest to show the impairment of shares before the board of equalization. In a contest over a tax on bank stock assessed under this statute, it was insisted by the stockholder that, inasmuch as the taxable value of the real estate and fixtures of his bank had been fixed by the board of equalization at only 40 per cent of their real value, while his shares were assessed at their face value, he was in fact taxed on such shares one and one half times greater than he ought to have been, and that a statute which authorized such a result was unconstitutional for violating the mandate that all taxable property be taxed ad valorem. Falling back upon the conceded propositions that perfect equality of taxation cannot be attained, and much, therefore, must be left to the legislative discretion as to methods of ascertaining and equalizing assessable values, and that only gross inequality warrants the nullification of a statute for conflict with the organic law, the supreme court of the state held the act sub judice constitutional, because it was said to fix upon bank stock only a prima facie value subject to the right of stockholders to show it was too high, and because, as respected other property, the equalization board had power to raise or lower assessments. Ward v. Gentry County Bd. of Equalization, 135 Mo. 309, 36 S. W. 648.

While it is quite true in New Hampshire that a taxpayer unduly taxed by the overvaluation of his property in comparison with that of others in his class and district by the intentional acts of the assessors is entitled to relief against the inequality and disproportionate burden, yet it is not sufficient to procure an abatement of his tax to show that some kinds and classes of his possessions were thus overvalued, if it also appears that others were correspondingly undervalued, so that on the whole his taxes are no more than he should bear upon his whole taxable estate; since in that case he is not aggrieved. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Manchester, 70 N. H. 200, 46 Atl. 470. The court said: It is, in fact, conceded by the plaintiffs that the constitutional rule of equality requires a proportional and equal valuation of the different kinds of taxable property. It is also true, as claimed in the plaintiffs' brief, that "it is equally elementary that the law requires all property to be appraised at its true value. Yet, if A's estate is appraised at that value, and all other property in the town of X at 50 per cent of that value, A is entitled to a reduction of his valuation from the legal to the illegal rate." The reason is that in no other convenient way can A's tax on the property owned by him be made proportional to that paid by his neighbors, for the remedy of a reassessment of the whole tax upon all taxable property in the town upon a legal appraisal at its true value would be inconvenient and impossible of execution. But it does not follow, where A's property is appraised proportionately upon the whole with that of other taxpayers, that, if the selectmen have appraised one class of property for which A is taxed to other taxpayers at a lower rate, A is entitled to a reduction on that class to the same illegal rate, and thereby to have his assessment of the common burden reduced below his share, and the shares of owners of other property increased. Ibid.

The supreme court of Nebraska has declared that it is a cardinal rule of taxation, prescribed by the Constitution of that state, that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property and franchises. And this rule of uniformity applies, not only to the rate of taxation, but as well to the valuation of property for the purpose of raising revenue. The Constitution forbids any discrimination whatever among taxpayers. Thus, if the property of one citizen is valued for taxation at one fourth its value, others within the taxing district have the right to demand that their property be assessed on the same basis. State ex rel. Young v. Osborn, 60 Neb. 415, 83 N. W. 357.

Such a Constitution commands not merely uniformity of taxation, but uniformity in the rate of taxation as well; and it is not within the province of the legislature to evade this inhibition, either directly or indirectly. High School Dist. No. 137 v. Lancaster County, 60 Neb. 147, 49 L. R. A. 343, 82 N. W. 380.

Although a railroad has been assessed at less than the real value of its property in a town, if it is assessed at a higher proportion thereof than is the other property in such town, it is entitled to a reduction. People ex rel. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Zoeller, 15 N. Y. Supp. 684.

And a taxpayer under such circumstances is entitled to a reduction of his assessment, notwithstanding the Constitution requires property to be assessed at its true value, when he can by no other means secure his constitutional right to equal taxation. Ex parte Ft. Smith & V. B. Bridge Co. 62 Ark. 461, 86 S. W. 1060.

A constitutional provision requiring the legislature to provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and to prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation, for taxation, of all property, real, personal, and possessory, excepting mines and mining claims, the proceeds of which alone shall be taxed, and excepting municipal, educational, religious, charitable, etc., property exempted by law,—compels the assessment of all ad valorem taxes upon property to be made at the same rate. A statute fixing a rate of $1 per $100 on mine products, and levying it at 75 per cent of their ascertained value, and a rate of $2.75 per $100 on other properties at full value, is unconstitutional. State v. Estabrook, 3 Nev. 178.

The courts in Pennsylvania will reduce an assessment on property, although it would sell for the amount assessed, when it is overvalued in comparison with other property similarly situated. Cambridge Spring Co.'s Appeal, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 669.

Appropos of the statement of the Pennsylvania supreme court in Com. v. New York, P. & O. R. Co. 188 Pa. 169. 41 Atl. 594, that, "the actual value being a pure question of fact, appellant has no standing to complain of discrimination in methods so long as its stock is not assessed in excess of that value. It may be that the Reading and some other corporations are taxed on less than the actual value of their capital stock; if so the commonwealth is not here appealing, and consequently it is not our business to inquire into the matter,"—Simonton, P. J., of the Dauphin county common pleas, says: We submit with all deference that this leaves out of view the mandate of the Constitution that "taxes shall be uniform," and that if adopted as a principle, corporations that are taxed out of proportion to others of the same kind would be without remedy. The commonwealth cannot appeal from a settlement of taxes, and, therefore, if for any reason the methods adopted by the accounting officers lead to a want of uniformity, or tend to discriminate between corporations alike taxable, those discriminated against would be helpless. Com. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 172.

So, he concludes that the Constitution means by "taxes shall be uniform" more than that the taxing acts shall provide for uniformity; it means that taxation shall be uniform in fact. And he reaches the like conclusion in three other cases, decided about the same time. Com. v. Shamokin, S. & L. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 168; Com. v. Jamestown & F. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 214; Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 220.

And when, under such a Constitution, a corporation is assessed for taxes upon its capital stock according to the actual aggregate value of its shares with a capitalization of its funded debt added; while taxes upon other like corporations under the same law are settled upon an appraisement of the actual value of their shares only when they, too, have funded debts,—the assessment is invalid for want of the constitutional uniformity. Com. v. Shamokin, S. & L. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 168; Com. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 172.

And when, too, in settling accounts for taxes against corporations upon their capital stock upon valuations other than of their shares, there is a great lack of uniformity in determining the taxable valuations, which are in some cases computed by adding to the value of the shares all or a part of the funded debt; in others by adopting a sum of which the net earnings equalled 6 per cent; in others by deducting the floating indebtedness; in others by deducting so much of the funded indebtedness as might be owned by and taxed to residents of the state; and in others by valuing property, assets, and franchises without either adding or subtracting indebtedness, so that as a result of such multifariousness of valuations there is a general lack of uniformity of taxation,—the Constitution is violated, and the assessments consequently are illegal and void. Com. v. Jamestown & F. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 214; Com. 60 L. R. A.

v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 220.

A provision in a state Constitution that all property shall be taxed according to its value, ascertained in a manner directed by the legislature, so that taxes shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, and no one species of property subject to taxation shall be taxed higher than any other species of the same value, does not require that property be taxed at its full actual value, but only that taxes on property be based on values, and not, for instance, on acreage, quantity, location, frontage, or any one of numerous other gauges; and, therefore, when the universal and continued usage of years in such state has been, and is, to assess property for taxation at only a percentage of its real value, no species of property can be singled out and alone assessed at its full value without violence to such Constitution. Railroad & Teleph. Cos. v. Tennessee Bd. of Equalizers, 85 Fed. 302.

Under such circumstances, and in such state, the action of a state equalization board in assessing railroad and telephone property at the full actual value thereof, without any effort whatever to equalize such assessments with those made upon other classes of property in the state, amounts to a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and to a deprivation of property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Ibid.

It was contended in these cases that a taxpayer whose property has been assessed at no more than its value has no ground of complaint in the fact that other taxpayers have been assessed upon their property at less than its value, when the Constitution prescribes uniform and equal taxation.

Clark, J., thus dealt with this contention: Much stress has been placed in argument upon the language of the Constitution providing that all property shall be taxed according to its value. Defendants say that the proper interpretation of these terms requires that property shall be assessed at its full value, and, unless plaintiffs can show that their own property has been in fact assessed at more than its actual value, it is not open to them to complain that all other property in the state is assessed at only a percentage of its actual value. The contention is that, if the assessors have obeyed the constitutional direction, and assessed plaintiff's property at its full value, it is no just or legal cause of complaint, and no ground of relief, that other assessors have put a taxable value on other property much less than its actual value. Conceding, for the purpose of testing the soundness of this proposition, that the constitutional term "according to its value" means the same thing as "at its full value," the contention of the state then, with reference to its effect, is this: That it may assess the property of A at its full value in obedience to the Constitution, and the property of B at one half its value in violation of the Constitution, and, when A complains that the result has been to violate the Constitution in respect to the equality provision, the answer is that the objection is not open to A because he is taxed no more than the full value of his own property, and that he must pay 50 per cent more on the same actual value than B. Now, it will certainly be admitted that the simple statement of such a proposition suggests its utter unreasonableness. If decisions may be found which apparently uphold such a result as this, they promulgate a doctrine which cannot be accepted as good law. Ibid.

The same judge followed this by deciding further that, while it is true that the prohibitions of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution in respect of denying the equal protection of the laws and the deprivation of property without due process of law are directed against state action only, such state action is not to be regarded as limited to the terms of a legislative enactment as it comes from the legislature, but it extends to all instrumentalities and agencies officially employed in the execution of the law down to the point where the personal and property rights of the citizen are touched. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor, 86 Fed. 168.

These decisions of Judge Clark came under review in the United States circuit court of appeals, and the question here under discussion was considered. After treating of various other questions in the case, that tribunal turned to this one. The next objection to the assessment, it said, and the most serious, is that the railroad property of the state has been assessed at its real value, whereas all other property in the state is habitually and intentionally assessed by the assessing officers, who are not the defendants, at not exceeding 75 per cent of its real or correct value. The contention is that the undervaluation of real and personal property is intentional and systematic throughout the state, and is in accordance with an immemorial and well-recognized custom; that, combined with the assessment at full value of all railroad property, the undervaluation of all other property makes a system of taxation operating to impose upon complainant and all others holding the same class of property a grossly unjust share of the cost of the state, county, and city governments, and that this is in violation of the Constitution of the state, which enjoins uniformity of taxation, according to value, on all property, and expressly forbids that one species of property shall be taxed higher than any other; and that a court of equity, because it is unable to remedy the glaring injustice done to complainants and others of the same class by compelling the assessment on other property to be raised to its real value, may accomplish the same result by enjoining the defendants from assessing railroad property at any higher percentage than that at which other property in the state is assessed. In considering the soundness of this contention, the court found, first, that, as a fact established by overwhelming and uncontradicted evidence, the assessors and county equalization boards for many years generally in the state intended to, and did, assess real and personal property at a uniform percentage less than its real value, and on the average 25 per cent less, and, second, that this happened during the year when the assessments the railroads complained of were made. But the state Constitution commanded, in the view taken by the court, assessments to be made upon the true value of the taxable property at the same time that it expressly forbade any one species of property to be taxed higher than another species of equal value. Considering, nevertheless, that the intent and purpose of the Constitution were to secure a real equality of taxation, and that this purpose would be frustrated by upholding any single assessment upon a par valuation, it decided that, to enjoin the enforcement of such an assessment if the injunction secured uniformity as to all would be not so great a violation of the Constitution as would result from a continuation of existing conditions, and a denial of relief to the injured taxpayer. "The court," it said, "is placed in a dilemma from which it can only escape by taking that path which, while it involves a nominal departure from the letter of the law, does injury to no one, and secures that uniformity of tax burden which was the sole end of the Constitution. To 60 L. R. A.

hold otherwise is to make the restrictions of the Constitution instruments for defeating the very purpose they were intended to subvert. It is to stick in the bark and to be blind to the substance of things. It is to sacrifice justice to its incident." Taylor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 31 C. C. A. 537, 60 U. S. App. 166, 88 Fed. 350.

A foreign corporation whose property is assessed for taxation at its full value does not sustain the allegation of unjust discrimination against it, and, therefore, a violation of the constitutional provision requiring all property subject to taxation to be taxed ad valorem by offering no proof beyond the testimony of one member of the state board of equalization that, in his judgment, the valuation of property generally is only 35 or 40 per cent of its true value. It is bound to go further, and show that such is the general common rule of action or agreement of the assessors. State ex rel. Gottlieb v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 165 Mo. 502, 65 S. W. 775.

The corporation is bound, if it would establish a violation of the 14th Amendment in respect of a denial of the equal protection of the laws, to prove, either that the state laws themselves sanctioned such practice of undervaluation, or else that it was the result of a general agreement or common rule of action of the assessors. Ibid.

To warrant a Federal court in intervening by injunction against a state tax upon a corporation upon the alleged ground that it has been so discriminated against in being assessed at full value, while other property in the state has been generally intentionally and systematically assessed at but 70 per cent thereof, as to amount to a denial of the equal protection of the laws in violation of the 14th Amendment, the discrimination alleged must be established by a clear preponderance of evidence, or admitted. Louisville Trust Co. v. Stone, 46 C. C. A. 299, 107 Fed. 305.

Such a discriminating rule of action among assessors generally may be proved inferentially when direct proof is lacking, from a regular and persistent course of conduct in respect of assessments upon their part; and to that end evidence of particular assessments and of the value of the property assessed is admissible. Southern R. Co. v. North Carolina Corp. Co. 104 Fed. 700.

When a rule or system of valuation under an unobjectionable and constitutional tax law is adopted by those whose duty it is to make the assessment, which is designed to operate unequally and to violate the fundamental principle of the Constitution; and when such rule is applied, not solely to one individual, but to a large class of individuals or corporations,—equity may properly interfere to restrain the operation of this unconstitutional exercise of power. Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903.

To establish such an inequality of assessment and taxation as will amount to a denial of the equal protection of the laws to one set of taxpayers as compared with others in the same class and circumstances, it must be alleged and proved, when the laws on their face are innocent of discrimination, that the assessors habitually and intentionally, by some rule prescribed by themselves or others whom they are bound to obey, undervalue the one, or overvalue the other, subject of the tax. Albany County v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305, 26 L. ed. 1044.

In New York v. Barker, 179 U. S. 279, 287, sub nom. New York ex rel. New York Clearing House Bldg. Co. v. Barker, 45 L. ed. 190, 194, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, Affirming 158 N. Y. 709, 53 N. E. 1130, it was alleged that, although by the New York tax laws all assessors were commanded to assess real estate for taxation at its full and actual value, nevertheless, as corporations were also assessed upon their capital stock at its actual value under another statute that did not apply to individuals, and from the latter assessment there was to be deducted the assessed value only of the corporate real estate, the effect of this process was always and necessarily to tax corporations up to the full value of their real estate, whereas, individuals were never so taxed upon the single assessment; wherefore, it was contended the corporations were denied the equal protection of the laws. But the record failed to show, either by averment or proof, that there was a regular, habitual, and general undervaluation of individual real estate in assessing it for taxation, and the court declined to assume that such was the case; and if, as the legal presumption necessarily was, the assessors did their sworn legal duty, and assessed all real estate, by whomsoever owned, at its full and actual value, there was no discrimination, and there could be no inequality in including it at its real, and excluding it at its assessed, value, in taxing a corporate landowner upon its capital stock.

XV. Different methods of assessment and procedure.

It is plain that the constitutional provisions referred to ubi supra have only the purpose to prevent the saddling upon any single taxpayer, or any specific property, of more than his or its fair and just proportionate share of the burden of public taxation. If a taxpayer is not called upon to bear more than this, he has no grievance in so far as such constitutional provisions are concerned,—no wrong has been done or threatened him in this respect which entitles him to call upon the courts to redress or prevent. Accordingly, one finds the courts interfering upon the ground of a violation of uniformity and equality of taxation rules when actual inequality has resulted, or necessarily must result, and in no other cases.

A taxing statute is not invalid, according to Runyon, Chancellor, of the New Jersey court of errors and appeals, anent the railroad and canal tax legislation of 1884 in that state, under a constitutional rule of uniformity and equality in property taxation ad valorem, merely because it directs the valuation and assessment of certain property to be made by a board of assessors specially appointed for the purpose; as the machinery designated to execute a law does not affect the case if the principle of the law be constitutionally unobjectionable. Whence, it follows that a general statute establishing a system for the taxation of railroads and canals, which sets apart for assessment by a state board all the property of the railroads and canals used and appertaining to their specific corporate purposes, including their franchises, and assesses them at their true value,—the rule relating to all ad valorem property taxation,—leaving any other property railroads or canals may chance to own, and which is not necessary to the exercise of their franchises, to be assessed and taxed by the local authorities like all property in their respective jurisdictions, and which lays upon the railroad and canal property assessed by the state board, a tax for state purposes, and a further tax for county and municipal purposes,—is not repugnant to the Federal Constitution, either as denying the equal protection of the laws, or as depriving one of property without due process of law. State Board v. Central R. Co. 43 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578.

And his colleague, Parker, J., concurring, says: "I agree with the supreme court in that part of the opinion which holds the act of 1884 not invalid because it directs that the valuation and assessment shall be made by a board of assessors specially appointed for the purpose. It matters not what the machinery set in motion by the legislature to execute a tax law may be, so long as the principle lying at the root of the act is not antagonistic to the Constitution." And, in his view, while the legislature may not be competent, under a provision of the state Constitution commanding the assessment and taxation of property ad valorem by general and uniform laws, to select the property of two classes of corporations, and tax it while exempting all other property from taxation, yet, that body may, by a series of laws, subject the property in the state in general to taxation by different methods, and group the subjects of taxation into classes for the purpose, and then no single statute in the series will be unconstitutional because the whole series is in part materia. Ibid.

It is within the legislative discretion, in a state having such a Constitution, to create classes upon a substantial basis for the convenience of levying and collecting taxes; and, so long as the modes provided substantially result in assessing the classes upon their property according to its true value, different methods of ascertaining such value may be prescribed in such classifications. Fidelity Trust Co. v. Vogt, 13 N. J. L. 86, 48 Atl. 580.

Individuals may be taxed in a different manner from corporations without violating a constitutional rule of uniformity. Fox's Appeal, 112 Pa. 337, 4 Atl. 149; Sanderson's Appeal (Pa.) 3 Cent. Rep. 569.

But, although the legislature, without violating the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity, may classify corporations for the purpose of taxation, and may subdivide them into smaller classes, and assess them in different ways, all property in the same class must be taxed without discrimination of rate, and the rule for ascertaining its value must be applied, alike to all in the class, and each must be taxed on the actual cash valuation, ascertained from any relevant evidence tending to establish it. Com. v. Sharon Coal Co. 164 Pa. 304, 80 Atl. 127, 128; Com. v. Shamokin, 8 & L. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 168; Com. v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 172; Com. v. Jamestown & F. R. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 214; Com. v. Mammoth Vein Coal & I. Co. 3 Dauphin Co. Rep. 220.

There is power in the West Virginia legislature to prescribe the method of ascertaining, for the purposes of taxation, the value of any class of property in the state; and, provided such method is applied uniformly throughout the state, the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity of taxation is not infringed. Charleston & S. Bridge Co. v. Kanawha County Ct. 41 W. Va. 658, 24 S. E. 1002.

There is nothing in the Constitution of Kentucky that requires taxes to be levied by a uniform method upon all descriptions of property. The whole matter is left to the discretion of the legislature, and there is nothing to forbid the classification of property for purposes of taxation and the valuation of different classes by different methods. The rule of equality in respect of the subject only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents of each class, so that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances. There is no objection, therefore, to the discrimination made as between railroad companies and other corporations in the methods and instrumentalities by which the value of their property is ascertained. The different nature and uses of their property justify the discrimination in this respect, which the discretion of the legislature has seen fit to make. Kentucky Railroad Tax

Cases, 115 U. S. 821, sub nom. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 29 L. ed. 414, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 57.

If it be granted that a constitutional provision that taxes shall be equal and uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax applies to taxation based upon income, license, or franchise, still it is not violated by a statute taxing, by a different mode than that applied to individuals, corporations generally upon all their property and assets, tangible and intangible, franchises and privileges. Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 166 U. S. 171, 41 L. ed. 960, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527.

It is not an unconstitutional discrimination for a city to allow individuals a discount for prompt payment of their taxes, when none is allowed to a railroad assessed under a different system not administered by such city, and where the procedure for collecting railroad taxes is altogether unlike that applied to natural persons. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 796, 29 S. W. 865.

A municipality in Kentucky may not, however, without violating the Constitution, levy city taxes upon the ad valorem basis upon real property, and upon a license basis upon personal property, even though the Constitution does authorize taxation based on licenses and franchises. Levi v. Louisville, 97 Ky. 394, 28 L. R. A. 480, 30 S. W. 978.

And when a state Constitution provides that all property shall be taxed according to its value, ascertained in such manner as the legislature directs, so that taxes shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, and no species of taxable property be taxed higher than another species of equal value, the provision is mandatory and self-executing: so that, although the legislature may provide for the assessing of railroads and telephone companies by a state board of equalization, yet, if that board, even acting with perfect honesty and good faith pursues methods calculated to bring about a substantial inequality in the taxable values of the properties of such companies as compared with other sorts of property assessed by the ordinary methods, the innocent intent of the procedure will afford no legal justification for the resulting wrong. Railroad & Teleph. Cos. v. Tennessee Bd. of Equalizers, 35 Fed. 302.

But when it is shown without contradiction that the valuation put upon the property of a railroad within the state is not excessive, either as regards its intrinsic worth, or by comparison with the assessments of other railroad property in such state, it matters not what were the ways and means by which the assessing officers arrived at that valuation, since whatever method they adopted did not result in any overvaluation of the railroad property, nor in any discrimination against the railroad as compared with other railroads whose property is taxed in the same state. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. King, 120 Fed. 614.

A separate system of railroad taxation, whereby rolling stock and other personal property in flux along the line is assessed and apportioned to different counties by a state officer who enforces collection, when in ordinary taxation personal property is assessed and taxed by local officials in the counties where it happens to be, is not invalid upon the score of a want of uniformity. Columbus Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 89 Ga. 574, 15 S. E. 293, Affirmed in 151 U. S. 470, 38 L. ed. 238, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396.

The Indiana Constitution does not require a uniform method of valuation of property, but only such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation, of all property, both real and personal. The legislature may use its discretion as to the best method of securing a just valuation, and, unless the method adopted be clearly inadequate to secure that result, the action of the legislature cannot be questioned. Louisville & N. A. R. Co. v. State, 25 Ind. 180, 87 Am. Dec. 358.

That a state board of tax commissioners—the highest body in the state with jurisdiction or authority to make or correct assessments of property for taxation—is given original jurisdiction in assessing and valuing railroad tracks and rolling stock, while it acquires jurisdiction over other classes of property by appeal, does not deny railroads the equal protection of the laws. Equal protection of the law does not require that all persons shall have the right of a hearing or trial before the same tribunal and in all the same tribunals, and have the same right of appeal from one to another. That such is not the theory of, or interpretation to be given to, art. 14, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States is too clear to admit of argument or the citation of authority. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 18 L. R. A. 729, 33 N. E. 421, Affirmed in 154 U. S. 439, 38 L. ed. 1041, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 677, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122.

Nor is the statute establishing that system of railroad taxation any more objectionable upon the score of infringing the provisions of the state Constitution relating to a just valuation of all property for taxation and to equality and uniformity in taxation. Ibid.

The same conclusions were reached upon the same questions by the Supreme Court of the United States. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. ed. 1031, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114.

The provision of the Illinois Constitution requiring taxation to be by general law, uniform as to the class on which it operates, does not invalidate a statute for the assessment by a state board of some corporations, and of other corporations by local authorities. Sterling Gas Co. v. Higby, 134 Ill. 557, 25 N. E. 660.

The Illinois act creating a board of assessors in all counties of the state having a certain number of, or more, inhabitants, and making township assessors elected in each township in such counties not lying wholly within the limits of one city ex officio deputy assessors to make assessments in their respective townships, is not open to the objection of a want of constitutional uniformity and equality as dividing the city of Chicago into two parts for assessment purposes, one to be assessed by the board so constituted and the other by township assessors. Aside from the consideration that the act does not evince any such legislative intention, it creates, as a matter of fact, but one set of assessors for the whole county embracing that city. There are two classes of deputies, one elected and the other appointed, but both of these act under the direction of the one board, and the work of both is subject to its revision and correction; and becomes, when revised and adopted, the work of the board itself. Burton Stock Car Co. v. Traeger, 187 Ill. 9, 58 N. E. 418.

Diverse methods in electing or appointing city assessors and boards to review their action in different cities do not violate the constitutional provision for uniform taxation. State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746.

All that is required in a statute for the taxation of the property of railroad corporations to conform to a constitutional requirement that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals is equality of burden on the tax-paying corporation; and the legislature has power, when this result is attained, to provide any proper manner for the valuation of such property, and to fix the situs thereof for the purposes of taxation. Dubuque v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 196.

A constitutional provision requiring the legislature to provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation is not infringed by a statute requiring railroad property to be assessed by joint action of county clerks along the line thereof, as an entirety as personal property (although it includes real estate), and the taxes thereon to be collected in the same manner as are taxes upon personal property; when other property is assessed separately, according to quantity, by township assessors in each township, and other real estate is assessed as such while real and personal taxes are collected generally in different ways; nor when ordinary taxes are equalized by a board in each county which has naught to do with railroad taxes. The Constitution does not require equality and uniformity in the mode or manner of assessing and method of collecting taxes, but only that all property be assessed and taxed at an equal and uniform rate. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. 210.

A statute creating a state board of railroad commissioners to assess railroad property for taxation, authorizing the annual assessment of railway tracks, when other real estate is assessed biennially, without a right of appeal, enjoyed by ordinary taxpayers taxed by other assessors upon a different class of property, is not repugnant to a constitutional provision for equal and uniform taxation; nor does it deny railroads the equal protection of the laws. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Worthen, 52 Ark. 529, 7 L. R. A. 374, 13 S. W. 254.

The legality, as well as the advantage, of different modes of assessing different kinds of property is regarded by the supreme court of Colorado as in accord with the constitutional requirement in that state that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and that taxes shall be levied and collected under general laws and regulations to secure a just valuation for taxation of all property. Stanley v. Little Pittsburgh Min. Co. 6 Colo. 415; Carlisle v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 8 Colo. 320, 54 Am. Rep. 553, 7 Pac. 164.

The uniformity required in that state is a uniformity of taxes, not of procedure, nor of rules or regulations to govern the imposition of them. To demand absolute uniformity in the latter regard would tend strongly to defeat the prior and supreme requirement. The Constitution leaves the matter with the legislature, simply directing that the regulations be made by general law and secure just valuations. People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

Thus it is that a law for taxing railroad cars, which excepts from its application cars of railroads operating lines within the state, whose taxation is otherwise provided for, is not in conflict with such constitutional provisions. American Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Adams, 28 Colo. 119, 63 Pac. 410.

The Constitution of California requires all property to be assessed at its actual value; but the fact that the value of one kind of property is to be ascertained by one officer or board, and the value of another kind by another officer or board,—each clothed with the duty and responsibility of ascertaining the actual value,—does not operate to deny to the owners of either kind the equal protection of the laws. The state board in the one case, the assessors and county boards in the other, are but different instrumentalities through which the same result is reached, the fair and just valuation by reference to the same standard—and, therefore, the equal and uniform valuation—of property for the purposes of taxation. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12.

Under the Constitution of Washington commanding, first, that all property in the state, not exempt by Federal laws of such Constitution itself, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law; and, second, that the legislature shall provide by law an equal and uniform rate of assessment and taxation on all property in the state according to its value in money, and shall prescribe such regulations by general law as shall secure a just valuation of all property so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property,—the legislature has power to select the subjects of taxation, and prescribe the methods of assessment and collection of taxes, and has the right to create a state board of equalization, and designate its duties, and how they shall be performed. State ex rel. Thompson v. Nichols (Wash.) 69 Pac. 771.

Michigan is somewhat out of harmony with her sister states.

When a state Constitution requires the legislature to provide a uniform rule of taxation except on property paying specific taxes, and taxes to be levied upon such property as prescribed by law, and that all assessments shall be on property at its true cash value, a statute for the assessment of telegraph and telephone lines within the state, which provides that certain designated state officers shall assess such lines at their true cash value equal to the average rate of taxes (general, municipal, and local), to be ascertained from the files of the auditor general's office, and to be in lieu of all other taxes, does not provide for a specific tax; and therefore, although these lines are to be assessed at their true cash value, inasmuch as they are to be assessed as a whole, and not locally, by a state board, not by local assessors as in ordinary cases,—granting, without deciding, that this is permissible,—the rate, being determined in a different way, and being a different amount than that applied to other property taxed for state purposes,—is void for violating the constitutional rule of uniformity. Pingree v. Auditor General, 120 Mich. 85, sub nom. Pingree v. Dix, 44 L. R. A. 679, 78 N. W. 1025.

And it has been held in Georgia that, when there is a constitutional requirement that taxes shall be levied and collected under general laws, it means that laws for the levying and collecting of taxes shall be substantially the same for all classes of property; that, if a pecuniary penalty is put upon delinquent taxpayers, it shall affect all alike; that the legislature cannot impose one penalty upon a railroad and another upon an individual for failure to pay a property tax,—to penalize one class alone and other classes not at all for like defaults. A statute which does this is invalid. Atlanta & F. R. Co. v. Wright, 87 Ga. 487, 13 S. E. 578.

XVI. Miscellaneous.

A few cases remain to be noticed before the topic is closed, which have not readily been assignable to the foregoing groups, and which have nothing in common but a question of equality. They are included to complete the survey of the whole field of inquiry. When a Constitution provides that no political corporation shall impose a greater license tax than the legislature imposes for state purposes, a city may exact a license tax only from those occupations or businesses that the state has so burdened; but, after the state has charged a particular business with a license tax, it is no objection to a municipal license tax upon it not greater in amount than the state tax discriminates between those who follow the business in cities of 50,000 people and those who do so in less populous places, in violation of the constitutional rule of equality and uniformity, because a state tax law will not be held invalid in a collateral proceeding not involving a state tax and where the state is no party. New Orleans v. Pontchartrain R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 519, 7 So. 88.

A constitutional declaration that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax does not invalidate a statute providing that no assessment shall be laid ex nomine upon the capital stock of state or national banks, banking firms, companies, or associations, or corporations with capital stock divided into shares, but that, instead, the actual value of shares of stock shall be taxed, because in its practical administration stockholders in corporations which have capital invested in nontaxable securities are not allowed any pro rata deduction on account thereof. This does not amount to a taxation of corporations upon securities which are exempt when owned by individuals, and, hence, does not constitute an unequal taxation. Parker v. Sun Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 1172, 8 So. 618.

After a tax in aid of a railroad has been duly assessed and levied, the release by the railroad of some of the taxpayers from its payment does not invalidate the tax as to the rest. Their burden is not increased by such release, and so the rule of equality and uniformity is not infringed. Missouri, K. & T. Trust Co. v. Smart, 51 La. Ann. 416, 25 So. 443.

When a railroad has been properly and legally assessed for taxation by a state railroad commission, and the amount of its taxable property in a given county apportioned to such county, it cannot avoid a highway tax assessed upon such apportionment in such county because it is unequally and inequitably subdivided among the several road districts in the county entitled to parts of it. So long as the corporation pays no more than it is liable for in the aggregate, it is immaterial to it how the payment is subdivided. State v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 18 Lea, 500.

When the jurisdiction of a Federal court has been duly invoked to restrain the imposition of a state tax upon a corporation alleging it has been unfairly discriminated against by being assessed upon the value in full of its property, whereas other taxpayers in general throughout the state are universally and intentionally assessed upon but 70 per cent thereof, so that, in effect, the equal protection of the laws has been denied the complainant in violation of the 14th Amendment, that jurisdiction is retained for all purposes; and, although it is decided that the discrimination charged is not established by the proof, the corporation may still have relief by being exempted as a stockholder in another taxed corporation of the state to the amount of its interest therein, when the state law provides that the shareholders of such corporations shall not be taxed upon their shares, and the proper deduction on this account has not been allowed in the assessment. Louisville Trust Co. v. Stone, 46 C. C. A. 299, 107 Fed. 305.

An objection that a tax is void for want of constitutional uniformity and equality, for the reason that lands of unequal value have been arbitrarily assessed at the same rate per acre is unavailing when raised for the first time in suit to set aside an assessment and restrain the collection of a tax, when a statute provides that no person or corporation shall be heard in any action, suit, or proceeding to question the equality of any assessment, unless he or it shall have first made such objection before the board of review, and made offer to sustain the same by competent proof. Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. Ashland County, 81 Wis. 1, 50 N. W. 937.

While the Minnesota Constitution allows the deduction of indebtedness from credits in assessments for taxation, yet such deductions can be secured only in some manner provided by law, as the Constitution is not self-executing; and if, by failure to observe the requirements of a statute regulative of the allowance of such deductions, the right thereto is lost, the tax is not invalidated for want of equality and uniformity. State v. London & N. W. American Mortg. Co. 80 Minn. 277, 83 N. W. 339.

When a state law imposes upon foreign insurance companies doing business within its borders a percentage tax upon their gross premium receipts higher than is laid upon the like receipts of domestic companies of the same kind, and does not provide for the enforcement and collection thereof in any way except to make the payment thereof a condition precedent to the obtaining of a license to do business in the state, the Federal courts have no jurisdiction to restrain the revocation of or refusal to renew such license notwithstanding the claim that the discriminating tax amounts to a denial of the equal protection of the laws within the terms of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Although such discrimination might be sufficient to prevent the collection of the tax, a state has the undeniable right to impose any condition it chooses upon its permission to foreign corporations, not government agencies or exclusively engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, to do business in its territory, and the right, also, with or without reason, to exclude them in toto. Manchester F. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 91 Fed. 711.

Under a Constitution requiring all property to be assessed and taxed at an equal and uniform rate, upon a just valuation, and statutes requiring it to be assessed at actual cash value (defined to mean the sum at which it would be accepted in payment of a just debt from a solvent debtor), and laws directing assessors, in fixing the value for taxation of any railroad, to assess it the same as other property, each to consider, treat, and assess the portion within his jurisdiction as an integral part of a complete, continuous, and operated line, and not merely as so much land covered by a right of way, or as so many miles of track consisting of rails, ties, and couplings,—a railroad, like other property, must be assessed at its true cash value; but the rule for determining that value is to capitalize its earnings at the current rate of interest, taking into account its prospects of increased or diminished utility; but the value of any particular portion of the road is not necessarily a fractional proportion of the whole, for local conditions may make it more or less. State v. Virginia & T. R. Co. 23 Nev. 283, 85 L. R. A. 759, 46 Pac. 723.

XVII. Conclusion.

The review has shown that, however consonant with justice equal taxation may be, it cannot be judicially enforced, even approximately in the United States,—such is the plenary power in the premises of state legislatures,—without controlling constitutional provisions. The varying language employed in the Constitutions to secure equality, and the varying constructions thereof by the courts interpreting that language, have necessarily led to a great variety of decisions. The thoughtful reader observes something of a tendency in the courts to hold that, inasmuch as absolute equality of taxation is supposed to be unattainable, gross inequality must be tolerated. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court indicate this tendency. A remark, typical of the mental attitude of its members, is that of Mr. Justice Field, in speaking of a tax burden laid upon a particular district for a public work of benefit to the whole state: "This court is not the harbor in which the people of a city or county can find a refuge from ill-advised, unequal, and oppressive state legislation." Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 704, 28 L. ed. 238, 242.

Many rights belong to citizens which persons as such do not enjoy. Few, or no, burdens rest upon citizens which persons do not sustain. The rights of citizens may be withheld from, and their obligations imposed upon, persons, and they are. Corporations are included among persons, and excluded among citizens.

About thirty years ago Mr. Justice Beck, of the Iowa supreme court, in Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 56, wrote, and afterwards, in Dubuque v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 196, repeated: The history of corporations for pecuniary profit in this country shows that there long has been a disposition on the part of these artificial persons to seek, and on the part of legislatures to grant, immunities and exemptions from taxation. It has often occurred that their charters provided for total exemption from taxes, or for rules of taxation applicable to them different from those affecting other property holders. Legislation in other forms has been often sought and granted securing the same end. The law before us, as well as others enacted in this state, bear evidence of the correctness of this statement. Against such legislation, the evils of which existed and were felt when the Constitution of 1857 was adopted, the provision above quoted (i. e., the uniformity and equality provision) was aimed. The end sought and attained thereby is the equal and uniform taxation of the property of all the taxpayers of the state.

When these words were written they were doubtless true, and prudently used of a past when legislation had sought to open new regions by every legitimate inducement to railroads, telegraphs, and banks; but the succeeding years have seen a great change in legislation regarding corporations. The history of these later years is the history of a struggle by corporate enterprises to escape being burdened for the benefit of individuals, to maintain an equality with natural persons, and of legislative efforts to saddle corporations with every possible burden, and to tax them over and over again. The constitutional provisions devised to make corporations taxable to as great an extent and as much as other taxpayers are now relied upon by the corporations to prevent their being taxed more than individuals.

In respect of classification of subjects of taxation, the principle has at length been evolved, that an arbitrary, unreasonable, unjust classification will not be allowed to stand when the Constitution commands equality and uniformity of taxation. Yet, it is not to be denied that the courts often sustain classifications apparently unjustifiable and vicious. And sometimes they waver so much in opinion as to deprive their final conclusions of all weight whatever. An instance in point is the course of Judge Deady in Dundee Mortg. Trust Investment Co. v. School Dist. No. 1, 19 Fed. 359, 10 Sawy. 52, 21 Fed. 151, and Dundee Mortg. Trust Investment Co. v. Parrish, 11 Sawy. 92, 24 Fed. 197.

The case of Knowlton v. Rock County, 9 Wis. 410, discredited by subsequent decisions of the court which decided it, condemned by Judge Cooley and the Supreme Court of the United States as mentioned supra, opposed to decisions in other states, faultily reasoned, and sponsor for decisions that could not stand, is doubtless deemed to deserve the general condemnation it has received. But, after all, with diffidence be it said that decision nullified a classification which if it did not pass the boundary between the natural and the arbitrary, the reasonable and the unreasonable, went up to the very line. One who doubts the justice of lifting from the farmer a part of his just share of the burdens of state, and adding it to what the rest of the community must bear, is moved to ask why land devoted to agriculture or horticulture should be taxed but half as much as land devoted to other purposes located by its side in the same city.

Double taxation certainly subjects the victim of it to more than his share of the public burden, yet the courts generally concede the power of the legislature to impose it, and ignore constitutional provisions commanding equal and uniform taxation as any restraint upon that power.

It is plain that, if a taxpayer is not disproportionately burdened, he has no cause to complain. If he pays no more than his just share he has no grievance. It is equal taxation that the Constitutions aim to secure, nothing else. Every other distinction made in the tax laws between him and other taxpayers is a case of damnum absque injuria; there is no wrong to be righted, no violation of any constitutional right.

The cases of State ex rel. Poe v. Jones, 51 Ohio St. 492, 37 N. E. 945; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Poe, 61 Fed. 449; Adams Exp. Co. v. Poe, 61 Fed. 470; United States Exp. Co. v. Poe, 61 Fed. 475; Sanford v. Poe, 16 C. C. A. 305, 37 U. S. App. 378, 69 Fed. 546; Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 185 U. S. 194, 41 L. ed. 633, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 805, Rehearing denied in 166 U. S. 185, 41 L. ed. 965, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604, Affirming last above cited case, and which sustained at last the Nichols law of Ohio, —involved among other questions the constitutionality of the statute with respect of uniformity and equality in taxation. In these cases, and in the kindred one that arose under the Indiana tax law (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 141 Ind. 281, 40 N. E. 1051, Affirmed in 163 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 49, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1054), the right to classify separately express and telegraph companies for taxation, and to assess them by different officers, rules, and methods than ordinary taxes, was fully affirmed. These cases are fully treated of in their more important aspects in other notes in this series, and, as they are in harmony with the great body of the case law in point upon the questions discussed in this note, they have not been taken up further.

Messrs. Reddy, Campbell, & Metson for respondents.

Cooper, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' house, caused by reason of the explosion of a large quantity of gunpowder on defendant's premises. The case was tried with a jury, and a verdict returned for plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order. The facts are substantially as follows: For several years prior to the explosion the defendant had been engaged in the business of manufacturing fuse, and had its plant and magazine in the village of Melrose. Within a radius of 250 yards of the magazine there were many dwelling houses, of which plaintiffs' was one, the vicinity being regularly laid out in streets. Defendant had in its magazine, immediately prior to the explosion, about 5,000 pounds of gunpowder, being the amount it usually kept on hand. In the employ of defendant was a Chinaman, whose business it was to carry powder from the magazines to the hoppers, from which the powder was distributed. The Chinaman, during a quarrel with one of his countrymen, killed him, and then fled into the magazine to evade arrest. While the officers of the law were making an attempt to arrest him, he wilfully, and with murderous intent, set fire to the magazine, exploding it, killing some of the officers and himself, and causing the injury to plaintiffs' dwelling. The court below instructed the jury that, if the defendant kept and stored in its magazine a large quantity of gunpowder in a thickly settled neighborhood, and so near thereto that its explosion was liable to injure persons, dwellings, or other property in the neighborhood, the so keeping said powder was a nuisance; and the jury, by its verdict, found by implication that it was a nuisance.

It is settled by the great weight of authority that the keeping of a dangerous explosive, such as gunpowder or nitroglycerin, in large quantities, in a public place, or in close proximity to buildings inhabited by human beings, is a nuisance per se. Webb's Pollock, Torts, note on page 503, and cases cited; Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan, 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734; Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill, 293, 41 Am. Dec. 744; Chicago, W. & P. Coal Co. v. Glass, 34 Ill. App. 364; Weir's Appeal, 74 Pa. 230; McAndrews v. Collier, 42 N. J. L. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 508. In the latter case it is said: "The keeping of gunpowder, nitroglycerin, or other explosive substances, in large quantities, in the vicinity of a dwelling house or place of business, is a nuisance per se, and may be abated as such by action at law, or injunction in equity." And in this case the question was properly left to the jury under appropriate instructions. Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654; Rudder v. Koopman, 116 Ala. 333, 37 L. R. A. 489, 22 So. 601. Therefore the defendant was guilty of maintaining a nuisance in keeping the large quantity of powder in so populous a neighborhood.

Is it liable to plaintiff for damages caused by the explosion, that being caused by the criminal act of the Chinaman? We are of opinion that it is, and the fact that the Chinaman, by his act, was the direct cause can make no difference. The fact that defendant maintained the nuisance was a violation of legal duty. If it had not maintained the nuisance, the damage would not have occurred. Powder is regarded by all the authorities as a destructive agent, liable to explosion by contact with the smallest spark, and often by the elements. The maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, applies. The plaintiffs had the right to the free use and enjoyment of their property. The defendant, in maintaining the nuisance upon its own land, for its own profit, caused the damage. The thing constituting the nuisance was the property of defendant, the Chinaman its servant, and, although he turned aside from his employment in setting fire to the powder, yet the defendant, on principles of public policy, must be held liable. The defendant's violation of legal duty and wilful disregard of the property rights of others indirectly caused the damage. The principle is correctly stated by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265: "We think the true rule of law is that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his lands and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it at his peril, and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. . . . But for his act of bringing it there, no mischief could have accrued, and it seems but just that he should, at his peril, keep it there, so that no mischief may accrue, or answer for the natural and anticipated consequences. And upon authority this, we think, is established to be the law 60 L. R. A.

whether the things so brought be beasts, or water, or filth, or stench." This language was repeated and approved by Lord Cranworth on appeal. L. R. 3 H. L. 330. The same reason applies to explosives. The party bringing upon his premises, in the vicinity of other dwelling houses, large quantities of powder or other explosives, does so at his peril. In this case, if the defendant had not brought and kept the powder on its premises, the Chinaman could not have exploded it. In 1 Hale, P. C. 430, Lord Hale states that where one keeps a beast, knowing its nature or habits are such that the natural consequences of his being loose is that he will harm men, the owner "must, at his peril, keep him up safe from doing hurt, for, though he use his diligence to keep him up, if he escape and do harm, the owner is liable to answer damages." We can see no difference in principle whether the thing be an animal or a dangerous explosive. The defendant knew the nature of the thing kept, its liability to explosion, and it kept it at its peril. The American authorities, with hardly an exception, follow the doctrine laid down in the courts of England. It is said in 1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. p. 183: "So, the keeping of gunpowder, nitroglycerin, damp jute, or other explosive substance, in large quantities, in the vicinity of one's dwelling house or place of business, is a nuisance, and may be abated as such by action at law, or by injunction from a court of equity; and, if actual injury results therefrom, the person keeping them is liable therefor, even though the act occasioning the explosion is due to other persons, and is not chargeable to his personal negligence." In the case of Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 581, 36 Am. Rep. 654, the powder in defendant's magazine exploded from an unknown cause. The action was for damages caused by the explosion. In the opinion the court said: "The fact that the magazine was liable to such a contingency, which could not be guarded against or averted by the greatest degree of care and vigilance, evinces its dangerous character, and might, in some localities, render it a private nuisance. In such a case the rule which exonerates a party engaged in a lawful business when free from negligence has no application." In a later case (Prussak v. Hutton, 30 App. Div. 66, 51 N. Y. Supp. 761) the powder magazine was so near to dwelling houses that it was held to be a nuisance per se, and the owner liable, although the explosion was caused by lightning. The court said: "The defendants, at least, were not free from fault which co-operated to produce the result." In another case by a different plaintiff for damage caused by the same explosion (Oibulski v. Hutton, 47 App. Div. 107, 62 N. Y. Supp. 167) the court again affirmed the rule, saying: "The recovery was not placed upon the ground of the defendants' negligence, but upon evidence sufficient to support the finding of the jury that the powder mill, in the place where it was situate, with reference to the dwelling in which the plaintiff in that case was injured, was a nuisance." In Ohiago, W. & V. Coal Co. v. Glass, 34 Ill. App. 364, the damage was caused by an explosion of the powder magazine by lightning, and the defendant was held liable. The court said: "We do not think it necessary that the proof should show any immediate and direct agency on the part of the appellant causing the injury, when the original or primary cause was the establishment of a public nuisance by it." In a later case (Laftin & R. Powder Co. v. Tearney, 131 Ill. 325, 7 L. R. A. 262, 23 N. E. 390) in which the explosion was caused by lightning, the court said: "As a general rule, the question of care or want of care is not involved in an action for injuries resulting from a nuisance. If actual injury result from the keeping of gunpowder, the person keeping it will be liable therefor, even though the explosion is not chargeable to his personal negligence." In Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan, 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734, the defendant was held liable for damages by the explosion of a powder magazine by lightning. The court said: "The fact that it is liable to explode by means of lightning, against which no human agency could guard, is decisive of this question." In Wilson v. Phenix Powder Mfg. Co. 40 W. Va. 413, 21 S. E. 1035, the cause of the explosion was unknown, but the defendant was held liable, and the court said: "Was the defendant maintaining a public nuisance? If it was, it was engaged in the commission of a public wrong, and, injury resulting therefrom to the plaintiff, the defendant must repair such injury." And further, in the same opinion: "If damage happen to a person from explosion, the injured party is entitled to compensation without proving negligence on the part of defendant. He is injured by that which breaks the law [made for his protection], the law against public nuisance. He is in no fault, while the other man is, and he has received damage from that other man's wrongful act. He has a right to immunity from this injury, and the other man owed him the duty of securing him immunity." In a very late case in Ohio (Bradford Glycerine Co. v. St. Marys Woolen Mfg. Co. 60 Ohio St. 560, 45 L. R. A. 658, 54 N. E. 528) the question is elaborately discussed, and it was held that one who stores nitroglycerin on his own premises is liable for injuries to surrounding property by its exploding, although he neither violates any provision of the law regulating its storage, nor is chargeable with negligence contributory to the explosion. In Hazard Powder Co. v. Volger, 7 C. C. A. 130, 12 U. S. App. 665, 58 Fed. 153, defendant was held liable for damages caused by the explosion of its powder magazine from an unknown cause. It was said: "It is liable for the injuries resulting from its explosion from any cause, because its location under the ordinance made it a nuisance." In Myers v. Maloolm, 6 Hill, 292, 41 Am. Dec. 744, the defendant was held liable where the explosion was caused by the building in which the powder was stored taking fire. The court said: "The situation of the building in other respects, moreover, was such as to render the gunpowder dangerous to the lives of the citizens, for an explosion, either by accident or design, at any period of time after the deposit, would in all human probability have proved destructive to more or less of the inhabitants residing in the neighborhood." In McAndrews v. Collierd, 42 N. J. L. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 508, the damage was caused by the explosion of blasting materials from an unknown cause; and the chancellor, in delivering the opinion, held that depositing such materials in the vicinity of a dwelling house is a nuisance per se, and that, if injury results therefrom, the person so keeping them is liable, "even though the act occasioning the explosion is due to other persons, and is not chargeable to his personal negligence." It is said in Webb's Poillock, Torts, Am. ed. p. 615: "The risk incident to dealing with fire, firearms, explosives, or highly inflammable matters, corrosive or otherwise dangerous or noxious fluids, and (it is apprehended) poisons, is accounted by the common law among those which subject the actor to strict responsibility. Sometimes the term 'consummate care' is used to describe the amount of caution required, but it is doubtful whether even this be strong enough. At least we do not know of any English case of this kind (not falling under some recognized head of exception) where unsuccessful diligence on the defendant's part was held to exonerate him." It is a maxim of our law "that no one should suffer by the act of another." Civil Code, § 3520. In this case, if the plaintiffs, whose property was injured, must suffer, it would, at least to some extent, be by the act of the defendant. The defendant, by its acts in bringing and storing the large quantity of powder near plaintiffs' property, violated the law. Such violation of law, together with the act of the Chinaman, caused the damage. It is claimed that this is a very singular case, and the only one of the kind in the books, and that it should be distinguished from the lightning cases, because it is possible to so insulate a powder magazine that lightning would not strike it. It would have been possible for defendant to have kept matches from the person of the Chinaman while working around the powder magazine. It would have been possible, and it was defendant's duty, to keep its magazine in such locality that, if it exploded, it would not have injured the plaintiffs' property.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

A rehearing having been granted, Vandyke, J., on February 14, 1903, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages. It is alleged in the complaint that defendant was at the time, and prior to the 19th day of July, 1898, engaged in manufacturing and storing powder, dynamite, nitroglycerin, and other high explosives and fuses on its premises near Melrose, in Alameda county, and that by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendant a large quantity of fuse and explosives belonging to it, and under its control, on said day exploded with great violence, whereby plaintiffs' house was injured and damaged to the extent of $400, for which amount damages are claimed. The answer denies that the defendant was engaged in the manufacture or storage of powder, dynamite, nitroglycerin, or other high explosives, but admits that it was the owner of and operating a factory for the manufacture of fuse on its premises; and denies that, by reason of the premises mentioned in the plaintiffs' complaint, or by reason of any negligence or carelessness on the part of the defendant, plaintiffs have been or ever were damaged in any sum whatever. The action was tried in the superior court of San Francisco before a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiffs, from which, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, an appeal was taken.

There seems to be not much conflict in reference to the facts of the case. In July, 1898, at the time of the explosion, and for over ten years prior thereto, defendant corporation was carrying on the business of manufacturing fuse near San Leandro bay, in the county of Alameda, near a station called Melrose. There were other fuse works there besides that of the defendant, and there were in the vicinity dwelling houses scattered here and there about the manufactory. The place was platted in streets, but there were only two roads or ways through the vicinity. One was called High street, the other Clark street. In the testimony of witness Clark, a civil engineer, he says: "High street is open and macadamized. Clark street is a road that is in pretty fair condition only,—that is, simply open,—and a wagon might go through it by picking out the better places." It is outside of the limits of both Oakland and Alameda, and within the township of Brooklyn. The company's grounds contained about an acre and a half. A tight board fence 6 feet and over in height in the lowest place, and 6 feet 7 inches in the highest, with a run of barbed wire on top, inclosed the buildings in which the company carried on its operations. One of these buildings was a powder magazine. This was a brick structure about 14 by 16 feet, and 8 or 10 feet high, covered with metal, and the floor lined with thick linoleum, and was situated in the corner of the inclosure, and in another corner was the residence of the superintendent. The powder used in the manufacture of fuse is ordinary black powder, kept in round metal cans. The company did not manufacture the powder, but it was brought on the premises and stored in the magazine, to be used as required in the manufacture of fuse. The gunpowder was taken from the magazine to a loft or upper story of another small building, and thence poured into small tin hoppers, funnel-shaped, with an orifice leading through the floor to the room below. Each orifice has a thread drawn through it, and, as the thread which thus passes through the gunpowder in the hopper leaves the funnel in the room below, it is wound with other threads and twisted so that it becomes the center thread of the twist. Afterwards this twist is covered with tape and becomes a ropelike fuse, used for the purpose of conveying a spark from a distance to the explosive in blasting operations. The superintendent of the company in his testimony says that the works were located near the slough running into San Leandro bay, and that within 100 feet of the works it was all marshy to San Leandro bay. In the vicinity of the fuse works there were fields under cultivation. The plaintiffs went there and built their house over five years after the defendant company had been in operation, and it does not appear from the evidence whether, at the time the defendant located there and commenced its business, there were any residences or other buildings in the vicinity, but at the time of the explosion there was quite a number of buildings in the neighborhood. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 18th of July, 1898, a quarrel arose between a Chinaman named Quong Ng Chong and another Chinaman within the inclosure in which the company's works were situated. Quong Ng Chong had for many years been employed by the company. His business was to go to the magazine and bring the powder over to the spinning room whenever it was necessary. He was a man of good reputation for peace and quiet. The Chinaman with whom he quarreled was a vegetable dealer who sold vegetables to the men employed in the fuse works. Quong Ng Chong suddenly killed him, and after perpetrating the murder, taking advantage of the excitement caused, he fled into the magazine. He then piled in the doorway of the magazine a number of the metal cans in which the gunpowder was kept, and by that means filled up the doorway of the magazine while he remained inside. He then announced that if any sheriff, policeman, or other person attempted to arrest or take him, he would set fire to the gunpowder. The sheriff of Alameda county and several deputies promptly arrived at the fuse works to arrest the murderer. The afternoon was spent in vain endeavors to induce the Chinaman to come out of the magazine, but he had a pistol, and declared he had matches, and he could not be induced to leave. Late in the evening the employees of the company left the place in charge of the sheriff and several armed deputy sheriffs. They remained on guard during the night. About 5 o'clock next morning, in consequence of an attempt then made to arrest him, the Chinaman carried out his threat and set fire to the gunpowder. The magazine exploded, destroying defendant's factory, killing some of the deputy sheriffs, and injuring the dwelling house of the plaintiffs in this action.

In submitting the cause to the jury, the court gave the following instruction, among others: "A magazine of powder so situated that, in case of explosion from any cause, it is liable to injure the persons and the dwellings of persons living in the vicinity, is a nuisance; and, therefore, if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant corporation maintained at the time mentioned in the complaint, at the town or village or place called Melrose, a magazine, and kept stored therein large quantities of gunpowder, which, in case of explosion, was liable to injure the persons, dwellings, or other property of the residents of the said town or village or place called Melrose, your verdict should be for the plaintiffs. Although the jury may believe from the evidence that powder in the magazine in question was exploded by an agency beyond the control of the defendant corporation, still this would not exempt the defendant corporation from liability, provided the jury believe from the evidence that said magazine was maintained by such defendant corporation in such a place that, in case of an explosion, it was liable to injure, damage, or destroy the persons or property of persons living in the vicinity. . . . The fact, if it be a fact, that defendant's magazine and factory were located and built at Melrose before plaintiffs' house was built, has no bearing on this case. Such circumstances can in no way excuse the maintenance of a nuisance, and the question of whether the magazine and factory of the defendant was a nuisance must be solved without any reference to the location of defendant's factory and magazine." The court also either refused defendant's instructions or modified them on the line of the foregoing.

Although the complaint alleges that the damage was caused "by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendant," there is not a particle of evidence to support such allegation, and that theory of the action seems to have been abandoned by the plaintiffs during the trial. Under the instructions of the court there were no facts for the jury to consider, for the reason that there was no question but that powder was stored in a magazine or place where, in case of explosion, it would be liable to injure or damage persons or property. The doctrine laid down by the court in the instructions, in substance, declared the business of the defendant, under the circumstances, a nuisance per se, and made it an insurer against all damage arising from whatever cause.

It will be observed in this case the plant in question was not devoted to the manufacture of explosives. The only risk attendant upon the business was that risk inseparable from any handling or storing of powder,—the same risks that accompany its transportation, sale, use, and application in all the various circumstances in which it is availed of. By the court's instruction there is no distinction between a case of the use and manufacture of this explosive, nor any exception to the rule in a case where a secluded situation is sought in the first instance, and thereafter others are attracted to the locality, perhaps by the very fact of the business of the factory; and by such instruction the defendant is made liable, notwithstanding that the greatest care and prudence may be used in the transaction of the business, and that the explosion or damage is caused by some agent entirely beyond the control of one conducting the business. This is not the law. In Judson v. Giant Powder Co. 107 Cal. 549, 29 L. R. A. 718, 40 Pac. 1020, the damage for which the action was brought was occasioned by an explosion of nitroglycerin in process of manufacture into dynamite in the defendant's powder factory. In that case the judgment for plaintiff was sustained by this court on the ground that the damage resulted from negligence, the court holding that, the explosion having been shown, it was for the company to show by evidence that it was not the result of negligence or carelessness on its part, which it failed to do. Quoting from Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 60: "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." The court, continuing, says: "This case seems to clearly come within the provisions of the rule there declared. There is nothing to distinguish it in principle from the army of cases that have been held to come directly within its provisions. Appellant was engaged in the manufacture of dynamite. In the ordinary course of things, an explosion does not occur in such manufacture if proper care is exercised. An explosion did occur; ergo, the real cause of the explosion being unexplained, it is probable that it was occasioned by a lack of proper care." Respondent relies upon Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan, 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734, in support of his theory that the business in question here was a nuisance per se. In Dumesnil v. Dupont, 18 B. Mon. 800, 68 Am. Dec. 750, the Supreme Court of Kentucky says that the only adjudged case met with in which the principle that a powder magazine is a nuisance per se seems to have been definitely settled, is that of Cheatham v. Shearon; and adds that "the principles and reasoning upon which the decision rests are opposed to the unbroken current of modern authority, English and American, upon this subject." In Kinney v. Koopman, 116 Ala. 310, 37 L. R. A. 497, 22 So. 593, it is said: "The storing and keeping of gunpowder or dynamite in large quantities near the dwelling houses of citizens in a thickly settled portion of the town, and near a certain public street in said city, is not a nuisance per se; and, to constitute such a nuisance, there must be negligence or want of due care in storing and keeping it." And in the same case it is said: "After a most careful examination of the common-law text-books and decisions, we have no doubt of the correctness of our conclusion in the foregoing cases, and which exactly accords with the law as declared in People v. Sands, 1 Johns. 78, 3 Am. Dec. 296. Steam power, gas, electricity, dynamite, gunpowder, are in daily use, and have become indispensable to the convenience of the public, and for the public defense. Invention of man and advancement in science have enabled the manufacturer of, or dealer in, these articles to provide the public or the individual with almost, if not altogether, absolute protection against danger or hurt from explosion. And, even had the manufacturing and storage of gunpowder, in its early history, been a nuisance at common law, the common-law definition of a nuisance would not include gunpowder at this day." In Tuckachinsky v. Lehigh & W. B. Coal Co. 199 Pa. 515, 49 Atl. 308, a similar case was considered. In that case, at the time of the accident, the defendant had 4½ boxes of dynamite and 4½ kegs of black powder in a wooden building 14 feet square and 12 feet high, in an open space near the shaft of its colliery. The mine was not in operation at the time, but some dead work was being done, in which powder was necessary. The plaintiff was standing in the doorway of her father's house, and was thrown backwards down a flight of stairs by the concussion of the air, receiving injuries for which damages were sought. The explosion was caused by lightning. The trial court in its instructions to the jury stated that there was no evidence in the case of any "negligence on the part of the defendant, unless it consists in having the kind and quality of explosives in the place at the time, for the purpose, and under the circumstances already stated. As to this there is no controversy, no dispute, no question of fact to be determined. The only question to be decided is whether, under the law, this state of facts constitutes negligence in itself for which the plaintiff may recover in this action." And the court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant. On appeal the supreme court says: "A nuisance has been defined as 'that which annoys and disturbs one in the possession of his property, rendering its ordinary use or occupation physically uncomfortable to him.' The evidence in this case shows that the powder magazine had been in use by the defendant company for more than thirty years, and that the plaintiff has resided within about 700 feet of it for some sixteen years. Yet there is no testimony to show that any apprehension of danger, or any fear of explosion, was felt or expressed by anyone during that time. No objection to the location or maintenance of the magazine has been shown. The explosives were stored in small quantities to meet current needs. Such materials are always dangerous, but, as their use is essential to the work of mining, it is impossible to protect, absolutely, persons or property in the immediate vicinity. The risk is similar to that arising from the operation of steam boilers and other machinery and apparatus necessary to the prosperity of great communities. Negligence in the care of the explosives, or in the management of the magazine, was neither charged nor proved. The only question in the case was as to whether or not the magazine was in itself a nuisance. We can see nothing in the evidence to support such a finding. The explosives were kept only for use in the mine, and were kept in small quantities. The explosion was caused by no act of the defendant, but by a stroke of lightning. The trial court could not have sustained a verdict for the plaintiff upon the evidence. Its instructions to the jury, to find in favor of the defendant, were proper, and the judgment is affirmed."

As said in the foregoing opinion, powder, gas, steam, etc., are equally dangerous, but equally necessary in the present condition of society, and the rule laid down in the above opinion seems to be well settled, not only in Pennsylvania, but in New York and elsewhere. 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 514; and Schmeer v. Gaslight Co. 147 N. Y. 529, 30 L. R. A. 653, 42 N. E. 202. Another case relied upon by the respondent is Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654. In a later case (Lounsberry v. Foss, 80 Hun, 296, 30 N. Y. Supp. 89), speaking of Heeg v. Licht, the court says: "Keeping of such material does not, however, necessarily constitute a nuisance per se; that depends upon the locality, the quantity, and the surrounding circumstances. The consequential result of the authorities is that each case like this must be left to the jury, under proper instructions from the court."

It does not appear that when the defendant commenced its business it was not located in a proper place, and at that time sufficiently removed from a residence neighborhood. It was carried on with the utmost care. The damage in question resulted from a cause entirely beyond its control, and without any carelessness or negligence on its part whatever, and under the more recent and better line of authorities, as shown under such circumstances, it is not responsible.

The judgment and order are reversed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

DENVER POWER & IRRIGATION COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,

v.

COLORADO & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(.....Colo.....)

1. Authority to condemn land for a reservoir for agricultural and milling purposes is sufficient to cover its condemnation for power, manufacturing, and "other beneficial uses and purposes," where no suggestion is made of an intended use which is not directly or indirectly associated or connected with uses expressly authorized.
2. Absence of power to condemn, for a reservoir, land situated within a government forest reserve cannot be urged by a private individual to defeat the condemnation proceedings.
3. A reservoir company cannot take, by right of eminent domain, land devoted to the purposes of a railroad, unless such taking is required by public necessity; and the facts that the site is the only available one on the stream, and that the railroad company might procure an equally available location for its purposes elsewhere, are immaterial.
4. A company seeking to acquire for a reservoir site, by right of eminent domain, land claimed by a railroad company cannot, for the purpose of defeating the latter's right in the property, attack its corporate existence, or assert that it has not sufficiently complied with the law to give it a right to the property.
5. The state cannot intervene in a proceeding to condemn for reservoir purposes land claimed by a railroad company, for the purpose of obtaining a forfeiture of the latter's rights, where it has no claim to the property in controversy, and no interest in the subject-matter of the dispute, and the result of the intervention will be to change the entire character of the action.
6. The mere laying of rails upon a right of way is not sufficient to protect the property from appropriation for other public uses, if the property has been held by various railroad companies for many years without any attempt by them to utilize it, and the rails are laid only a short time before the proceedings are instituted to acquire adverse title to the property, and three years after the one seeking title has commenced to expend money on the property; and the fact that the corporation laying them comes into existence only a short time before it begins to lay the rails is immaterial if its rights are acquired from other corporations which never made any attempt to construct a road.
7. A private corporation may exercise the right, given by the Constitution, to take private property for purposes of a reservoir, upon property of a railroad company which is not held for public use.

8. A denial of the right to take property by right of eminent domain upon the issues made by the pleadings after hearing testimony introduced upon motion for the appointment of commissioners, and motion to dismiss, is a final judgment, which may be reviewed by the appellate court.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding instituted to condemn land for a reservoir site. Reversed.

Statement by Gabbert, J.:

Plaintiff in error, as petitioner, commenced an action in the district court to condemn a piece of land for a reservoir site. To this proceeding defendants in error were made respondents. On the trial of the issues made by the pleadings, the court rendered judgment denying the right of petitioner to condemn the premises sought to be taken. From this judgment, petitioner brings the case here for review on error. Since the case was brought here, the people, through the attorney general, have filed a petition in intervention, and ask to intervene, which petition certain of the respondents move to strike from the files. These same respondents also move to dismiss the writ of error. The necessary facts and statements in the pleadings for an understanding of the questions discussed and determined appear in the opinion. For convenience, when named, the petitioner will be referred to as the "power company," and the respondents the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company as the "Rio Grande company," the Denver, Leadville, & Gunnison Railway Company as the "Leadville company," the Denver, Cripple Creek, & Southwestern Railroad Company as the "Cripple Creek company," and the Colorado & Southern Railway Company as the "Colorado Southern." The only respondents appearing here are the Leadville, Cripple Creek, and Colorado Southern companies.

The premises sought to be condemned by the plaintiff in error were already appropriated to a public use, and therefore, under the Constitution and statutes of this state, could not be taken by the petitioner.

Gabbert, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for respondents present two propositions which go directly to the authority of petitioner to condemn the lands in question, and we shall, therefore, consider these matters first. The power of the petitioner to condemn is challenged upon the ground that, under the Constitution of the state, it cannot take lands for a reservoir site for all the purposes mentioned in its articles of incorporation, and the joinder of nonpermissible purposes with those which are permissible deprives petitioner of the right to condemn for any. Section 14, art. 2, of the Constitution, provides "that private property shall not be taken for private use . . . except for reservoirs . . . for agricultural, mining, milling, domestic, or sanitary purposes." The articles of incorporation of petitioner recite that its objects and purposes are "to procure . . . reservoirs . . . for the storage and use of water for power, irrigation, mining, milling, manufacturing, and other beneficial uses and purposes." According to the petition, petitioner seeks to condemn for the purposes mentioned in its articles of incorporation, and it is therefore urged that petitioner is seeking to utilize the proposed reservoir site for "power," "manufacturing," and "other beneficial uses and purposes," which, it is said, are not uses recognized by the Constitution for which a reservoir site may be condemned. This view is not tenable. The Constitution does provide that a reservoir site may be taken for milling purposes, and the term "milling," as employed in the Constitution, is synonymous with "manufacturing." Lamborn v. Bell, 18 Colo. 346, 20 L. R. A. 241, 32 Pac. 989. The word "power," as used in the articles of incorporation and petition, clearly means a manufactured product.—the produce of a manufacturing establishment. No use is suggested which, under "other beneficial uses and purposes," would not directly or indirectly be associated or connected with one or more of the uses for which a reservoir site may be taken, according to the express terms of the provisions of the Constitution under consideration. We conclude, therefore, that no purposes are claimed different from those embraced within the provisions of the Constitution, if the purposes therein mentioned had been specified in the articles of incorporation, and nothing more.

The next point urged against the authority of petitioner to condemn is based upon the ground that the reservoir site is within the limits of a forest reserve of the United States, and it is therefore urged that, in the absence of a showing by petitioner of a compliance with the law relative to the location of reservoir sites on such reserves, it cannot take the lands in question. This proposition is not unlike the one raised in Union P. R. Co. v. Colorado Postal Teleg. Cable Co. (Colo.) 69 Pac. 564, where it was urged that the telegraph company could not condemn a right of way over lands extending through incorporated towns in the absence of a showing that it had obtained leave from the municipal authorities to erect its line along the streets and alleys of such towns. It was decided that the question was one which did not concern the railroad company. The fact that petitioner may not have leave from the government to maintain a reservoir site upon a forest reserve, if such leave is necessary, or has not complied with the law in this respect, if such is the case, may affect the ability of petitioner to enjoy the lands sought to be condemned, but does not affect its power to condemn such lands as against the respondents. They cannot raise a question which does not concern them, or which rests solely between the petitioner and the government. A further ground is also urged on behalf of respondents against the authority of petitioner to exercise the right of eminent domain, which will be noticed later.

We shall now consider the propositions urged on behalf of counsel for petitioner in support of their contention that the judgment of the court below should be reversed. The trial court determined that property held for a public use could not be taken, under the exercise of the power of eminent domain, when such taking entirely prevented its use for the public purposes to which it was devoted. This conclusion, it is claimed, is erroneous, for the reason, as we understand the argument of counsel, that corporate property devoted to a public use is subject to condemnation the same as private property of individuals, and may be taken for a different public use, even though such taking would render it impossible for the party from whom taken to in any manner utilize it for the purpose to which it was devoted, provided the requisite degree of necessity for the second taking be shown to exist, or where the party from whom taken can secure other property equally available. In support of this proposition we are referred to § 8, art. 15, of the Constitution, which provides: "The right of eminent domain shall never be abridged, nor so construed as to prevent the general assembly from taking the property and franchises of incorporated companies and subjecting them to public use the same as the property of individuals." It is unnecessary to attempt an analysis of this constitutional provision,—whether or not it is self-executing, or the legislature has provided laws by which its provisions may be enforced,—further than to say that neither the constitutional provision referred to, nor any statute to which our attention has been directed, changes or modifies the general rule that property already devoted to a public use cannot be taken for another in such manner or to such an extent that the use to which it is devoted will be wholly defeated or superseded, unless the power to so take be granted expressly or by necessary implication (Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Belle Centre, 48 Ohio St. 273, 27 N. E. 464; Seymour v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 126 Ind. 466, 26 N. E. 188; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Seneca County, 57 Fed. 945; Little Miami R. Co. v. Dayton, 23 Ohio St. 510), except it may be in cases where a public exigency requires that it be taken. If the property sought to be condemned is already devoted to railroad purposes, then the facts which we consider as established by the record, or as claimed to exist by counsel, do not authorize the petitioner to take the property of the respondents. As we understand the record, the property to be condemned is claimed as a right of way for railroad purposes by the Colorado Southern and Rio Grande companies, or at least wholly includes lands which these companies claim for such purposes; and that it is the intention of petitioner to utilize those lands by the construction and maintenance of a dam and reservoir, which will submerge them for a distance of 7 or 8 miles. It is claimed that the railroad companies can build a line of railroad around the proposed reservoir site at some additional cost, which will be equally as good as one constructed over their present rights of way; that the necessity of the reservoir company to such site is absolute, because it must take the bed of the stream or abandon its enterprise. Conceding that petitioner has the right, under the laws of the state, to ordinarily exercise the right of eminent domain in acquiring property held for railroad purposes, no statute is pointed out which would authorize it to take such property to an extent which would totally deprive the railroad companies of its use. No public exigency is shown to exist of a character which demands the location of a reservoir site at the point selected by petitioner. It may be true that the site thus selected is convenient, or it may even be true that it is the only available one on the stream; but that is a matter which affects the rights of petitioner, and not the public. It is not claimed that, in order to serve the needs of any community, it is necessary that the reservoir site be located at this particular point, or in fact at any. While it may be true that the enterprise of petitioner is public in its nature, the public necessity which must be shown to exist before it can entirely deprive respondents of their lands is the necessity of the public to be in some manner served by the projected enterprise, and not the necessities of the projector, in order to make such enterprise a success. So far as the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain for public uses is concerned, it is based upon the theory that the property granted the subject is upon the condition that it may be retaken to serve the necessities of the sovereign power (Mills, Em. Dom. § 1; United States v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 27 L. ed. 1015, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346), and to this end agencies created by the state, the purpose of which is to serve the public, may exercise this right. Where, however, land is already devoted to a public use, it would be wholly unreasonable to permit it to be taken for another public use which would nullify and defeat the one to which it is already devoted, except in cases where the overwhelming necessities of the public were such that, in order to serve their needs, or supply their necessities, the taking of such property became necessary. Unless so limited, no rule governing the rights of those engaged in conducting a business for the benefit of the public could be formulated which would afford them protection against others desiring to also engage in the transaction of a public business. While corporations engaged in business of a nature which requires them to serve the public are said to be public corporations, they are, in fact, but private enterprises, inaugurated for the benefit of their stockholders; and if one such corporation may take the property of another so as to deprive the latter of the use to which it is devoted, except public necessity demands such taking, there would be no reasonable limit to the conditions under which the power of eminent domain might be exercised. Without the limitation suggested, the most absurd results could follow. The second might take from the first, others take from the latter, and the first turn about and retake, and thus the process go on ad infinitum. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Seneca County, 57 Fed. 945. The taking of property already devoted to a public use to an extent which wholly defeats such use, for another public use, cannot be justified when it would merely result in a change of ownership, without in any manner tending to meet or serve the exigencies of public needs, or where the change of ownership would become a mere matter of private concern. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 112 Ill. 589. In the circumstances of this case neither comparative convenience, benefits, nor cost to the respective parties can be taken into consideration.

The next point urged is that the Colorado Southern has no interest in the property in dispute as a right of way for railroad purposes. In support of this contention two propositions are urged: (1) That parallel and competing lines of railroad cannot be consolidated under the Constitution and laws of this state; and (2) that neither the Colorado Southern nor its grantors have complied with the law of the United States relative to the steps which must be taken in order to hold a right of way for railroad purposes obtained from the general government, and that a failure on the part of the grantors of the Colorado Southern to comply with the law of the state with respect to the construction of railroads by corporations organized under the laws of this state resulted in a dissolution of their corporate 60 L. R. A.

existence before the Colorado Southern purchased such right of way from those companies. We do not deem it necessary to state the facts upon which these claims are based. It is averred in the petition that the Rio Grande company owns a right of way through the lands which it is intended to include in the reservoir site, and that the Leadville, Cripple Creek, and Colorado Southern companies each claim an interest in the property sought to be condemned, the nature and extent of which is unknown. These several parties are made respondents. The prayer is to the effect that the right and interest of the several respondents be assessed according to the statute; for a decree that petitioner have the right to appropriate and occupy the premises for a reservoir site; and that the compensation of respondents and each of them be fixed, when ascertained. One whose rights are not injuriously affected cannot complain that a corporation has acted in excess of its powers, or without warrant of law. 6 Thomp. Corp. § 6030; Taylor, Priv. Corp. 3d ed. § 281; New Orleans & M. T. R. Co. v. Ellerman, 105 U. S. 166, 23 L. ed. 1015; New England R. Co. v. Central R. & Electric Co. 69 Conn. 47, 36 Atl. 1061. The ultimate object of this action, so far as petitioner is concerned, is to acquire the title of respondents in the right or rights of way through the reservoir site. Petitioner has no interest in these premises. In compliance with the statute, it has made all claimants to any interest in them parties respondent in order that they may have an opportunity to establish the damages which they will sustain by taking the land in question. It is wholly immaterial to petitioner what the respective interests of these parties may be. If the law under which these rights were acquired by the respondents has been violated, or not complied with, certainly no rights of petitioner have thereby been invaded, because at no time has it had any interest to be affected. It cannot assume the inconsistent positions of conceding, by commencing an action to condemn, that it has no interest in the premises in dispute, and then, after bringing in the parties whom it says do own, or claim to own, some interest, assert that they have none. Its right to condemn depends primarily upon the fact that the land thus sought to be taken belongs to another. Colorado M. R. Co. v. Croman, 16 Colo. 381, 27 Pac. 256. It must pay for the land taken. As to which respondent may be the owner of such land, the petitioner has no interest, further than to bring before the court those claiming an interest. If any dispute exists between these parties as to which may be the owner, that is a matter which they must settle between themselves. When the damages are assessed for taking the disputed premises, if the case reaches that stage, the amount which must be paid on this account can be turned into the registry of the court by the petitioner, and the parties who claim to be entitled to it can have that matter adjudicated. Petitioner cannot convert the action into one to quiet title or forfeit corporate or property rights. So far as it is concerned, it must remain an action to condemn, and no issue can be injected into the case by it which will change its character in this respect. Colorado M. R. Co. v. Croman, 16 Colo. 381, 27 Pac. 256. Many authorities are cited by counsel in support of the propositions just considered, but they are not in point. They were cases brought either directly for the purpose of testing such questions, or to forfeit corporate rights, or where the authority of a corporation seeking to exercise the power of eminent domain was challenged.

In this connection we shall dispose of the petition of intervention. Since the cause was brought here, the people, through the attorney general, have filed a petition, and ask to be permitted to intervene. In this petition facts are alleged from which it is claimed the conclusion can be deduced that the railroad companies have no interest in the premises embraced in the proposed reservoir site. The evident purpose and object of the intervention is to forfeit the corporate rights and franchises of the respondent railroad companies in the premises sought to be taken. The Leadville, Cripple Creek, and Colorado Southern companies move to strike this petition from the files. We are cited to decisions of this court where parties have been permitted to intervene in condemnation proceedings. In those cases the interveners were interested in the subject-matter of controversy. No such interest is exhibited by the people in this instance. They have no claim whatever to any part of the premises sought to be condemned, and are entitled to no damages which may be awarded. It is only parties who have an interest in the subject-matter of dispute between litigants who are entitled to intervene. Aside from these considerations, an intervention cannot be permitted when the result would be to change the entire character of the action,—as in this instance, from proceedings in condemnation to that of quo warranto. Cases are cited from this and other courts where language has been employed to the effect that the sovereignty conferring a franchise may at any time and in its own appointed way and form inquire into the manner in which the franchise granted is used. Those cases, however, were where the court had under consideration the method provided for direct proceedings in quo warranto, and have no application whatever to the case at bar, in view of the fact that it is a condemnation proceeding pure and simple, and cannot be converted into one of an entirely different character and nature, which would eliminate that feature as between petitioner and either of the respondents.

At the oral argument it was suggested that the Colorado Southern could not successfully object to the condemnation of the right of way in question, for the reason that it has never been used for railroad purposes. The trial judge found that at the time the petition in condemnation was filed the Colorado Southern "was in possession of the premises sought to be taken, and had constructed thereon, and had in operation, a line of railroad," and concluded "the lands so occupied and used were by such occupation and use devoted to public purposes." This finding and conclusion are not supported by the evidence, in the circumstances of this case. It appears from the pleadings and evidence and the claims of the respective parties that the predecessor in interest of the Rio Grande company made claim to this right of way about 1883, and subsequently constructed a railroad grade thereon. According to the answer of the respondents the Leadville, Cripple Creek, and Colorado Southern companies, the Leadville company, about 1889, made claim to the same right of way; that by virtue of an act of Congress passed in 1896 the Cripple Creek company claims to have acquired this right of way, or an interest therein; and that the Colorado Southern, organized in 1898, purchased from the Leadville and Cripple Creek companies their rights therein. Neither of the railroads, except the predecessor of the Rio Grande company, ever did any work in the way of grading or constructing a road on this right of way until in September, 1899, at which time the Colorado Southern did lay rails and ties substantially or partially on the old grade belonging to the Rio Grande company, and through the lands embraced in the reservoir site. The petition in condemnation was filed in November, 1899. It does not appear that the Colorado Southern at this time was using the line constructed, or ever intended to use it, for railroad purposes. No claim is made that trains were run over such road for the purposes of traffic, or that it is the intention of the company to utilize this track for such purposes, or to extend its line of road beyond the point reached about the time these condemnation proceedings were instituted and heard below. In short, so far as advised from the present record, the laying of the rails and ties upon the right of way through the reservoir site appears to have been for the one purpose of merely showing the existence of a railroad at this point by putting in place the materials from which a railroad is usually constructed. We have said that property already devoted to a public use cannot be taken under the exercise of the power of eminent domain to an extent which will wholly defeat or supersede that use; but land which is not employed in, or needed for, such use is not within the reason or operation of this rule. Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Belle Centre, 48 Ohio St. 273, 27 N. E. 464. Corporations like railroad companies are organized for the transaction of public business, and to further this end it is the policy of the national and state governments to permit them to acquire rights of way over the public domain. Such rights, however, cannot be held indefinitely. They must, within a reasonable time, be subjected to the use for which they were granted. The general government, as well as this state, has provided laws which are intended to require railroad companies to complete their lines of road over a designated way within a definite period; otherwise the rights in the right of way to the incompleted part of the road shall revert or be forfeited. We refer to these, not for the purpose of establishing a forfeiture, but as indicating an intent on the part of Congress and the legislature of the state to prevent railroad companies from indefinitely holding a right of way to the exclusion of others who may desire to appropriate it to some other use. For something like sixteen years the right of way in question has been held by different companies for railroad purposes. During all that period it does not appear that it has ever actually been devoted to any such use. The fact that ties and rails were laid by the Colorado Southern a short time prior to the commencement of these proceedings is not sufficient to show conclusively, or even prima facie, after the lapse of so many years, that it is the bona fide intention of the company to construct or maintain a railroad over this right of way. True, the Colorado Southern had not been in existence a year at the time it did this work, but that is immaterial, in view of the fact that its rights to such right of way were acquired from other companies, which never made any attempt to construct a railroad over it. The mere laying of rails, in the absence of a showing of a bona fide purpose to construct and maintain a railroad, is of no avail. The right of way must actually be devoted to, or needed for, railroad purposes, and the outward semblance of the existence of a road which is not used is of no more avail than if none had been constructed.

The further point is made by the respondent railroad companies that petitioner has no power to condemn the right of way, because it is only a private corporation, and that a corporation of this character cannot condemn lands held for a public purpose. Whether petitioner is a public or private corporation is immaterial. As a private corporation, it is authorized, under the Constitution, as we have already pointed out, to condemn lands for a reservoir site. By the provisions of § 1716, 1 Mills's Anno. Stat., it is provided that under the act of eminent domain private property may be taken for private use for reservoirs for agricultural, mining, milling, domestic, or sanitary purposes. Property held by a public corporation, which is not devoted to or needed for a public use, is as much private property as though held by an individual. Hence it follows that, if the right of way is neither used nor needed for railroad purposes, it is private property, and petitioner, though a private corporation, may, under the provisions of the law on the subject of eminent domain, condemn for the purposes for which it is sought to be taken.

On behalf of the respondents, the Leadville, Cripple Creek, and Colorado Southern companies, a motion to dismiss was filed in this court, based upon the ground that it is without jurisdiction to hear or determine this case on error. No brief has been filed in support of this motion, but at oral argument it was suggested that final judgment had never been entered in the court below. The effect of the judgment rendered was to deny the right of petitioner to take the premises by condemnation proceedings. This was determined on the issues made by the pleadings, and the testimony introduced by the respective parties at the time when a motion which had been interposed by petitioner for the appointment of commissioners, and the motion of respondents to dismiss, were heard, and was a final judgment, because it denied the right of petitioner to condemn, and effectually settled the rights of the respective parties, so far as the proceedings in condemnation were concerned. The motion to strike the petition of intervention is sustained, and the motion to dismiss denied.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not in conflict with the views expressed, as though no trial had been had.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down July 5, 1902:

Per Curiam:

In determining what the evidence establishes with respect to the appropriation or need of the premises in dispute for railroad purposes, the record as a whole must be considered. Over three years elapsed between the date the power company commenced actual operations in the way of constructing a dam and the time when either of the respondents asserted any claim or objected to such use of these premises. During that period the power company expended many thousands of dollars in carrying on these operations. These are important features to consider in determining the good faith of the use and needs of the Colorado Southern company. The question of whether or not there has been such an appropriation by that company as will preclude the power company from now condemning the premises is not foreclosed. We have merely held that in the circumstances of this case a use and need for railroad purposes have not been established, and these questions are remitted to the trial court for determination in connection with such others as may be proper and in harmony with the views expressed in this and the principal opinion. The petition for rehearing is denied.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO & ALTON RAILWAY COMPANY, App't.,
v.
City of CARLINVILLE.

(200 Ill. 314.)

1. The reasonableness of an ordinance limiting the speed of trains within municipal limits, passed under general statutory authority, which merely prescribes the minimum rate, without prescribing the details of the regulation, is subject to review by the courts.
2. That an ordinance limiting the speed of railroad trains within the corporate limits will prevent the railroad company from giving its passengers the service they demand, and also its successful competition with rival roads, does not make the ordinance void for unreasonableness.
3. An ordinance limiting the speed of trains to 10 miles per hour within the corporate limits is not unreasonable, where the road lies for a mile and a quarter within such limits, and crosses four streets, two of which are main thoroughfares, and buildings located near the road obstruct, to a considerable extent, a view of the tracks and approaching trains, although the principal part of the buildings of the municipality are located to one side of the road.
4. An ordinance limiting the speed of trains on an interstate railway which carries United States mail to 10 miles an hour within the corporate limits of the municipality, which is passed for the safety of the public and the protection of life and property, is not void as imposing an unreasonable restriction upon interstate commerce and the speedy transportation of the mail.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit brought by the appellee against the appellant before a police magistrate to recover a penalty for a violation of the following ordinance of the city of Carlinville: "Sec. 261. No railroad company, or conductor, engineer, or other employee of such company managing or controlling any locomotive engine, car, or train upon any railroad track, shall run, or permit to be run, within the limits of said city, any passenger train or car at a greater rate of speed than 10 miles per hour, nor any freight train or car at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles per hour, under a penalty, in either case, of not exceeding $25 for each offense." A trial was had, and judgment was rendered against the appellant, from which it appealed to the circuit court, where a jury was waived, and a trial had before the court, which resulted in a judgment against the appellant for $5 and costs, which judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court for the third district, and a further appeal has been prosecuted to this court.

The appellant objected to the introduction of said ordinance in evidence on two grounds: First, that said ordinance was unreasonable, and therefore void; second, that said ordinance is an unreasonable restriction upon interstate commerce, and an unnecessary hindrance to the speedy carrying of the United States mail, and in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The court overruled said objections, and admitted the ordinance in evidence, to which ruling of the court the appellant excepted, and has assigned the same as error in this court. The objections will be disposed of in the order in which they were made and are here presented.

The city of Carlinville is located upon the main line of the appellant's railroad, and is about midway between the cities of Springfield and East St. Louis. It has a population of about 3,600, and is the county seat of Macoupin county. The tracks of appellant run through the incorporated limits of the city from the northeast towards the southwest for about one mile and a quarter. The principal part of the city is located on the east side of its tracks, which cross four streets within the city, two of which are among the principal thoroughfares of the city. The city has the usual residences, stores, shops, and public buildings common to a county seat of its size, and a coal shaft, grain elevator, and pickle factory are located within the city near the main line of appellant, which obstruct, to a considerable extent, the view of its tracks and approaching trains. The Alton Limited is a fast train, which was equipped for the accommodation of through passengers between the cities of Chicago and St. Louis. It makes but few stops, and runs in competition with similar trains operated between said points by the Illinois Central and Wabash railroads, which very nearly parallel its route. The distance between Chicago and St. Louis by appellant's line is about 280 miles, about 65 miles of which is within incorporated cities, towns, and villages in the state of Illinois. The distance between said cities by the other railroads referred to is about the same as that over appellant's line, but the Illinois Central and Wabash railroads have a less amount of track within the limits of incorporated cities, towns, and villages. The Alton Limited schedule time between Chicago and St. Louis is seven and three fourths hours. It carries the United States mail, and runs to make connection with railroad lines from the east and northwest entering and leaving Chicago, and from the west and southwest entering and leaving St. Louis, carrying through passengers and the United States mail. It was admitted that the Alton Limited had been run by the appellant within the incorporated limits of the city of Carlinville at from 50 to 60 miles per hour, and at a prohibited rate of speed, and in violation of said ordinance, if said ordinance was valid, and binding upon it. The city of Carlinville is organized under the general law providing for the incorporation of cities and villages, and passed the ordinance in question under and by virtue of the power conferred upon it by that act, subject to the limitation imposed by the act in regard to fencing and operating railroads. Paragraph 21 of § 1 of article 5 of the general incorporation act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, p. 275) provides that cities shall have the right "to regulate the speed of . . . cars and locomotives within the limits of the corporation," and § 24 of the act in regard to fencing and operating railroads (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, p. 1332) provides "that no such ordinance shall limit the rate of speed, in case of passenger trains to less than 10 miles per hour, nor in any other case to less than 6 miles per hour." Subject to the limitation that no ordinance shall be passed which limits the speed of a passenger train to less than 10 miles per hour, and in any other cases to less than 6 miles per hour, the matter of regulating the speed of trains within incorporated cities and villages is left entirely to the municipal authorities. Lake View v. Tate, 130 Ill. 247, 6 L. R. A. 18, 22 N. E. 791. That cities and villages have the power, by ordinance, to regulate the speed of trains within their corporate limits, is recognized by the courts of this country, so far as we have been able to discover, without exception, provided such regulation is reasonable. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Deacon, 63 Ill. 91; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Haggerty, 67 Ill. 113; Meyers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 555, 42 Am. Rep. 50, 10 N. W. 898; Crowley v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 658, 20 N. W. 467, 22 N. W. 918; Whitson v. Franklin, 34 Ind. 392; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Harrington, 131 Ind. 426, 30 N. E. 37; Weyl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 40 Minn. 350, 42 N. W. 24. In Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Deacon, 63 Ill. 91, on page 93, it is said: "Though the legislature has granted franchises to railway corporations, and authorized them to procure the right of way and operate their trains by the power of steam, yet they have not unlimited discretion in the regulation of the speed of trains. They cannot act recklessly, and in disregard of the safety and rights of others. The state has reserved to itself the power to enact all police laws necessary and proper to secure and protect the life and property of the citizen. Prominent amongst the rights reserved, and which must inhere in the state, is the power to regulate the approaches to and the crossing of public highways and the passage through cities and villages, where life and property are constantly in imminent danger by the rapid and fearful speed of railway trains. The exercise of their franchises by corporations must yield to the public exigencies and the safety of the community." In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Haggerty, 67 Ill. 113, an objection was made to the admission in evidence of an ordinance of the town of Camp Point prohibiting the running of trains within the town at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles per hour. On page 115, 67 Ill., the court says: "It is contended that the ordinance is null and void because the town had no authority to pass such an ordinance, and because the company was expressly authorized by law to fix and regulate the rate of speed of trains upon its road. There is no grant of power to this town, in express terms, to regulate the rate of speed of railway trains passing through the town, but by its charter (Private Laws 1857, pp. 540, 541) the board of trustees of the town have the power to declare what shall be considered as nuisances, and to prevent and remove the same, and to regulate the police of the town, and to make such ordinances as the good of the inhabitants of the town may require. Under these powers we think the town possessed the authority so to order the use of private property within its limits as to prevent its proving dangerous to the safety of the persons and property of citizens; and we view the ordinance in question as but a police regulation for the preservation of the safety of persons and property, the adoption of which was no more than a fair exercise of the police power vested in the town."

The books and reported cases seem to agree that courts may declare void an ordinance passed by a city or village by virtue of its implied powers, if, in the opinion of the court, it is unreasonable; but when the ordinance is passed by express authority conferred upon the municipality by the legislature, such power is not so clear, and there is conflict of authority upon that proposition. Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 100, 57 N. W. 680. The rule adopted in this state is that, where the ordinance is passed in pursuance of power expressly conferred by the legislature, and the details of such municipal legislation are prescribed by the legislature, an ordinance passed in pursuance of such power cannot be held invalid by the courts as being unreasonable; but when the details of such legislation are not prescribed, an ordinance passed in pursuance of such power must be a reasonable exercise thereof, or it will be pronounced invalid. Lake View v. Tate, 130 Ill. 247, 6 L. R. A. 268, 22 N. E. 791; Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 373; Wice v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 193 Ill. 351, 56 L. R. A. 268, 61 N. E. 1084. It is said in the Tate Case, on page 252, 130 Ill., page 269, 6 L. R. A., and on page 793, 22 N. E.: "Where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred, and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, then the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power, or it will be pronounced invalid." In Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L. R. A. 225, 42 N. E. 373, Mr. Justice Baker, in speaking for the court, in discussing the question when a court may rightfully hold an ordinance unreasonable, on page 658, 158 Ill., page 227, 30 L. R. A., and page 374, 42 N. E., said: "Where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred on a municipal corporation, yet, if the details of such legislation are not prescribed by the legislature, there the ordinance passed in pursuance of such power must be a reasonable exercise thereof, or it will be pronounced invalid." The Hawes Case was cited in Wice v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 193 Ill. 351, 56 L. R. A. 268, 61 N. E. 1084, and the language thereof quoted with approval. The legislature did not distinctly say what may be done by municipalities in regulating the speed of trains passing through their limits. It only said that the speed of trains should not be limited below a certain rate per hour, and with that exception left the matter wholly within the discretion of the municipal authorities; and we think it clear the legislature did not prescribe the details to be observed in the passage of an ordinance regulating the speed of trains in their passage through incorporated cities and villages, and that the court has the power to decide such an ordinance as this invalid if it clearly appear that it be an unreasonable exercise of such power. This ordinance, to be valid, must not, therefore, be unreasonable. The presumption, however, is in favor of its validity, and that it is reasonable, and it is incumbent upon appellant to point out and show affirmatively wherein such unreasonableness consists. People ex rel. Morrison v. Cregier, 138 Ill. 401, 28 N. E. 812. Ordinances of the character of the one under consideration are passed under and by virtue of the police power, which has been defined, in general terms, "as comprehending the making and enforcement of all such laws, ordinances, and regulations as pertain to the comfort, safety, health, convenience, good order, and welfare of the public." Culver v. Streator, 130 Ill. 238, 6 L. R. A. 270, 22 N. E. 810. The determination of the question whether or not the ordinance in question was reasonably necessary for the protection of life and property within the city was committed in the first instance to the municipal authorities thereof by the legislature. When they have acted, and passed an ordinance, it is presumptively valid, and, before a court would be justified in holding their action invalid, the unreasonableness or want of necessity of such a measure for the public safety and for the protection of life and property should be clearly made to appear. It should be manifest that the discretion imposed in the municipal authorities has been abused by the exercise of the power conferred by acting in an arbitrary manner. Knobloch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 31 Minn. 402, 18 N. W. 106; Evison v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 370, 11 L. R. A. 434, 48 N. W. 6. The argument of appellant amounts to but this: If this ordinance and similar ordinances in the other municipalities along its line are valid and are enforced, its schedule time must be lengthened, the effect of which will be that it will be unable to give to its patrons the service which they demand, and which its competitors offer them; and it cannot successfully operate its road. This may seem, in some degree, to be true. But a requirement that it stop its trains at railroad crossings and drawbridges has the same effect; still such regulations are held valid. The mere fact that an ordinance may operate to restrain trade or retard rapid transportation will not justify a court in holding an ordinance invalid regulating the speed of trains when the speed limit is not below that prescribed by the legislature, and when it does not clearly appear that such ordinance is unreasonable and unnecessary for the safety of the public and for the protection of life and property. "An ordinance of this character may restrain trade, and yet be necessary and reasonable as a police regulation. The rapid transaction of business by the railway company may be hindered and trammelled by an ordinance controlling and regulating the rate of speed with which railway trains may be sent over and through the streets and populous portions of our towns and cities; but, when necessary for the proper protection of life and property, the celerity and despatch with which business may be accomplished is but secondary." Weyl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 40 Minn. 351, 42 N. W. 24. In Knobloch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 31 60 L. R. A.

Minn. 402, 18 N. W. 106, which was an action for damages, the supreme court of Minnesota held an ordinance limiting the speed of trains within the city of St. Paul to 4 miles per hour not to be unreasonable, although the accident took place at a crossing in a sparsely settled portion of the city. To the same effect is Weyl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 40 Minn. 350, 42 N. W. 24. The court of appeals of the state of New York in Buffalo v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 152 N. Y. 276, 46 N. E. 496, held an ordinance limiting the speed of trains in the city of Buffalo to 6 miles an hour reasonable. In Whitson v. Franklin, 34 Ind. 392, the supreme court of Indiana held an ordinance limiting the speed of trains in the city of Franklin to 4 miles per hour reasonable. In Larkin v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 492, 52 N. W. 480, the supreme court of Iowa sustained an ordinance prohibiting passenger trains from running at a higher rate of speed than 10 miles per hour through the corporate limits of West Liberty, where it appeared the crossing at which the injury took place was $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from the depot, the principal part of the town on the east side of the railroad, and the land upon the west side of the track used mainly for agricultural purposes.

The appellant has cited three cases, in each of which a speed ordinance was held invalid by reason of the limitation as to the time per hour in which trains were permitted to run within the corporate limits of a city: Evison v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 370, 11 L. R. A. 434, 48 N. W. 6; Meyers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 555, 42 Am. Rep. 50, 10 N. W. 896, and Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 100, 57 N. W. 680. In each of these cases the train was running through a sparsely settled section of the outskirts of the city, at a point where the court held there was no necessity that the speed of the train be decreased for the safety of the public, or the protection of life and property. In each case (they being actions to recover damages) the ordinance was held void as applied to the particular place where the injury occurred, and not as to the entire ordinance, while here the ordinance is challenged as a whole. We have no doubt an ordinance may provide for different rates of speed upon the same line of railroad in different sections of a city or village, as one part thereof may run through a thickly settled section, while another part may run through a sparsely populated section, where there are but few inhabitants, and where the possibilities that an injury to persons or property would occur would be extremely improbable. Lake View v. Tate, 130 Ill. 247 6 L. R. A. 268, 22 N. E. 791. Taking into consideration the existing circumstances and conditions, the necessity for its adoption, the object sought to be accomplished, and the effect upon the business of the appellant, we are unable to say the ordinance is unreasonable, but are of the opinion that it is a valid exercise of the police power by the city.

The next question which presents itself for consideration is, Does the ordinance in question impose an unreasonable restriction upon interstate commerce and the speedy transportation of the United States mail? We are of the opinion it does not. The ordinance was passed as a police regulation for the preservation of the safety of the public and the protection of life and property, and was no more than a fair exercise of the police power vested in the city. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Deacon, 63 Ill. 91; and Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Haggerty, 67 Ill. 113. The ordinance does not undertake to regulate commerce between the states, or interfere with the transportation of the mail, and amounts to but a reasonable regulation of the speed of trains within the corporate limits of the city, and such legislation has uniformly been held to be valid. In Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819, approved in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564, it was held that a statute of Indiana giving a right of action to the personal representatives of the deceased, where his death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, was applicable to the case of a loss of life occasioned by a collision between steamboats navigating the Ohio river, engaged in interstate commerce, and did not amount to a regulation of commerce, in violation of the Constitution of the United States. On this point the court said (p. 103, 93 U. S., and 23 L. ed. 819) "General legislation of this kind, prescribing the liabilities or duties of citizens of a state, without distinction as to pursuit or calling, is not open to any valid objection because it may affect persons engaged in foreign or interstate commerce. Objection might with equal propriety be urged against legislation prescribing the form in which contracts shall be authenticated or property descend or be distributed on the death of its owner, because applicable to the contracts or estates of persons engaged in such commerce. In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce, it was never intended to cut the states off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation in a great variety of ways may affect commerce and persons engaged in it, without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution. . . . And it may be said, generally, that the legislation of a state not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit." In Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 388, 1191, it was held that in case of a railroad whose construction had been aided by Congress, so 60 L. R. A.

as to establish a route of travel through several states, a state has the power to make all needful regulations of a police character for the government of the company operating the road within the jurisdiction of the state; and it was there said: "By the settled rule of decision in this court . . . it may make all needful regulations of a police character for the government of the company while operating its road in that jurisdiction. In this way it may certainly require the company to fence so much of its road as lies within the state; to stop its train at railroad crossings; to slacken speed while running in a crowded thoroughfare; to post its tariffs and timetables at proper places; and other things of a kindred character affecting the comfort, the convenience, or the safety of those who are entitled to look to the state for protection against the wrongful or negligent conduct of others." In Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 61, 35 L. ed. 654, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Bradley, said: "It is also within the undoubted province of the state legislature to make regulations with regard to the speed of railroad trains in the neighborhood of cities and towns; with regard to the precautions to be taken in the approach of such trains to bridges, tunnels, deep cuts, and sharp curves; and, generally, with regard to all operations in which the lives and health of people may be endangered, even though such regulations affect, to some extent, the operations of interstate commerce. Such regulations are eminently local in their character, and, in the absence of congressional regulations over the same subject, are free from all constitutional objections and unquestionably valid." In Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514, 44 L. ed. 868, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722, wherein the court held the statute of this state requiring all regular passenger trains to stop at county seats to be unconstitutional, as constituting a direct burden upon interstate commerce, so far as it required through interstate passenger trains to stop at such stations when adequate train service, had otherwise been provided for local traffic, in distinguishing that case from a class of cases similar to the case at bar, the court said: "The distinction between this statute and regulations requiring passenger trains to stop at railroad crossings and drawbridges, and to reduce the speed of trains when running through crowded thoroughfares, requiring its tracks to be fenced, and a bell and whistle to be attached to each engine, signal lights to be carried at night, and tariff and timetables to be posted at proper places, and other similar requirements contributing to the safety, comfort, and convenience of their patrons, is too obvious to require discussion." We think it clear that the Supreme Court of the United States, as shown by the above decisions, is committed to the doctrine announced by this court in numerous cases, to the effect that the passage of this ordinance was a valid exercise of the police power. In Whitson v. Franklin, 34 Ind. 392, it was ruled that the ordinance passed upon in that case, which limited the speed to 4 miles per hour, was not invalid on the ground that the railroad company was engaged in carrying the mail under a contract with the United States, and was required, by its contract, to transport the mail within a prescribed time, which could not be done if the towns and cities through which the road ran were allowed to regulate the speed of trains in passing through them. And in Clark v. Boston & M. R. Co. 64 N. H. 323, 10 Atl. 676, the supreme court of New Hampshire held that the fact that a railroad was engaged in interstate commerce does not deprive the legislature of the state through which it passes of the power to limit the rate of speed to 6 miles an hour across a highway in or near the compact part of a town. We find nothing in Illinois C. R. Co.

v. Illinois, 163 U. S. 142, 41 L. ed. 107, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1096, and Cleveland, O. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514, 44 L. ed. 866, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722, in conflict with the former decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, or the views herein above expressed. Those cases held the statute requiring passenger trains to stop at county seats in Illinois, as applied to the facts then before the court, an unreasonable restriction upon interstate commerce and the speedy transportation of the mail, but recognized the right of the state to make all necessary police regulations, and particularly pointed out legislation of the character of this as being within the police power.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

BALTIMORE & OHIO SOUTHWESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt., v.

Charles ADAMS.

1. Violation of a state statute in sending a claim out of the state for the purpose of garnishment will not deprive the garnishee of the protection of the foreign judgment, under which he pays the claim, from liability to pay the debt a second time to his creditor within the state, if he has disclosed all defenses within his knowledge to the foreign court, and notified the debtor of the proceedings, notwithstanding which the foreign court, which has jurisdiction over the parties and the res, compelled him to pay the claim.
2. The effect of a foreign judgment against a garnishee to protect him from paying the claim a second time to the principal debtor will not be defeated by the fact that, after the foreign proceedings were instituted, the principal debtor brought suit upon the claim against the garnishee within the state, which he pressed to judgment before the foreign judgment was entered.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover compensation for services performed, which defendant claimed to have paid, under garnishment proceedings, to a third person. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Gillett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee commenced this suit before the judge of the city court of Seymour to recover for services performed by him. There was an appeal to the court below. In the latter court appellant asserted a partial defense, based on the fact that it had been garnished before a justice of the peace in the state of Kentucky on account of the indebtedness here sued for, and that it had been compelled to pay the judgment of garnishment rendered in said cause. The record of the justice of the peace was exhibited, and a full showing made as to the statute and unwritten law of Kentucky relative to his jurisdiction. There was a finding and judgment for appellee in the circuit court for the full amount of his claim. Appellant unsuccessfully moved for a new trial. By a proper assignment of error, based on the overruling of said motion, appellant questions the correctness of the finding below, and here contends that "the decision of the court is contrary to law, in this: that it does not give full faith and credit to the records and judicial proceedings of the state of Kentucky." It is not necessary to set out the proceedings of said Kentucky court in detail, further than to state that appellee had personal notice of said suit. No question is raised as to the jurisdiction of the Kentucky court over the res, or as to its jurisdiction over the parties litigant in this action. See, upon the subject of jurisdiction, Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797. If the judgment is valid, there has been a sequestration of the original debt; and if it can be said that the appellant has been compelled to pay the same to a third person, it should now be credited with the payment.

It was declared by Prof. Kent that "it has become a settled principle in the English courts that where a debt has been recovered of a debtor under the process of foreign attachment, fairly and not collusively, the recovery is a protection to the garnishee against his original creditor, and he may plead it in bar." 2 Kent, Com. 119. As said by Shaw, Ch. J., speaking for the supreme court of Massachusetts, in the case of Meriam v. Rundlett, 13 Pick. 511, 515: "He who pays under the judgment of a tribunal having legal jurisdiction to decide, and adequate power over the person or property, to compel obedience to its decisions, has an indisputable claim to protection." As stated by the supreme court of Connecticut: "It was his [the garnishee's] duty to pay it. He had no choice on the subject, and when paid he is entitled to the benefit of its being a coercive payment." Palmer v. Woodward, 28 Conn. 248, 251. In fact, as against a garnishee who has been compelled to pay a debt to another, after full disclosure of the material facts known to him, in compliance with a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, we do not think that an authority will be found that denies the garnishee protection. We cite, as supporting the rule, Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797; Harmon v. Birchard, 8 Blackf. 418; Enbree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101; Holmes v. Remsen, 4 Johns. Ch. 460, 8 Am. Dec. 581; Hull v. Blake, 13 Mass. 153; Wilkinson v. Hall, 6 Gray, 568; Barrow v. West, 23 Pick. 270; Cottle v. American Screw Co. 13 R. I. 627; Taylor v. Phelps, 1 Harr. & G. 492; Seward v. Heflin, 20 Vt. 144; Coates v. Roberts, 4 Rawle, 100; Wigmore v. Union Coal & Min. Co. 37 Iowa, 129; Smith v. Dickson, 58 Iowa, 444, 10 N. W. 850; 2 Black, Judgm. 2d ed. 598; Cuah. Trustee Process, 118; McConnell, Trustee Process, § 297.

It has been pointed out by Mr. Wade that attachment laws are purely statutory, and so loosely fitted into the general body of the law that it is difficult to formulate rules as to the duty of the garnishee. 2 Wade, Attachm. § 398. The governing principle of the garnishee's exemption from a second liability is the injustice of compelling him to pay, at the suit of his creditor, that which a court having authority so to do has compelled him to pay to another. It is obvious, therefore, that he must act fairly and without collusion. See cases last cited. Where the principal debtor is not actually in court, and there is reason to suppose that he is not advised of the suit, the garnishee ought at least to answer all facts within his knowledge, that, if the court were advised of, would presumably lead it to refuse to subject the fund to sequestration. As said in McConnell, Trustee Process, § 300, in speaking of the duties of the garnishee, to avoid a charge of laches: "If he could have prevented a judgment from being rendered by appearing, or if, having appeared, he denies a fact he ought to have disclosed, or does not disclose facts he ought to have disclosed, payment by him will be of no avail." But the whole burden of contesting the suit is not cast upon the garnishee. Thus he is not obliged to gratuitously defend the main action (Harmon v. Birchard, 8 Blackf. 418, Cottle v. American Screw Co. 13 R. I. 627), or to appeal, where a true disclosure has been made (Cottle v. American Screw Co. 13 R. I. 627; Webster v. Lowell, 2 Allen, 123;

Hull v. Blake, 13 Mass. 157). It was said in the latter case: "It is true, there are higher tribunals in the state to which the present defendant might have resorted, but we do not think that he was obliged to do so. It was enough for him to present to the court a true state of his relation to Billings, his creditor, and he might safely acquiesce in the decision of that tribunal to which the laws of the state had given authority over the subject."

We need not here undertake to state the measure of the garnishee's duty in all cases, but it may be said, so far as the main action is concerned, that, where the principal defendant has personal knowledge of the suit, the former is not bound to go further than to look to the jurisdiction, act fairly, and make a full disclosure. In Wigwall v. Union Coal & Min. Co. 37 Iowa, 130,—a case much like this,—it was said: "The defendant in this case has once paid the amount due plaintiff to a creditor of his, whereby plaintiff has had the full benefit of it. The defendant ought not to be required to pay the amount a second time, unless guilty of some negligence or wrong toward the plaintiff. The finding of facts show that the defendant answered truly and fully every known fact, and also stated that the plaintiff herein, its creditor, claimed to be the head of a family, whereby the debt sought to be garnished would be exempt. The plaintiff herein was a party to the case, and was fully notified of the garnishment proceedings. It was his duty to furnish defendant the information and means to prove the fact, or himself to prove it. Walters v. Washington Ins. Co. 1 Iowa, 404, 63 Am. Dec. 451; Drake, Attachm. §§ 717, 718, and cases cited; Wood v. Partridge, 11 Mass. 488. The plaintiff, having notice of the garnishment proceedings, and being in effect a party thereto, is bound or concluded by the judgment therein, as well as the defendant. It was his privilege and duty, if that judgment was erroneous, to have it set aside or appeal from it. He cannot allow it to stand, and at the same time impeach it collaterally. The garnishee, having answered truly and fully and in good faith, is entitled to protection." See also Webster v. Lowell, 2 Allen, 123; Morrison v. New Bedford Inst. for Savings, 7 Gray, 269; Boynton v. Fly, 12 Me. 17; Goddard v. Collins, 25 Vt. 712; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Meyer, 117 Ind. 563, 567, 19 N. E. 320, where the garnishee procured and filed the affidavit of the principal defendant, stating that the debt was exempt, but where no further steps were taken by way of defense, it was said by this court: "There were no facts found by the trial court which could justify an inference, even, that at the time of the institution of such proceeding in garnishment, and at all times since, Blazius Meyer was not and had not been a man of sound mind and mature years, and fully capable of interposing or causing to be interposed, at the proper time and place, every defense he had, or thought he had, legal or equitable, to such proceedings. Nor were any facts found by the court 60 L. R. A.

which would authorize the conclusion, whether of law or fact, that it was the duty of the defendant or of its attorneys, as such, to make any defense whatever for or on behalf of plaintiff, Meyer, to the proceeding in garnishment." As far back as the case of Harmon v. Birchard, 8 Blackf. 418, 419, this court said: "A garnishee in attachment is not bound to superintend a defense for the principal debtor, and is not answerable for such defects and irregularities in the proceedings as relate only to the mutual rights of the original parties to the attachment suit, but he should know that the proceedings against himself are valid, and such as he is legally compelled to obey." The case of Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Baker, 122 Ind. 433, 24 N. E. 83, rests on the ground that there was a lack of jurisdiction over the res, because the claim was exempt from garnishment under the laws of Missouri, where the proceeding was instituted. The failure to make disclosure of such a known defense might, even apart from the matter of jurisdiction, where the principal defendant had no notice, subject the garnishee to such an imputation of fraud or laches that he might be compelled to pay the debt again, but it cannot be held that the existence of the exemption laws of this state could be pleaded. It has often been held that exemption laws relate to the remedy, and have no extraterritorial effect. Bolton v. Pennsylvania Co. 38 Pa. 261; Leiber v. Union P. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 688; Mineral Point R. Co. v. Barron, 83 Ill. 365; 2 Wade, Attachm. §§ 373, 395. This point has been expressly ruled, in a case much like this, by the Supreme Court of the United States. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797.

In this case appellant caused appellee to be personally notified of the pendency of the suit in Kentucky (aside from the judicial notice that he received), and disclosed to the court the nature of the demand, and sought to claim the exemption of appellee under the laws of Indiana. The burden was on appellee, the judgment being shown to be valid on its face, to show facts that would render it equitable and just to require appellant to pay again. As declared by Chancellor Kent in Holmes v. Remsen, 4 Johns. Ch. 460, 467, 8 Am. Dec. 581: "If money be duly attached in the hands of a party, and he has paid it, pursuant to the judgment of a competent foreign court, I am to presume omnia rite acta; and it may be laid down as a clear principle of justice that a person compelled by a competent jurisdiction to pay a debt once shall not be compelled to pay it over again." See also Taylor v. Phelps, 1 Harr. & G. 492. We are not judicially advised as to whether the claim in question was exempt from garnishment in Kentucky. The presumption, in the absence of any showing, would be that the common law prevailed there. Smith v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 29 Ind. 158; Jackson v. Pittsburgh, O. C. & St. L. R. Co. 140 Ind. 241, 39 N. E. 663.

The evidence in this case tends to show that the original creditor violated our statutes, in sending the claim without the state for the purpose of garnishment (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, §§ 2283, 2284); but it does not appear that appellant failed to disclose any defense within its knowledge. A wrong has been done the appellee, but its consequences ought not to be visited upon the appellant, in the absence of any showing that it was a party to, or responsible for, such wrong.

Counsel for appellee wholly misapprehended the effect of the fact that appellee obtained a judgment on his claim in this state before judgment was rendered in the Kentucky court. It is to be remembered that the action in Kentucky was commenced, and service was there had upon appellant, before the institution of this suit. To quote from the language of the court in Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101, 103: "The attachment of the debt in the hands of the defendant fixed it there in favor of the attaching creditors; the defendant could not afterwards lawfully pay it over to the plaintiff. The attaching creditors acquired a lien upon the debt binding upon the defendant, and which the courts of all other governments, if they recognize such proceedings at all, cannot fail to regard. 'Qui prior est tempore potior est jure.'" The fact that a judgment was obtained in this state was in no wise inconsistent with, but was based on, the fact that the appellant owed the appellee, and that was the basis of the garnishment in Kentucky. The effect of the pendency of said suit merely conferred a privilege upon the appellant to seek a stay of proceedings in this action. Smith v. Blatchford, 2 Ind. 184, 52 Am. Dec. 504; Drake, Attachm. § 70. See also Nevian v. Poschinger, 23 Ind. App. 395, 698, 55 N. E. 1033.

We think it clear that the court below did not give the judgment of the Kentucky court, duly certified as it was, the full faith and credit that it was entitled to under the Federal Constitution. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797.

A motion has been made to dismiss the appeal in this case, but, in view of the question involved, the motion is overruled.

Judgment reversed, with an instruction to the Circuit Court to grant appellant's motion for a new trial.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Mrs. William ANDREWS, Admr., etc., of William Andrews, Deceased,
v.

MARSHALL CREAMERY COMPANY et al., Appts.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. Merely holding over after the expiration of the term, under a lease which provides for a renewal on the same terms, is not sufficient to show an affirmative election to renew the lease for an additional term.
2. An option to renew a lease in accordance with the terms of the instrument giving the lessee the privilege of renewal is exercised, so as to be binding on the lessee, by the statement of his authorized agent, shortly before the expiration of the term, that the lease will be renewed, on the faith of which the landlord makes improvements which he is under no obligations to make, followed by the assurance by the agent of intention to remain, and that no written renewal is necessary, when pressed for such writing after the expiration of the term, and while the lessee is still in possession.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Marshall County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to restrain defendants from abandoning certain premises. Affirmed.

NOTE.—As to effect of holding over as renewal of lease, see also, in this series, Valentine v. Healey (N. Y.) 43 L. R. A. 667.

As to what constitutes holding over, so as to render tenant liable for rent of another term, see Herter v. Mullen (N. Y.) 44 L. R. A. 703, and Byxbee v. Blake (Conn.) 57 L. R. A. 222, 60 L. R. A.

Statement by McClain, J.:

Plaintiff, as administratrix, brings action to restrain defendants from abandoning, and removing their property from, certain premises which defendants had, prior to the bringing of the action, taken possession of as tenants under a lease from one Brown, assignee, to plaintiff's intestate. Decree for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal.

Messrs. Meeker & Meeker, for appellants:

The presumption of the common law, that when a party holds over after the termination of a written lease for one or more years, and pays the same rent, he is a tenant from year to year, is not applicable to a tenant holding over in the state of Iowa; but he is always presumed to be a tenant at will, when he thus holds over, until the contrary is shown, under the provisions of Code, § 2991.

O'Brien v. Trowel, 76 Iowa, 761, 40 N. W. 704; Dubuque v. Miller, 11 Iowa, 583; German State Bank v. Herron, 111 Iowa, 26, 82 N. W. 432; Thorpe Bros. v. Fowler, 57 Iowa, 542, 11 N. W. 3.

To make the contract of leasing binding for more than one year it must be in writing; and taking and holding possession for a longer period than one year will not take the case out of the statute of frauds.

Burden v. Knight, 82 Iowa, 586, 48 N. W. 985; Hunt v. Coe, 15 Iowa, 201; Thorpe v. Bradley, 75 Iowa, 52, 39 N. W. 177; Powell v. Crampton, 102 Iowa, 365, 71 N. W. 579.

The provisions in a written lease giving the lessee the privilege to renew for a further term upon the same terms means a new lease, or new contract of leasing, and not an extending of the old lease.

Messrs. Binford & Snelling and Boardman, Aldrich, & Lawrence for appellee.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The lease to the premises, executed in April, 1898, was for the term of one year from May 2, 1898, with a yearly rental of $600, payable in monthly payments in advance, "with the privilege of renewal for four years longer on the same terms." It was further stipulated therein that, in case immediate possession was not given at the termination of the term, the lessees should pay to the lessor "$10 per day for each and every day said premises shall be withheld." And the lessees further agreed "to surrender said premises at the end of the lease, or sooner determination thereof, in as good condition as reasonable use thereof will permit, damage by the elements excepted." After the expiration of the one-year term defendants continued to occupy the premises and pay rent at the rate stipulated in the lease for several months, when they gave to the lessor notice that they would terminate their occupancy of the premises, and surrender possession, at the expiration of thirty days from that time. The question is whether defendants became tenants for a four-year term, after the expiration of the one-year term provided for in the lease, under the provision with reference to renewal, or whether they became tenants at will at the expiration of the one-year term, and had the right to terminate such tenancy on giving thirty days' notice. There seems to be no doubt under the authorities that, where a lease provides that the tenant may have, at his option, an extension for a specified time after the expiration of the term agreed upon in the lease, or may occupy for an extended term including the term specified, the mere holding over after the expiration of the specified term will constitute an election to hold for the additional or extended term, and 60 L. R. A.

the tenant, after holding over beyond the first term without any new arrangement, is bound for the additional or extended term as fully and completely as though that term had been originally included in the lease when executed. Delashman v. Berry, 20 Mich. 292, 4 Am. Rep. 392; Terstegge v. First German Mut. Ben. Soc. 92 Ind. 82, 47 Am. Rep. 135; Montgomery v. Hamilton County, 76 Ind. 362, 40 Am. Rep. 250; Peesh v. Bumbalek, 99 Wis. 62, 74 N. W. 545; Harding v. Seeley, 148 Pa. 20, 23 Atl. 1118; Marshon v. Williams, 62 N. J. L. 779, 42 Atl. 778; Clarke v. Merrill, 51 N. H. 415. According to this view, the continuance in possession is sufficient proof of an election to enjoy the privilege of extension provided for. Kramer v. Cook, 7 Gray, 550; Stone v. St. Louis Stamping Co. 155 Mass. 267, 29 N. E. 623; Holley v. Young, 66 Me. 520. In well-reasoned cases in Massachusetts the view is expressed that holding over is merely evidence of an intention to occupy under the privilege of an extension, which may be overcome by evidence of a contrary intention. Jones v. Tilton, 139 Mass. 418, 1 N. E. 741; Kimball v. Cross, 136 Mass. 300. There is good reason, however, supported by authority, for a distinction between a privilege of an extension and a right to renew. The extended term or additional term is one provided for in the lease itself, and the mere enjoyment of the privilege by continuing in possession is enough to bring the extended occupancy within the original contract. But an agreement for an option of renewal would seem to imply that the parties contemplated some affirmative act by way of the creation of an additional term. It is no doubt true that this affirmative act may be something different from, and less than, the execution of a new lease; for, when the tenant has indicated affirmatively the election to avail himself of the privilege of renewal, he has done all that is necessary to create a renewal, for the conditions under which the new term is to be enjoyed will be the same as those under which the first term was enjoyed, save as to the condition which provides for the renewal. Brand v. Frumveller, 32 Mich. 215; Darling v. Hoban, 53 Mich. 599, 19 N. W. 545; Willoughby v. Atkinson Furnishing Co. 93 Me. 185, 44 Atl. 612; Orton v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 272; Kollock v. Soribner, 98 Wis. 104, 73 N. W. 776. A covenant to renew gives a privilege to the tenant, but is nevertheless an executory contract, and, until the tenant has exercised the privilege, he cannot be held for the additional term. Swank v. St. Paul City R. Co. 61 Minn. 423, 63 N. W. 1088; 72 Minn. 380, 75 N. W. 594. There is authority for the view that the mere holding over is sufficient evidence of an election to renew, even where that is the privilege given in the lease. Insurance & Law Bldg. Co. v. National Bank, 71 Mo. 58; Ranlet v. Cook, 44 N. H. 512, 84 Am. Dec. 92; Clarke v. Merrill, 51 N. H. 415; McBrier v. Marshall, 126 Pa. 390, 17 Atl. 647. But with better reason, as we think, it has been held in other cases, after a full consideration of the question and the authorities bearing upon it, that the act of holding over is not sufficient to show an affirmative election to renew the lease for an additional term under a stipulation giving the privilege of such renewal. Thiebaud v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ind. 212; Terstegge v. First German Mut. Ben. Soc. 92 Ind. 82, 47 Am. Rep. 135; Renoud v. Daskam, 34 Conn. 512; Kollock v. Scribner, 98 Wis. 104, 73 N. W. 776. The arguments in favor of the doctrine supported by the cases last cited seem to us to be controlling. The covenant of renewal itself implies the creation of a new term, and some exercise of the right of election to assume the obligations involved therein should appear. Cooper v. Joy, 105 Mich. 374, 63 N. W. 414; Bradford v. Patten, 108 Mass. 153. The distinction between the privilege of extension, involving the mere election to treat the original lease as for a longer term than that agreed upon at its execution, and the privilege of renewal, involving the creation of another term, distinct from that provided for in the lease as executed, is implied in the language selected to express the intention of the parties. Where the stipulation is for privilege of renewal, the situation at the end of the first term is this: The tenant may, if he sees fit, by any appropriate act indicating his intention to do so, and before the privilege has expired by the expiration of the term, bind himself to a new lease, the terms and conditions of which are expressed in the first lease. But, on the other hand, he may, if he sees fit, become a tenant holding over after the expiration of his term: that is, a tenant at will under the provisions of our statute (Code, § 2991; O'Brien v. Troael, 76 Iowa, 760, 40 N. W. 704; German State Bank v. Herron, 111 Iowa, 25, 82 N. W. 430); or, in some states, a tenant from year to year, and bound to continue in possession for an additional term, as fixed by law (Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287, 31 N. E. 94); and by thus holding over he creates a new tenancy for an additional term, or at will, as the case may be, which he can only terminate as provided by law (Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. West, 57 Ohio St. 161, 49 N. E. 344; Gladwell v. Holcomb, 60 Ohio St. 427, 54 N. E. 473). It is true, the landlord is not bound in this state to accept him as a tenant at will, but may at once proceed to recover possession of the premises. But, if the landlord allows him to remain for thirty days, then a tenancy at will is created for the occupancy of the premises on the terms of the former lease, which can be terminated only by notice, as provided by statute. Code, § 2991; Dubuque v. Miller, 11 Iowa, 583; McClelland v. Wiggins, 109 Iowa, 673, 81 N. W. 156; Shuyer v. Klinkenberg, 67 Iowa, 544, 25 N. W. 770. Now, it seems to us more reasonable to assume that the tenant holding over after the expiration of his term, without more, elects to become a tenant at will, provided his landlord allows him to remain in possession, than that he thereby elects to bind himself for an additional term, which he might have availed himself of by acting under the provisions of his lease, but 60 L. R. A.

which he has in fact indicated no intention to claim or become bound for.

As the holding over alone was not sufficient to establish an exercise of the option to renew, it becomes necessary to consider whether there was other evidence, which, in addition to that fact, was sufficient to show such election. It appears that less than two months prior to the expiration of the first term the lessor asked one Collyer, the agent in charge of the premises for defendants, who were nonresidents, whether defendants intended to remain after the expiration of the term, and was given assurance in a general way that such was their purpose. On this assurance some improvements were made, which the landlord was under no obligation to make. A few days after the expiration of the first term the lessor asked Collyer to execute for defendants a written renewal of the lease. Collyer claimed he had no authority to execute such an instrument, but promised that within a few days he would present it for signature to the officers of the defendant company in Chicago, where they resided, at the same time assuring lessor that he could have a written renewal if he wanted it. Afterward Collyer told lessor that he had omitted to call the attention of the officers to the matter, and assured lessor that defendants would stay, and needed no renewal. It is to be borne in mind that in all of the conversations between lessor and Collyer the evident purpose of lessor, as it must have been understood by Collyer, was to ascertain whether defendants were intending to elect or had elected to renew, and that he had the right to put them out of possession at the expiration of the term, or afterwards to terminate their possession on thirty days' notice, in the absence of a renewal, and the evident intention of Collyer was to induce lessor to allow the possession to continue. We have no doubt, under the evidence, of Collyer's authority to bind the defendants by a renewal, no written agreement to that effect being necessary, nor of the purpose of Collyer to induce lessor to allow defendants to remain in possession under the belief that they were so remaining in pursuance of the renewal privilege. This was enough to bind defendants.

Our conclusion is that the option to renew was exercised, and that defendants became bound for the additional term provided for in the lease, and the decree of the lower court is affirmed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Hamilton County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wesley Martin, for appellant:

The negligence of the person directly employed is necessarily the negligence of the corporation employing him.

The employee was in the pay and under the immediate control of the defendant. This being true, the defendant is liable for his negligence.

The rule for which we contend is plainly stated in—

Kellogg v. Payne, 21 Iowa, 575; Callahan v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 23 Iowa, 502; Buchanan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 393, 39 N. W. 663; Blink v. Hubinger, 90 Iowa, 642, 57 N. W. 593.

Messrs. Hyatt & Hyatt and J. M. Blake, for appellee:

The town had the right, and the law makes it its duty, to cut down the weeds and grass in the streets and alleys thereof,—especially to keep it free from noxious weeds. The mowing machine is the only means now employed for the purpose of cutting weeds and grass, either in field or highway. No more danger could result from its ordinary use than might result from the use of a scythe, and there is no averment in the petition that its use in the manner charged was more dangerous than a scythe or any other means that might be employed for the purpose.

Independent School Dist.* 44 Iowa, 27.

Bishop, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The allegations of the petition are substantially as follows: That prior to July 15, 1899, a public alley within the limits of the defendant town had been allowed to become obstructed and grown up with weeds and grass; that on said day the defendant employed one Foster to mow and cut down such weeds and grass, and that said Foster, pursuant to his employment, and under the direction of defendant as to the means and manner of said employment, proceeded with the work for which he was employed, using therefor a mower drawn by a team of horses; that the operation of the mower attracted to the alley a number of children from the homes near to and adjoining the same; that plaintiff then about two years old, and residing with his parents near said alley, was attracted by the operation of the mower and by the voices of other children in the alley; that, as said Foster was driving south through said alley with his team and mower at work, the plaintiff entered the alley, and proceeded to walk north, so that the child and team were approaching each other from opposite directions; that from the time plaintiff entered the alley until he was injured said Foster could have seen him by the exercise of ordinary care, and thus prevented the accident; that the children in the rear of the team and mower saw plaintiff, and one of them called loudly to Foster to attract his attention, and that, while he heard the call, and asked the cause thereof, he paid no further attention thereto, and did not stop his team; that he (said Foster) negligently and carelessly drove said mower upon and against plaintiff, causing an injury, which is set forth and described. It is then said that defendant was guilty of negligence in employing said Foster to mow said alley by the use of a team and mower, as plaintiff and other children were in the habit of playing therein, which fact, and of the danger to such children incident thereto, was well known at all times to defendant and said Foster. The demurrer in terms puts in issue the sufficiency of the petition as stating a case of actionable negligence on the part of the defendant.

Conceding, for the purposes of this opinion, that the petition states a cause of action as against Foster, we proceed to the inquiry whether a case of actionable negligence is stated as against the defendant town. It does not appear by whom—that is, by what official board or officer of the town—Foster was employed. Nor is it stated what were the terms of his employment, save that it is said he was under the direction of the defendant as to the means and manner of his employment. The defendant being a municipal corporation, it follows of necessity that the contract of employment with him must have been entered into by some official board, committee, or officer. Now, whether it was the town council, or a committee thereof on public health or streets and alleys, or the street commissioner of the town, is immaterial, in our view. Certain it is that in the matter of its control over the streets and alleys within the incorporate limits—and, to make the reference direct, in the matter of clearing the alley in question of weeds—the town was in the exercise of police powers possessed by it as an incident to its existence as a municipal corporation. It is well settled that where an act done by an officer or employee of a municipal corporation is essentially in the line of the performance of an official duty, public in character, the municipality cannot be made liable for a tort committed or wrong done by such officer or employee while engaged as such in the performance of the duty in question. That acts done in the execution of police powers and in the enforcement of police regulations are in the nature of the performance of a service for the benefit of the general public cannot well be questioned. In this connection it has been held that “the grounds of exemption from liability are, that the corporation is engaged in the performance of a public service, in which it has no particular interest, and from which it derives no special benefit or advantage in its corporate capacity, but which it is bound to see performed in pursuance of a duty imposed by law for the general welfare of the inhabitants or of the community; that the members of the fire department, although appointed by the city corporation, are not, when acting in the discharge of their duties, servants or agents in the employment of the city, for whose conduct the city can be held liable, but they act rather as public officers, or officers of the city charged with a public service, for whose negligence or misconduct in the discharge of official duty no action will lie against the city, unless expressly given; and hence the maxim of respondet superior has no application.” Hoyes v. Oshkosh, 33 Wis. 314, 14 Am. Rep. 760. And in Condict v. Jersey City, 46 N. J. L. 157, it was held that, where a person was employed by the board of public works of a municipality to drive a horse and cart owned by such municipality, and used in carting refuse to the dumping ground, and by the negligence of such driver in making a dump from such cart the plaintiff's intestate was killed, the doctrine of respondet superior had no application. And a city cannot be made liable for the negligence of a teamster employed in transporting stone to repair a highway, the employment being by the superintendent of streets, who is charged with the duty of keeping the streets in repair. Barney v. Lowell, 98 Mass. 570. An employee of the committee of public charity, an adjunct of the city government, charged with the duty of driving an ambulance wagon, and through whose negligent driving a person was struck and killed, has been held to be engaged in a public service, and hence the municipality could not be made liable under the doctrine of respondet superior. Mazilian v. New York, 62 N. Y. 160, 20 Am. Rep. 468. So it has been held that a city cannot be made liable for the personal torts or wrongs committed by its police officers (Calwell v. Boone, 51 Iowa, 687, 33 Am. Rep. 154, 2 N. W. 614); or its sanitary officers (Ogg v. Lansing, 35 Iowa, 495, 14 Am. Rep. 499); or its firemen (Wilcox v. Chicago, 107 Ill. 334, 47 Am. Rep. 434; Grube v. St. Paul, 34 Minn. 402, 26 N. W. 228). The general doctrine is that, unless the charter of the city, or some general statute of the state, impose a liability upon the city for the torts or wrongs of its officers and agents engaged in the execution of police powers or regulations, then no such liability exists. Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87, 6 Am. Rep. 196; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 967, 974. Accepting such to be the rule, it follows that the court below committed no error in holding that the defendant could not be made liable for the negligent act of Foster, and accordingly in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff A. W. Sanderson on May 7, 1900, with his wife, Caroline Sanderson, and their four children, aged respectively four, six, eight, and twelve years, boarded one of the passenger trains of the Omaha Railway at Rice lake, in the state of Wisconsin, for the purpose of going to St. Paul, and thence over the Northern Pacific Railway to Cedro, in the state of Washington. The father and mother each had a full through ticket, and the child twelve years of age, a boy, had a through half-fare ticket. The tickets were purchased of the station agent at Rice lake. The party transferred to the defendant's passenger train at St. Paul. Before the train reached Minneapolis, the conductor took up the tickets of the plaintiff and his wife, and the half-fare ticket of the boy, and demanded half-fare tickets for the other two children who were over five years old, or the payment of $40, the price thereof. The father declined to pay any fare for the two children, for the reason, as he stated to the conductor, that he had an agreement with the agent when he purchased the tickets that the price paid therefor should entitle himself and his family to be carried to their destination. The conductor upon such refusal caused the child eight years old, a boy, to be put off the car at Minneapolis, but he immediately returned into the car. The conductor attempted to get hold of the six year old child, a girl, to put her off, who was in a seat with her mother. In such attempt it is alleged that the conductor assaulted the mother, and that she was frightened by what took place in the attempt to remove the children from the car, whereby her health was seriously impaired. The father paid the $40 demanded, to avoid further trouble, and the party were carried to their destination. The conductor did not tender back any of the tickets which he had taken up. The father and mother each brought an action in the district court of Ramsey county against the defendant for damages which each claimed to have sustained by reason of the premises. The action of A. W. Sanderson was brought for the recovery of damages in the sum of $2,040, which he alleged he sustained on account of the $40 paid, and the loss of the services and society of his wife, and for medical treatment for her, all of which were due to the injuries she received by reason of the wrongful act of the conductor. The action of Caroline Sanderson, the wife, was brought to recover damages in the sum of $2,000 on account of personal injuries sustained by the alleged assault made upon her by the conductor, and by reason of fright and shock due to the attempt to separate her children from her. The parties stipulated to try the cases at the same time and upon the same evidence, and that one record should cover both cases, but each should be separately submitted to the jury. The trial court at the close of the evidence directed a verdict for the defendant in the case of Caroline Sanderson, and she appealed to this court from an order denying her motion for a new trial. The case of A. W. Sanderson was submitted to the jury, and a verdict was returned in his favor for $42; being the sum paid to the conductor, and interest. Thereupon the defendant made a motion for judgment in its favor notwithstanding the verdict, and the court made its order granting the motion, from which the plaintiff appealed. The plaintiff made a separate motion for a new trial, but the record discloses no order disposing of it, and the only appeal on his part is from the order granting the defendant's motion for judgment.

1. An order granting or denying a motion for judgment is not appealable, for such an order is simply one for a judgment, or one refusing it. McMahon v. Davidson, 12 Minn. 357, Gil. 232; Rogers v. Holyoke, 14 Minn. 515, Gil. 387; St. Anthony Falls Bank v. Graham, 67 Minn. 318, 69 N. W. 1077; Oelschlegel v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 71 Minn. 50, 73 N. W. 631; Kalz v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 76 Minn. 351, 79 N. W. 310. Therefore the appeal in the case of A. W. Sanderson must be, and is, dismissed.

2. The question to be determined on the appeal of Mrs. Sanderson, hereafter designated as the plaintiff, is whether the evidence tends to show any legal basis for the recovery of damages by her. The evidence relevant to her case tends to show that her husband was on the train with and in charge of his family, and that he made the arrangements for their transportation, and that the station agent of whom he bought the tickets agreed that the sum paid to him therefor should be in full for the transportation of the entire family to their proposed destination, and, further, that the rules and rates of the defendant required that each of the children over five and under twelve years should be provided with half-fare tickets; that when the conductor caused the boy to be removed from the train, and attempted to eject the girl because the father refused to pay their fare, the plaintiff was greatly frightened by what occurred, and as a result of such fright she was made ill, and her health permanently impaired. The evidence, however, failed to show that any assault was committed upon her by the conductor, or anything done by him to cause her to apprehend any violence or injury to herself. She testified that her injury resulted wholly from fright, and that the conductor did not touch her, any more than to crowd in by her; that is crowd her in trying to get past her to where the girl was. It may be assumed for the purpose of this decision, only, that his act was wrongful as to the children. The plaintiff's case is, then, 60 L. R. A.

one where it is sought to recover damages for personal injuries due solely to fright and grief because an attempt was made to put her children off the car, and one where there was no tort against her, and no fear on her part of any physical injury or personal violence. The great weight of authority sustains the doctrine that there can be no recovery for fright which causes injury without impact; that is, in the absence of any contemporaneous physical injury to the plaintiff. Notes to Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hayter (Tex.) 77 Am. St. Rep. 862. This rule, as thus broadly stated, has not been accepted by this court; but, with the modification hereafter stated, it is the law of this state. In the case of Renner v. Canfield, 36 Minn. 90, 30 N. W. 435, the defendant shot a dog in the highway; and the plaintiff, a woman, standing near, whom the defendant did not see at the time he fired, was so seriously frightened by the report of the gun that she had a miscarriage, as the result thereof. It was held in that case that the plaintiff could not recover, for the reason that the fright was not the result of any legal wrong to her. It was held in the case of Keyes v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 36 Minn. 290, 30 N. W. 888, that the mental distress and anxiety which may be proven in actions for personal injuries must be confined to such as are connected with bodily injury; that fear and anxiety for the safety of others cannot be made the basis for the recovery of damages. In the case of Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L. R. A. 85, 50 N. W. 238, it was stated as a rule that no action for damages will lie for an act which, though wrongful, infringed no legal right of the plaintiff, although it may have caused him mental suffering. The case of Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034, was one where a pregnant woman was a passenger on one of the defendant's cars, and by its negligence in the management of its cars at a street crossing a collision seemed inevitable, and she was placed in a position of such apparent imminent peril as to cause fright, which caused a miscarriage; and it was held, though there was in fact no collision and no impact, that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, and that she was entitled to recover for the consequences of her fright. It is to be noted in this case that the defendant's negligence which caused the fright was a legal wrong to the plaintiff as well as to all of her fellow passengers. In other words, the act of the defendant which caused the plaintiff's fright was a tort against her. In the case of Bucknam v. Great Northern R. Co. 76 Minn. 373, 79 N. W. 98, the plaintiff, a married woman, entered with her husband the ladies' waiting room in the defendant's depot; and the station agent unlawfully and untruthfully charged her companion with not being her husband, and used violent, offensive, threatening, and abusive language to him, and ordered him to leave the room, whereby she suffered a nervous shock which resulted in serious physical injuries. It was held that these facts afforded no legal basis for the recovery of damages by her, for the reason that the use of abusive language to her husband was not an infraction of her legal right, and hence not a legal wrong to her, and for the further reason, as stated by Buck, J., that "she apprehended no danger to herself, at least, she could not reasonably do so. She was not in any place of peril. If an action of this kind can be maintained, we do not see why nervous and sensitive persons present at a riot or public disturbance cannot have a cause of action if thereby they become nervous and sick, or suffer mentally, even if they do not receive bodily injury." This Purcell Case has been criticised by some eminent courts, and approved by others, but it would seem that the trend of the more recent cases is to approve it. See 15 Harvard Law Rev. 304; 41 Am. L. Reg. 141. However this may be, it is the law of this state, and we are not disposed to question it, much less to overrule it. It is in entire harmony with the other decisions of this court which we have cited, for it is distinguishable from them by the fact that the fright of the plaintiff was due to a legal wrong of the defendant against the plaintiff, which was not the fact in the other cases. The question whether fright alone would constitute such injury that the law will allow a recovery for it was not involved in that case.

From a consideration of the decisions of this court cited, we hold that there can be no recovery for fright which results in physical injuries, in the absence of contemporaneous injury to the plaintiff, unless the fright is the proximate result of a legal wrong against the plaintiff by the defendant. As already stated, the plaintiff's case is not within the exception, and it follows that the trial court rightly directed a verdict for the defendant.

Order affirmed.

I. Introduction.

The proposition that a contract or agreement entered into between persons about to intermarry for the transfer of property, the only consideration of which is the intended marriage, is valid and subsisting if the marriage afterwards takes place, is a plain one.

And the agreement to marry as a consideration has always been affirmed to be not only good, but valuable; and will be held so even as against creditors, except in a case where it appears that the whole scheme of the marriage and the settlement of the property was prompted by a collusion between the parties to divert the property from the payment of debts. Again, a promise to marry, made by one party, is sufficient consideration for a like promise by the other; and, upon the marriage taking place, each becomes obligated to assume and perform the marital duties resulting therefrom.

Sometimes, after a marriage has been had, one of the parties thereto will claim that, on account of the nonperformance of those marital duties by the other, he or she has been, or should be, released from his or her corresponding duties; and indicates the same by a withdrawal from the state of community, and the initiation or commencement of an action or proceeding for annulment, divorce, or separation; thus seeking absolute or qualified release from the marriage obligations.

usually directed to be exhausted before the real estate, by a judgment subjecting to payment of debts of the assignor property assigned in fraud of the rights of creditors, will not require a reversal of the judgment if the entire property is insufficient to satisfy the creditors' claims.

(September 23, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to subject to plaintiffs' claim the interest of John Collins, Jr., in his father's estate, which he was alleged to have transferred in fraud of his creditors. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Dodge, J.:

In 1894 and 1895 judgments were recovered and docketed in Douglas county, Wisconsin, against John Collins, Jr., which judgments, at the time of the commencement of this action, were unsatisfied, and were the property of the plaintiffs. Thereafter, at a date not proved, but prior to September, 1900, the father of John Collins, Jr., died intestate in Douglas county, leaving an estate of about $4,800, partly real and partly personal; but the amounts of the respective classes of property are left wholly without evidence. One George B. Hudnall was appointed administrator of the senior Collins's estate. In December, 1900, an action for divorce was pending between the wife of said John Collins, Jr., and himself, and at that time a settlement was made, whereby, in consideration of the dismissal of that action, he assigned, by written instrument, to his wife, all of the interest in his father's Thereafter in some instances the parties have come together (for the time being), and entered into an agreement by which the party who had commenced, or proposed to commence, such action—generally the wife—agreed to withdraw, discontinue, and compromise, or not to commence the same, in consideration of some payment or performance by the other party. And the validity of such a contract is—as its title indicates—the subject considered in this note.

II. When the agreement is that the parties shall live separate.

An inspection of the cases wherein the discontinuance, withdrawal, or compromise of an action initiated or commenced for annulment, divorce, or separation is a consideration for the contract of the other party discloses the fact that in some cases contracts are made with a view to the parties living separate from each other, and in others looking to a resumption of the marital relation.

The first cases considered are those in which the agreement to compromise the divorce suit was made with reference to the parties living separate.

In Rogers v. Rogers, 4 Paige, 516, 27 Am. Dec. 84, the chancellor said: "Although the agreement for a separation was not binding upon the wife, and could not be pleaded in bar to a suit against her husband, it was undoubtedly competent for her, with the consent of her next friend, to agree to a discontinuance of the suit. I should, therefore, have considered the present suit as actually discontinued, and should have directed an order to be entered accordingly, without prejudice to her right to proceed anew, had not her counsel insisted upon the objection that the agreement to discontinue the suit was not in writing, as required by the 121st rule." The decision was made upon an application on the part of the wife, complainant in the action, for an allowance for the purpose of enabling her to carry on a suit against her husband for a separation, and also for alimony, which was opposed by the defendant husband on the ground that the suit had been settled between him and the complainant with the consent of her next friend, and that the parties had agreed to live separate; he having given bond to a trustee named by herself to secure to her the payment of the annual allowance during her life.

Under the New York Code of Civil Procedure and Revised Statutes, a next friend for the wife is no longer necessary in a matrimonial action; and the effect of this decision, adapted to the present state of affairs, would undoubtedly ly be that the wife is competent to agree to discontinue a divorce or separation suit.

An agreement between husband and wife, made after an actual separation and the beginning of an action against him for separation, by which, in consideration of the payment by him to her of a sum certain, she released him from all liability for support, and interest in his property, and agreed to live separate and apart from him, is valid; and a subsequent unlawful marriage by the husband, entitling the wife to a divorce, will not vitiate the separation agreement, so as to give the wife alimony in a suit brought by her for a divorce. Taylor v. Taylor, 32 Misc. 312, 66 N. Y. Supp. 561.

Where a wife had commenced an action against her husband for a divorce, an agreement made between them, that the suit should be dismissed, and that they would in the future live separate and apart from each other, and providing for the relinquishment by each of all rights in the other's estates, and for the division of certain property between them, there being no proof of fraud in the execution thereof, contravenes no public policy, and is valid. Parsons v. Parsons, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 223, 62 S. W. 719.

An action to enforce a promise by a husband to pay money to his wife in consideration of the discontinuance of an action for divorce brought by her against him for alleged adultery, the condonation of such adultery, and her agreement that he should have the custody of their child and that she would relinquish her dower and claims on his estate, was held not to be maintainable, because the condonation of adultery would be a violation of rules of law, and principles of public policy, while the agreement as to the child was not a good consideration, and there was no valid release of dower. Van Order v. Van Order, 8 Hun, 315. The court said that, as the plaintiff insisted that it was not an agreement for separation, it was unnecessary to consider whether it was invalid when viewed in that light.

As an authority the case is of no present value in New York, because, under the statute (Laws 1896, chap. 272, § 21), a husband and wife may now enter into such a contract with each other (France v. France, 38 Misc. 459, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1015, infra); and the other proposition, that condonation of adultery is not a good consideration for such an agreement, is overruled by the court of appeals in Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675, infra, III.

In Armstrong v. Armstrong, 1 N. Y. S. R. 529, it was held that an agreement would not be enforced in which a wife agreed to discon-estate, real and personal. At that time an order of partial distribution had been made, assigning to John Collins, Jr., about $186, which was thereupon paid to the wife, Esther Collins, appellant, by the administrator. After renewal of cohabitation for a few months, Collins's habits of intoxication continuing, a new action of divorce was commenced by Esther, and a decree of divorce entered, with no provision whatever for alimony, she simply retaining, as she supposed, her rights under the assignment of his interest in said estate. On February 15, 1901, executions upon the several judgments owned by plaintiffs were issued, and returned unsatisfied, and on May 13, 1901, they commenced this action against John Collins, Jr., said Hudnall, as administrator, and Esther W. Collins, seeking to apply to the satisfaction of said judgments the interest of John Collins, Jr., in his father's estate, alleging nonexistence of any other property to satisfy the same. The judgments then amounted to about $680. The court found the facts substantially as above stated, held that the pretended transfer to Esther W. Collins while still the wife of John Collins, Jr., was without consideration, and void as against his creditors, and thereupon entered judgment: First, declaring void such assignment as to the residue remaining in the hands of the administrator; second, adjudging personal recovery of $681.51 damages and the costs of the action of and from the defendants, making the same a lien upon the interest of John Collins, Jr., in his father's estate; requiring Hudnall, as administrator, to pay to plaintiffs' attorneys all sums thereafter payable to John Collins, Jr.; and authorizing the continue a divorce suit brought by her against her husband upon the ground of adultery, and to release her inchoate right of dower in all of his real estate, and whereby the parties were thereafter to live separate, while the husband agreed to pay the costs and expenses of the action, and the further sum of $1,200 annually, and under which, for the purpose of carrying out his agreement, he executed and delivered to the trustee for the wife his mortgage to secure the payment of such sum. Therefore, a complaint setting forth these facts, and asking that the trustee be compelled to place such mortgage upon record, and that he be removed as trustee for reasons stated, was held demurrable.

The court distinguished Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675, infra, III., saying that the distinct and express ground upon which that case was affirmed by the court of appeals was that the agreement between the parties was to bring them to living together, and was, therefore, in line with public policy, rather than an agreement to live separately, which was opposed to public policy; and that in this case, as there was no allegation in the complaint that the husband and wife were living separately, and inasmuch as it was alleged that they were man and wife and both residents of the same place when the action was commenced, the presumption should be that they were living together when the contract was made.

This would seem to be rather a violent presumption, as the fact appears very plainly that the contract was made after the wife had commenced her action for divorce, and, therefore, it would seem hardly fair to presume that a wife commenced an action for divorce against her husband while she was living with him. The court approved the case of Van Order v. Van Order, 8 Hun, 315, supra, stating that that case was, in its essential features, like the case under consideration. And, it might be added, its present value as an authority is the same. The case is plainly overruled by the court of appeals in the following case of Pettit v. Pettit.

An agreement providing for the settlement of an action brought by a wife for a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, by a division of the property of the husband as mentioned therein, and that the parties should live separate, is a valid contract; and an action upon it is maintainable. Pettit v. Pettit, 107 N. Y. 677, 14 N. E. 500. To the objection that it was against public policy because, by its terms, the wife agreed to live separate and apart from her husband, the court said that, in the pending action for divorce, the plaintiff would have been entitled, if successful, to a decreed of separation and a suitable allowance, from the estate of her husband, for her support and maintenance; and that it was difficult to see how it could be in accord with public policy to award such relief, and yet against public policy for the husband to concede it in advance of the decree and as a compromise of the existing litigation; that public policy does not turn on the question whether the husband fights out the quarrel to a final judgment, and that, where the separation exists as a fact, and is not produced or occasioned by the contract, the consideration of the husband's agreement to pay is his release from liability for the support of his wife.

In Besant v. Wood, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 605, 40 L. T. N. S. 445, which was an action brought by the husband to enforce an agreement made between the husband and wife and trustees in behalf of the wife, to the effect that the parties should live separate, and for an injunction to restrain her from commencing an action against him for the restitution of conjugal rights, the master of the rolls, in an opinion which concluded with giving judgment in favor of the plaintiff and granting the injunction, said: "Is it conceivable that a court of justice which allows a married woman to institute a suit for divorce, or to institute a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, shall say 'You have no right to anything beyond that; you have no right to effect a compromise, but must go on to the bitter end';—to say that she can accede to no terms which can be binding; that no terms shall be binding on her, because she is incapable of entering into an agreement? I think that is not conceivable. . . . I think the moment you empower a married woman to sue or defend in her own name you must empower her also to compromise that suit on terms which may be fairly arranged; and, consequently, in all those cases, . . . she must take, as an incident to the right to sue, the right to contract,—to compromise that suit. . . . If, after instituting a suit for divorce, or having a suit for a divorce instituted against her, and she defending it, she can compromise by agreeing to live separate on terms as regards maintenance of herself, custody of her children and so forth, why not before? Why not after the quarrel and before the litigation commenced? The very same reasons appear to me to apply to the one case as to the other."

For statement in regard to suit for restitution of conjugal rights, see infra, VI.

A mortgage given by a husband to the next friend of the wife in a bill in chancery for a judicial separation on the ground of his cruel plaintiffs, in the event that such payments from the administrator were insufficient to satisfy the judgments, to sell the interest of John Collins, Jr., as heir, in the real property of which his father died seised. John Collins's share of the estate was one seventh of the personalty and one sixth of the realty, subject to his mother's dower. The real estate was all situated in Douglas county, and no attempt had been made to enforce the judgments by execution against the same. From this judgment Esther W. Collins and George B. Hudnall, administrators, bring this appeal.

Mr. H. V. Gard, for appellants:

The assignment was made in settlement of the action for divorce, so one of the considerations, while it was not marriage in the first instance, was a continuation of the treatment, for the benefit of the wife and their infant child, they to live together separate from himself, in consequence of which the proceedings in the suit are suspended, is a valid executed conditional transfer of the real estate mortgaged, and may be enforced after the death of the husband, wife, and trustee, at the instance of the child after attaining her majority. Bucklin v. Bucklin, 1 Keyes, 141.

In France v. France, 38 Misc. 459, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1015, it was held that a bond given by a husband to his wife to carry out an agreement to pay her a sum weekly for the support of herself and infant child was valid where the consideration was the agreement by the wife to discontinue a divorce action commenced by her, to make no defense to an action brought by him for divorce in another state, and to release all claim upon his property; and it was held to be enforceable by the wife under § 21, chap. 272, Laws of 1896, which authorizes husband and wife to make any contracts with each other, except a contract to alter or dissolve the marriage, or to relieve the husband from his liability to support his wife, as the contract does not come within either of those exceptions. It must be remembered, however, that another consideration than the discontinuance of her divorce action by the wife entered into her agreement, viz., to release all claim upon his property. The case as an authority outside of New York is somewhat tempered by the fact that it was made under the statute referred to.

For other cases sustaining agreement to live separate on compromise of divorce suit, see Hart v. Hart, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 670, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 697, 45 L. T. N. S. 13, 30 Week. Rep. 8; Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538, 12 Jur. 467; and Bateman v. Ross, 1 Dow P. C. 235, infra, IV.; Rowley v. Rowley, 3 Swabey & T. 338, affirmed in L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 63, 35 L. J. M. C. N. S. 110, infra, VI.

But a distinction appears to be made where the contract between the husband and wife is in reality to facilitate the dissolution of the marriage contract, instead of simply making a provision for the wife in lieu of one which would inevitably be made in a decretal judgment of divorce or separation.

And so, after the wife has brought an action for a divorce charging the husband with extreme cruelty, desertion, habitual intemperance, and adultery, and in his answer the husband has, by a cross-complaint, recriminated with charges of adultery against the wife, an agreement executed between them, entirely to settle the whole case and causes of action set forth in the complaint and cross-complaint, that defend-marriage relation after it had been broken. Marriage, in contemplation of law, is not only a valuable consideration for a contract or conveyance between the parties to it, but is a consideration of the highest value.

ant will withdraw his defense and his allegations against the plaintiff; that plaintiff will withdraw all her charges against defendant except the charge of desertion; and that defendant will make no defense, and permit the charge of desertion to be proved by plaintiff unchallenged, and providing for the manner in which their property shall be divided,—is void as against public policy. Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 39 Pac. 801. In this case the court, after deciding that the agreement was void, as stated, proceeded to try the issues in the original divorce action, grant a divorce to the wife, and determine the property rights of the parties and the custody of the children, without considering the agreement.

In Friedman v. Bierman, 43 Hun, 390, infra, V., there was a dictum to the effect that an agreement between husband and wife to discontinue an action for a divorce commenced by her, and to live separate, is condemned by public policy. See also Morgan v. Potter, 17 Hun, 403, infra, V.

III. Where the agreement is that the parties shall resume marital relations.

In some cases differing from those in the preceding division the agreement is that the party who has initiated or commenced the divorce action shall not only not prosecute, or shall discontinue the same, but shall also return to the performance of marital duties, and not live separately from the other. An examination of the cases indicates that the weight of authority is in favor of the validity of such an agreement, and that the consideration to abandon or withdraw the divorce proceeding, coupled with a promise to return and resume marital relations, is a good one.

Where, by a deed of separation, a husband agreed with the trustee of the wife to pay her an annuity; and afterwards, being in ill health and desiring her return to him, agreed, in consideration of her doing so and of her trustee consenting to her doing so, to continue the annuity after his death, during her life, and to make the same a charge upon his real estate,—such an agreement will be enforced in equity, and the real property of the husband will be charged accordingly. Webster v. Webster, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 115, 3 Jur. N. S. 655.

A conveyance by a husband to his wife of his real property in consideration of her agreement to discontinue a suit for divorce commenced by her, to resume marital relations with him, and to pay him a sum of money will be upheld where she dismisses the divorce suit and gives him an agreement to pay the money, although she afterwards, in a second suit, obtains a divorce from him on account of his subsequent adultery and drunkenness. Rozell v. Bedding, 59 Mich. 381, 28 N. W. 498.

Dodson v. Dodson, 11 Ohio L. J. 198.

The alleged consideration in this case is not a valuable one, and will not sustain an executory contract. It is, if anything, what is called in the books a mere nominal consideration, which is no consideration at all.

In Duffy v. White, 115 Mich. 264, 78 N. W. 363, it was held that a conveyance of real property by the wife to the husband in trust for the benefit of their child is valid; and that the condonation by the husband of the adultery of the wife, and the resumption of marital relations with her, are a good consideration therefor. The court, after saying that it had been held, almost without exception, that the discontinuance of a meritorious suit for divorce, and the resumption of marital relations, are a good consideration for such a conveyance, further stated that, while the authorities are not uniform as to the effect of mere condonation, where no suit for divorce has been commenced, the weight of authority supports the above proposition, and alluded to Merrill v. Peaselee, 146 Mass. 460, 16 N. E. 271, infra, with apparent disapproval, saying that in the latter case the opposite view received the approval of a bare majority of the court.

Where a wife has left her husband, being legally justified in doing so, her agreement to return, and actually returning and living with him for the remainder of her life, are a sufficient consideration for an agreement on his part to bestow, at his death, a portion of his property upon the heirs of her son by a former husband. Burkholder's Appeal, 105 Pa. 31.

Where a wife had separated from her husband and brought suit against him for a divorce on account of his drunkenness and cruel treatment; and thereafter the husband, in consideration of her agreement to dismiss the divorce suit and return and live with him, made his note to a third person for her use, payable whenever he should become intoxicated, or drink, or mistreat or abuse her; and she did return and live with him,—such note is a valid obligation; and, in the event of the happening of any of the matters rendering it payable, an action may be maintained thereon. Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 67, 25 Am. Rep. 295.

A note given by a husband to his wife in consideration of a settlement of the difficulties between them and the discontinuance by her of a divorce suit theretofore commenced against him, and her returning to live with him, which note was payable thirty days after his death, is a valid claim, and enforceable against his estate, as it is an absolute agreement, given upon a good and valuable consideration. Reithmaier v. Beckwith, 35 Mich. 110.

In an action for divorce, brought by the wife against her husband on account of his adultery, in which one witness had testified to acts of adultery committed by the defendant, the defendant made and delivered to the father of the plaintiff a note in consideration that the plaintiff would discontinue the action for divorce and return to and live with the defendant. This she did, and, after living with him for about ten years, left him for alleged cruel treatment, and began an action upon the note. It was held that the action could be maintained, as there was ample consideration to support the agreement. Adams v. Adams, 24 Hun, 401. The court approved Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 67, 25 Am. Rep. 295, supra.

In affirming the above judgment of the general term, the court of appeals said: "She was in a condition to apply to the court for alimony and counsel fees, and, had she prosecuted her action to its termination, might have compelled the payment of permanent alimony, and the costs and expenses of the action. In consideration of the giving of this note, she discontinued this action . . . without costs. She also condoned the adultery charged, and returned to live with the defendant. By this arrangement the defendant not only got rid of the pending action, and the payment of costs and counsel fees therein, and of temporary alimony, but, by the condonation, the plaintiff precluded herself from bringing a new action, founded upon the adultery of which she had given proof. These were substantial benefits to the defendant, abundantly sufficient to support the note which he gave to her father for her use." Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question naturally arising on this appeal is as to the efficacy, as against creditors, of the attempted conveyance by John Collins, Jr., to his wife, of his interest in his father's estate. The decisions of this court are substantially without conflict that a conveyance from husband to wife, in order to be of any validity against his creditors, must not only have been made in entire good faith, and without intent to hinder, delay, or defraud them, but also must be upon a valuable consideration, paid out of her separate estate, or by a third person for her.

the absolute use of the wife; and that she should alone and exclusively determine the happening of such contingency,—such bond is not void, and, upon the maltreatment of the wife by the husband, payment of the bond may be enforced by action. Reamey v. Bayley (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 640, 11 Atl. 438.

In Goldstein v. Goldstein, 35 Misc. 251, 71 N. Y. Supp. 807, it was decided that, under § 21, art. 8, chap. 272, Laws 1896, authorizing husband and wife to make any contracts with each other, except a contract to alter or dissolve the marriage, or to relieve the husband from his liability to support his wife, an agreement by a husband with his wife, although by parol, that, in consideration that she would abandon proceedings threatened by her, and in which steps had been taken for the commencement of an action to secure the separation to which she claimed she was entitled, and would return to and live with him, he would make a will, which he afterwards did execute,—is valid; and, where she returns and lives with him in performance of the agreement on her part, the agreement will be enforced in equity against his estate and personal representatives; and such a contract is not within the exceptions contained in the statute.

In Cahill v. Martin, Ir. L. R. 7 Eq. 361, the court of appeal in Ireland affirmed a decree of the vice chancellor to the effect that an agreement between a husband and wife, made after the wife had abandoned her husband, in settlement of a suit brought by the husband against her for a restitution of conjugal rights, whereby the wife agreed to surrender a portion of her jointure under her marriage settlement, was valid and enforceable; and that, in an action against the heirs of her deceased husband to enforce such jointure, she would be allowed to recover only the amount of it as reduced by such agreement.

On appeal to the House of Lords, this judgment was reversed, and it was held that to the general incapacity of husband or wife to sue or be sued by each other there were necessary exceptions, viz., matrimonial suits between them for a divorce a mensa et thoro, for a dissolution or nullity of marriage, or for restitution of conjugal rights; and that some power to terminate such suits by way of compromise would appear, on sound principles, to have been reasonably incident to the power to institute and to defend them. And, in regard to such agreements, the court held that the wife had full power to contract concerning her separate estate, the same as she would have with any stranger, but that, as she could not contract on such an occasion

To this end, of course, existence of separate estate is essential. Horton v. Dewey, 53 Wis. 410, 10 N. W. 599; Gettelmann v. Gits, 78 Wis. 439, 442, 47 N. W. 660; Rosiek v. Redzinski, 87 Wis. 525, 530, 58 N. W. 262; Wallace v. Perceles, 109 Wis. 316, 320, 53 L. R. A. 644, 85 N. W. 371. The necessity of this condition has even been extended to the technical validity of transfers where no rights of creditors were involved. Baum v. Baum, 109 Wis. 47, 53 L. R. A. 650, 85 N. W. 122. In the present case the absence of separate estate and the actual consideration for the transfer are left in no doubt, for that consideration consisted solely and exclusively in the withdrawal of Mrs. Collins's action for divorce, or substantially in her consent to continue the already existing marital relation between herself and husband. For reasons so obvious as hardly to concerning her freehold estate not separate, with a stranger, she therefore could not with her husband. And the wife, in such case, is not to be regarded as a feme sole in such an absolute sense as to give her an unqualified power to contract with her husband, on the occasion of such a compromise, concerning her real or personal estate, in a manner in which she could not contract for any consideration with any other person. Cahill v. Cahill, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 420, 49 L. T. N. S. 605, 31 Week. Rep. 861.

There are, however, a few cases in which the position is taken that a promise or agreement by a party to the marriage to return to and resume marital duties is but to promise to do what the party contracted to do at the marriage, and is, therefore, simply doing what is incumbent upon the party as an owing duty, and so falls within the rule that, where a person is legally bound to perform an act, his doing, or agreeing to do it, cannot be deemed a sufficient consideration of a valid contract.

After a wife had left her husband, alleging his cruel treatment toward her, and had consulted counsel with a view to obtaining a divorce and alimony; and thereafter an agreement was made between them that he should give his note for $5,000 to a trustee to be paid after his death, provided the wife return to and live with him as such, to which she agreed; and thereafter plaintiff returned and lived with her husband until his death,—the consideration for such note is illegal, and payment of it will not be enforced, as it is as much against public policy to restore interrupted conjugal relations for money as it is to continue them without interruption for the same consideration; and the fellowship and communion of a wife are not a service which the wife can sell, or the husband buy. Merrill v. Peaslee, 146 Mass. 460, 16 N. E. 271. The judge delivering the opinion in this case made the statement that, "had the consideration of the note been an agreement not to prosecute proceedings for a divorce, a different question would have been presented, upon which we express no opinion." Three of the justices dissented from the opinion of the majority in this case, holding that this was not a case like those where the wife was doing what she was legally bound to do, and that she had a right to refuse to return to cohabitation; and it would follow that, apart from illegality, the return itself was sufficient consideration for the note; and that, at all events, the giving up, or refraining from, proceedings for a divorce and alimony, which the wife was entitled to main-require mention, this cannot be accepted as an equivalent for a valuable pecuniary consideration moving from the wife's separate estate. The first of these reasons is that neither the law nor public policy can favor or approve bargaining between husband and wife as to continuance or severance of the marital status, in the existence of which the public, as a third party, is interested, as well as the two spouses. Baum v. Baum, 100 Wis. 47, 53 L. R. A. 650, 85 N. W. 122. Another most cogent reason is the utter inability to protect the rights of creditors in the property of a husband if such contracts can be deemed a valid consideration. Apparently the present case presents as nearly a meritorious situation for pecuniary arrangement between husband and wife as any likely to arise; but, if the principle be established that merely continuing the maritain, was both a sufficient, and a legal, consideration.

In Copeland v. Boaz, 9 Bart. 223, 40 Am. Rep. 89, where it appeared that, while the parties were living in a state of separation, the husband, to induce his wife to return, executed to a trustee for her benefit a promissory note, it was held that it was not enforceable; that it was a nudum pactum, as it contravened public policy, was promotive of separation of husband and wife, and not tolerable in law.

A post-nuptial contract in which a husband hires his wife to live with him will not be recognized as a legal obligation; and a note given by the husband to his wife's brother to compromise a difficulty between the husband and wife is not enforceable at the suit of the wife's brother. Roberts v. Frisby, 38 Tex. 210. Nothing is said in the case to indicate whether or not divorce proceedings had been commenced, or were pending.

A wife's refraining from carrying out an oral, unexecuted threat to institute a suit for divorce and alimony, and her returning to live with her husband thereafter, where there is no action for divorce pending, are no consideration for an agreement on the part of the husband to cancel and annul an antenuptial agreement by which the wife relinquished her rights in the husband's property. Fisher v. Koontz, 110 Iowa, 498, 80 N. W. 551, 81 N. W. 702. In the opinion the court recognizes the fact that "the discontinuance of a meritorious suit for a divorce, and the resumption of the married relations, have been held a sufficient and valid consideration for a conveyance of land or promise to pay money."

The above case should be considered in connection with Besant v. Wood, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 605, 40 L. T. N. S. 445, supra, II.; Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 875, supra, III.; and Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J. Eq. 429, 24 Atl. 227, infra, IV. Its reasoning would seem to be, in different ways, opposed to all of them.

For other cases sustaining agreement to resume marital relations on compromise of divorce suit, see Jodrell v. Jodrell, 9 Beav. 45, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 17, 9 Jur. 1022, and Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J. Eq. 429, 24 Atl. 227, infra, IV.; Smith v. Smith, 35 Hun, 878, infra, VIII.

IV. When specific performance will be decreed.

Not only will a contract to perform certain acts or things in consideration that the other party to it will withdraw, discontinue, or compromise a divorce suit be enforced as a valid agreement at law, but, if occasion requires, and tal relation is a sufficient consideration to support conveyance from husband to wife against creditors, there will be no difficulty in supporting such conveyances even in most flagrant cases. It would but be necessary to establish any reasonable degree of exasperating circumstances or of conjugal infelicity to enable an insolvent husband to place his property within the shelter of his wife's name, because, forsooth, she condones his alleged misconduct; which, for the purpose of effectuating a fraudulent scheme, he may well be willing to admit. Of course, the reasons here suggested fail in the case of actual divorce by decree of court and pecuniary arrangements between thus separated parties, and to that situation very different principles may be applicable. Here we can have no doubt that the court was right in holding that the attempted the giving of the full benefit secured by it to the party demands it, equity will, as in other cases, intervene, and compel a specific performance of the contract.

Where a suit was commenced by the wife for the purpose of obtaining a divorce on the ground of cruelty, and the husband, with a view of preventing publicity, and trying to live in harmony again, and to prevent disputes, made a proposal for an arrangement, which ended in a deed by which the husband assigned to trustees certain real estate for the use of the wife and her children, and also agreed to pay her a sum yearly, specific performance of such agreement will be decreed in equity. Jodrell v. Jodrell, 9 Beav. 45, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 17, 9 Jur. 1022.

An agreement by a husband with his wife that he would convey to her the house and lot where they had been living, provided she would, in consideration thereof, again live with him and have her suit for divorce dismissed, is valid and binding upon him; and, if she afterwards causes the proceedings for divorce to be dismissed, and returns and is faithful to her promise and to her marriage vows, such agreement will be enforced in equity, and the title to the premises will be passed from the husband to the wife. Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J. Eq. 429, 24 Atl. 227.

In Hart v. Hart, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 670, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 697, 45 L. T. N. S. 13, 30 Week. Rep. 8, it appeared that the husband had filed a petition against the wife for a divorce, which she had answered; and before trial the parties agreed that the petition and answer should be dismissed, and a deed of separation executed, which the husband afterwards refused to execute; and the court made a decree for the specific performance of the agreement.

In Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538, 12 Jur. 467, it was held that an agreement on the part of a wife to discontinue a suit commenced by her against her husband for annulment of the marriage was, alone, a sufficient consideration for the agreement by the husband to execute a deed of separation; and specific performance on his part of the contract thus entered into between them was decreed. An interesting case in the House of Lords was thus alluded to by the lord chancellor: "In Bateman v. Ross, 1 Dow. P. C. 235, there was a suit pending for a divorce. Why is not the compromise of such a suit to afford consideration for an agreement?"

In the last-mentioned case, which was originally a suit by the wife against the husband for divorce, the parties had agreed to submit their matters to arbitrators, and an award by the latter was confirmed by order upon consent, all transfer from John Collins, Jr., to his wife was without any sufficient consideration such as the law requires to give it validity as against his creditors, the plaintiffs.

Having reached the conclusion that the attempted transfer by John Collins, Jr., was and is void as against plaintiffs, the right of the latter to reach such assets and apply them to their judgments follows of course. But here appellants insist that a court of equity will not entertain a creditors' bill when there is a legal remedy plain and adequate, and point out the conceded fact that part of the senior Collins's estate was realty in Douglas county, on which the lien of plaintiffs' judgments fastened before the attempted transfer to Esther, and in which the interest of John Collins, Jr., could at any time have been sold on execution. Neither the general rule of law contended for nor the alleged fact can be disputed. If the interest of John Collins, Jr., in the realty can be sold on execution for enough to satisfy the judgments, plaintiffs have no need of equitable relief, and should not be permitted to trouble the court. Williams v. Sexton, 19 Wis. 43; Level Land Co. No. 3 v. Siryer, 112 Wis. 442, 453, 88 N. W. 317. It is, however, settled by the decisions of this court that return upon execution that no property can be found establishes prima facie, at least, the exhaustion of legal remedies. Zweig v. Horicorn Mfg. Co. 17 Wis. 363; Hopkins v. Joyce, 78 Wis. 443, 47 N. W. 722; Daskam v. Neff, 79 Wis. 161, 47 N. W. 1132; Davelaar v. Blue Mound Invest. Co. 110 Wis. 470, 86 N. W. 185. If such fact is not conclusive, it surely cannot be said that its prima facie effect has been overcome in this case by other evidence. True, there appears—indeed, plaintiffs allege—the descent and ownership of a fractional interest in some real estate, but defendants have offered no proof as to its situation, character, or value. Non constat it may not have value to satisfy the costs of a sale. The burden of proving such facts was upon appellants, who by no means have lifted it. In the light of the prima facie case made by the nulla bona returns to the exeof which was acquiesced in by the husband for nearly five years before moving to set the award aside. It was decided by the House of Lords, affirming a decree of the lord chancellor, that the award, being founded on an agreement by both sides, must and would be carried into effect.

V. When inadequate as against creditors of insolvent husband.

In OPPENHEIMER V. COLLINS the principal question discussed was whether a withdrawal of an action for divorce, brought by the wife, was sufficient to support a conveyance by the husband to the wife of an interest in his father's estate, as against the claims of his creditors; and it was decided that it was not. This is exactly in line with a case decided by the general term of the supreme court of New York, in which it was held that transfers executed by a husband to his wife in pursuance of an agreement between them, whereby she agreed to discontinue a suit then pending against him for a limited divorce, and by which the parties agreed to live apart from each other, when there was no other consideration for the transfers, and they conveyed nearly all the debtor's property, leaving him insolvent,—are void as against the creditors of the husband, as the necessary consequence of the transaction was to deprive his creditors of the means of collecting their debts; and, as he must be presumed to have foreseen and intended the inevitable result of his own act, the transaction itself was conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent. Morgan v. Potter, 17 Hun, 403.

The only difference between the cases is that, in the principal case, the agreement of the wife evidently was that she would return to cohabitation with her husband, which it appears that she did; and in the other, the agreement was that the parties should live apart from each other.

The only other case upon, or akin to, the particular subject, wherein a different view appears to have been taken, is an English equity action in which it was held that, where the husband has behaved in such a manner as to entitle the wife to obtain a divorce, and she, instead of pursuing her right in the proper court, agrees to accept maintenance offered by him without litigation, an agreement for such maintenance of the husband's property will be upheld as based upon a valuable consideration, even against the claims of creditors of the husband to have it set aside as fraudulent. Hobbs v. Hull, 1 Cox Ch. Cas. 445.

A note is void, as against creditors, when given by a husband to his wife for a sum of money loaned him by her, which he had previously paid to her under an agreement that she would discontinue a suit for a divorce which she had commenced against him, and that they should live separate and he should pay her that sum, which he did, and she afterwards, of her own volition, returned to live with him as his wife and loaned him the sum paid her, and took the note therefor. Friedman v. Bierman, 43 Hun, 390.

In Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 449, 10 S. E. 799, which was an action in the nature of a creditor's bill, to have declared void a conveyance from husband to wife, the wife had applied to an attorney to obtain a divorce and alimony; and an agreement was made between the husband on one side and the wife and two sons on the other side, by which, in consideration that the wife would abandon any suit for a divorce, and that she and the sons would pay and satisfy certain debts, amounting to over $800, which he affirmed was all that he then owed, he agreed to, and did, convey to the wife the house and lot, which did not exceed in value the amount of the debts. At the same time the wife and sons assumed the payment of said debts, and afterwards paid and satisfied the same. The court held that the consideration for the conveyance was adequate, but did not say whether it meant the payment of the debts,—which, of course, of itself was,—or the agreement of the wife to abandon the suit for a divorce, or both.

VI. English decisions on application to reinstate divorce suit.

It will be noticed that some of the cases given as authority upon the subject under consideration are stated to be for the "restitution of conjugal rights." It is an action unknown in the United States, but has always existed in the British dominion, where, until 1884, the court having jurisdiction of matrimonial actions would command by its judgment a recalcitrant wife or husband to return to and resume cohabi-cutions, it was not error for the court to maintain the complaint, and proceed to apply the disclosed property to the unpaid judgments.

When, however, we come to consider the judgment finally entered, we find it far from correct. First we find a personal judgment against all the defendants, including these appellants, for the entire amount of plaintiffs' former judgments. This is inexplicable. There is no evidence, nor any finding of fact or conclusion of law, that either Hudnall or Esther W. Collins ever became in any way personally liable for these debts. In this respect the judgment is clearly erroneous, to the prejudice of each of the appellants. In addition to this, the judgment directs application of the realty and personalty in an order reverse of the proper one, viz., that the personalty in the hands of the administrator be first applied, and afterwards the realty be sold on execution. Obviously, the legal rights should be first exhausted against the real estate, to the exoperation of the personalty claimed by others. In this respect we are, however, unable to discover any prejudice to the appellants; for, apart from the possibility under the proofs already suggested that the realty may be but de minimis, it affirmatively appears that both together will fall short of satisfying plaintiffs' claims, and both must be fully exhausted. The entire estate of John Collins, Sr., was but $4,800, of which John, Jr.'s, share was not more than one seventh, or $685, of which $185 had already been drawn, leaving but possibly $500 to satisfy some $680 of plaintiffs' judgments and some $100 of costs in this action. Not being prejudicial, we cannot reverse that part of the judgment.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is modified by striking out therefrom the portion awarding personal recovery against the appellants, George B. Hudnall and Esther W. Collins, of the sum of $681.51, and, as so modified, is affirmed. Appellants will recover costs of this appeal.

But by 47 & 48 Vict. chap. 68, it is provided that "a decree for restitution of conjugal rights shall not be enforced by attachment;" and further, that a respondent failing to comply with a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights "shall thereupon be deemed guilty of desertion without reasonable cause," etc. While not changing the name of the suit, the statute in effect makes it a medium for procuring a judicial separation.

In Hayward v. Hayward, 1 Swabey & T. 333, which was a suit by the wife for a restitution of conjugal rights, the counsel for the respective parties, with the assent of both parties, agreed to a compromise, and the suit did not proceed. Thereafter counsel for the wife moved the court to allow the case to be heard, and the counsel for the husband contended that the wife was bound by her counsel's arrangement. In granting the motion, the judge ordinary said: "I think whatever arrangement may have been made between the parties, as the cause is still on the books and the petition has not been dismissed, I ought to hear it. I much doubt, however, whether this court can sanction or consider as binding any agreement between the parties to live asunder. Although such an agreement would be recognized at law or in equity, it would not have been recognized in the ecclesiastical courts."

Hooper v. Hooper, 1 Swabey & T. 602, was originally a petition by the wife for a judicial separation for the husband's cruel treatment. Before the hearing the parties agreed that the record should be withdrawn, proceedings stayed, and the suit not moved, the consideration being that the husband should pay the present alimony ordered by the court and £50 additional annually. Dispute having arisen as to the powers of a referee under the agreement of the parties, the wife applied to re-enter the record and have the cause set down for trial, relying upon Hayward v. Hayward, 1 Swabey & T. 333. The judge ordinary, in distinguishing that case, said: "Here the parties have agreed that the record should be withdrawn, proceedings stayed, and the suit not further moved; there the case was adjourned on the representation of counsel that an agreement out of court had been, or would be, arranged. One of the parties refused to abide by that agreement, and the cause simply remained on the books as it was before, unheard; here the cause remains on the books subject to an agreement made in court that the suit should not be moved any further. I am of opinion that I ought not to grant the application." And the motion was rejected.

This decision of the judge ordinary was practically affirmed by the dismissal of an appeal therefrom. 3 Swabey & T. 251. The principal distinction drawn would appear to have been that in one case the agreement was made "out of," and in the other "in," court.

In Stanes v. Stanes, L. R. 8 Prob. Div. 42, 47 L. J. Prob. N. S. 19, 39 L. T. N. S. 46, 26 Week. Rep. 238, the wife had filed a petition for a restitution of conjugal rights, to which the husband had answered, and, before hearing, an agreement was made whereby, in consideration of certain things to be performed by the husband, the suit was to be stayed and petition and counter-prayer dismissed. It was decided that a wife could bind herself not to prosecute a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, and her application to have the case set down for a hearing was denied.

Where, pending an action for divorce by the wife against the husband, an agreement in writing is entered into by the parties, whereby the wife, in consideration of the promise by the husband to execute a separation deed and do certain other things, agrees to have the petition taken off the file, and undertakes not to institute other proceedings in the divorce court, such an agreement is binding, and will be sustained. And, upon an application to the court to give directions as to the mode of trial of a suit for divorce subsequently brought by the wife, the court declined to give such directions. Rowley v. Rowley, 3 Swabey & T. 338.

Thereafter the wife appealed to the full court, which made no order on the appeal, but directed that, in case the husband did not apply for a dismissal of the petition, the wife might ask the judge ordinary's direction as to another trial. The petition was afterwards dismissed by the judge ordinary on the motion of the husband and the wife appealed to the House of Lords. The lord chancellor, in delivering the opinion of that body, said that the whole question turned upon the meaning of the words in the agreement, "the petitioner undertaking not to institute other proceedings in the divorce," and that it appeared to be difficult to apply any other

1. The resumption of marital relations by a wife living separate from her husband, and about to commence proceedings for divorce against him, to which she was entitled because of his wrongdoing, is a sufficient consideration for his promise to convey property in trust for the benefit of their children, and, in the event of their death, for her benefit.
2. Specific performance of a contract by a man to convey one third of his property in trust for the benefit of his children will not be denied because the interest might be reconveyed so as to let into joint management and ownership with him of his business undesirable persons whose interference might jeopardize, if not destroy, its value.

3. A contract by a man whose wife is living separate from him, and about to begin a suit for divorce because of his wrongdoing, that, in case she will resume her marital relations, he will convey one third of his property in trust for their children, and for her in the event of their death, is not void because it is not mutually binding upon the parties, and the remedy for its enforcement is not mutual to them.
4. Lack of mutuality of obligation and remedy will not, after the wife has resumed marital relations, defeat specific performance at her instance of a contract by a man to convey property to his children in consideration that the wife, who is living separate from him, and about to begin a suit for divorce, for which she has good grounds, resume her marital relations and live with the other contracting party as his wife after the full execution of the agreement; and the fact that she cannot be compelled to maintain such relations during life is immaterial.

than one meaning to these words; that it was not contended that they amounted to an undertaking never to institute any other proceedings, but that they seemed to have been intended to prevent future proceedings in respect of matters forming the ground of a petition for a divorce which had occurred prior to the agreement. Id. L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 68.

VII. Necessity of third party.

a. Third party unnecessary.

Upon the question as to whether, in a contract between husband and wife to compromise, or not to commence, a divorce suit, it is essential that the wife act through the medium of a third party or trustee, the authorities are not entirely agreed; but it may be safely stated that the weight is in favor of the doctrine that it is not.

The foundation for this exception to the general rule that the wife cannot contract directly with her husband is that, when an actual separation (which is the prelude to such a suit) occurs, she is said to be at "arms length" with him, the meaning of which is,—in the language of a learned Irish judge,—"that she is, by the circumstances in which she is placed in her relations with her husband, completely and effectually freed from that marital influence and control which the law regards as depriving her of independent volition." Cahill v. Martin, Ir. L. R. 5 Eq. 227.

And for this reason it is said that she is to be considered, when she enters into such a contract, as a feme sole.

In Bateman v. Ross, 1 Dow P. C. 235, IV. supra, it was objected that the next friend of the wife in the divorce suit was not made a party to the submission to arbitration; and that she (alone) could not agree to it so as to render it binding. The court said that there was nothing in this objection, as the award was founded on an agreement on both sides, and the husband had filed a cross bill against the wife, which she had answered; so that, under the circumstances of the case, she was to be regarded as a feme sole, and there was no occasion to make the next friend a party.

In Cahill v. Cahill, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 420, 49 L. T. N. S. 606, 81 Week. Rep. 861, supra, III., the agreement was made without the intervention of a third party. The vice chancellor (Ir. L. R. 5 Eq. 227), and court of appeal (Ir. L. R. 7 Eq. 361), in Ireland, had held that the agreement was good. On appeal the House of Lords decided that it was not good, for the reason that it was in regard to an interest or right in regard to which the wife would not have power to contract, even with a stranger. One headnote states that it was held "that the wife was not, when she signed the document, in all respects, in the same position as a feme sole;" but a perusal of the several opinions will hardly justify it. That she was, had been elaborately argued and distinctly held by the vice chancellor and court of appeal in Ireland.

In Vanstittart v. Vanstittart, 4 Kay & J. 62, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 222, 4 Jur. N. S. 276, there was no third party to the agreement, and Vice Chancellor Wood affirms the proposition that, when contracting with her husband as to discontinuing a divorce suit she has commenced against him, a wife is to be considered as a feme sole. The contract was decided to be void for another reason.

The report of the case in 2 De G. & J. 249, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 290, 4 Jur. N. S. 519, shows that it was merely an affirmation of the case in 4 Kay & J. 62, and for substantially the same reasons, i. e., that the agreement must be taken in its entirety, and that, as it contained a provision contrary to law, equity would not enforce it. The question as to its validity without the intervention of a third party was not decided.

In Hart v. Hart, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 670, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 697, 45 L. T. N. S. 13, 80 Week. Rep. 8, supra, IV., the court stated that, as the husband and wife are at arms length in a divorce suit, it was competent for them to make the agreement to dismiss it.

The effect of these English decisions, and the reasons given in and for them, would seem to be: (1) That, whenever difficulties and discussions arise between husband and wife to such an extent that it is plainly apparent that the aid of the proper tribunal will be necessary, and will be invoked to settle the same, the wife is competent to enter into an agreement with her husband for the purpose, either of preventing a suit, or of compromising one if already commenced; and such a contract will be valid and binding on both, whether it be for a return to and resumption of marital relations, or to live

5. The description of the property is sufficient to uphold the contract, where the agreement is to convey one third of all grantor's estate, real, personal, or mixed, of whatever kind or nature, belonging to him in his own right, which he acquired under the will of his mother, as well as all the other estate otherwise acquired and now owned by him.
6. Parol evidence is admissible to designate the particular property described and identified by a written contract for its conveyance, and which was in the contemplation of the parties in making the contract.
7. A married woman may maintain a suit in equity against her husband to enforce his contract to convey property in trust for their children and herself in consideration of her resumption of marital relations which she had abandoned because of conduct on his part entitling her to a divorce, where the statute permits her to sue alone in actions between her and her husband.

separate and apart. And the reason is that, under such circumstances and in regard to such matters, she is to be treated as if she were a feme sole. (2) And that, for the same reason, the wife will be permitted to enter into covenants in such an agreement only when the same relate to her separate estate or property; and that rights of property or interests held by her with her husband she cannot anticipate, nor in any way divest herself of by agreement.

In some jurisdictions statutes have been enacted clothing the wife with enlarged power to contract, not alone with strangers, but with her husband also. And in such the application of the rule just stated will largely depend upon the extent to which the local enabling act goes.

It is suggested that in those states where, in the absence of such statutes, the English rule would be applicable, and in which the tenancy by the entirety has not been abrogated, she would be incompetent to contract in regard to the latter.

A transfer by a husband to his wife of a slave woman and her children, made to secure the discontinuance of an action for alimony and the discharge of an interlocutory decree therefor, is valid, although made without the intervention of a trustee. Wallingsford v. Allen, 10 Pet. 583, 9 L. ed. 542.

And, in regard to the property so transferred, the wife is to be considered as a feme sole; and her right to dispose of it follows as a matter of course; and her deed manumitting the slaves is valid and effectual. Ibid.

A contract is valid by which a wife agrees to discontinue proceedings instituted by her against her husband to dissolve the marriage contract, upon receiving a separate maintenance. In such cases the wife is, by statute, authorized to proceed as a feme sole, and has, therefore, a right to compromise the suit in the same manner as any other party. Kirby v. Kirby, 1 Paige, 565.

It will be noticed, from the foregoing cases, that in nearly all the doctrine is asserted, expressly or by clear implication, that the agreement between husband and wife to compromise the divorce action is valid, although made without the intervention of a third party; and this notwithstanding the rigid rule of law that contracts between husband and wife are void.

There are several reasons given for holding such agreements valid, two of them depending upon whether the contract is to live separate

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Christian County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hunter Wood & Son, Kohn, Baird, & Spindle, and Barker & Woods, for appellants:

If a wife, having reasonable grounds for believing she has good cause for a divorce, separates from her husband, and, while living apart, in consideration of his promise to treat her according to the full measure of his marital obligations, and his agreement to convey one third of his property to a trustee for the benefit of their children, condones his wrongs, and returns to his home, and makes him a dutiful wife,—a court of equity will decree a specific performance of the contract by compelling him to make the necessary conveyances.

A contract between husband and wife, and apart, or to return to and resume the marital relation. In the former instance a reason would seem to be that the parties, after they have so far separated as that an action is seriously contemplated, or actually commenced, may do, by agreement, just what the court would decree in the action. In the other instance the peculiar reason is that both law and equity favor continued fulfillment of the marriage contract, and will lean heavily toward the support of an agreement looking that way.

And a reason common to all agreements to compromise such actions is found in the argument, so well stated by the master of the rolls in Besant v. Wood, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 606, 40 L. T. N. S. 445, supra, II., which, in substance, is that the right to institute the suit comprehends the right to discontinue it. But the chief and best general reason probably is, that, when a wife so far separates from her husband as to initiate proceedings for a divorce, she is to be regarded and treated as a feme sole in reference to any agreement she may make with him looking to a stoppage of the proceedings or a discontinuance of the action. But such agreement is only valid when made after an actual separation.

b. Third party necessary.

There are, however, cases which seem, by implication at least, to indicate that a third party is necessary to render such a contract valid. As in Van Order v. Van Order, 8 Hun, 315, supra, I., where the court, in declining to enforce such a contract, said that there was a general disability of married women to contract directly with their husbands.

And in Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 67, 25 Am. Rep. 295, supra, III., where the note which was the subject of the action, and the consideration of which was the dismissal by the wife of the divorce suit brought by her against her husband, was given to the plaintiff for the use of the wife,—the court said that the power of a husband to make a settlement of property or funds on his wife, by the intervention of a trustee, had never been questioned.

In Reamey v. Bayley (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 640, 11 Atl. 438, supra, III., the agreement was between the husband as the first party and the plaintiff, as trustee for the wife, and the wife, as the other parties. The action on the bond given by the husband to secure his performance of the agreement was brought by the trustee of made in consideration of a separation which has already taken place, or in contemplation of an immediate separation, is good, and will be enforced.

The doctrine of mutuality, as a necessary element to the specific enforcement of a contract, applies only where the contract is executory on the part of all the contracting parties.

the wife against the husband. Throughout the making of the agreement, and the trial and argument down to the final decision, it seems to have been taken for granted that the intervention of a trustee was essential to the making of a valid agreement, although it is not so expressly stated.

e. Third party; but necessity for, not stated.

The following are cases in which the agreement which was upheld was made through the intervention of a third party; but the necessity of such party to render the contract valid does not appear to have been considered. Besant v. Wood, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 605, 40 L. T. N. S. 445, and Bucklin v. Bucklin, 1 Keyes, 141, supra, II.; Webster v. Webster, 27 L. J. Ch. N. S. 115, 3 Jur. N. S. 655; Duffy v. White, 115 Mich. 264, 73 N. W. 363; Burkholder's Appeal, 105 Pa. 31; and Adams v. Adams, 24 Hun, 401, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675, supra, III.; Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. L. Cas. 538, 12 Jur. 467, and Jodrell v. Jodrell, 9 Beav. 45, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 17, 9 Jur. 1022, supra, IV.; Hobbs v. Hull, 1 Cox Ch. Cas. 445, supra, V.; Newsome v. Newsome, L. R. 2 Prob. 306, 40 L. J. M. C. N. S. 71, 25 L. T. N. S. 204, 19 Week. Rep. 1039, infra, VIII.

In Rogers v. Rogers, 4 Paige, 516, 27 Am. Dec. 84, supra, II., the court said that it was competent for the wife, with the consent of her next friend, to agree to discontinue the suit; but did not in terms decide that such consent was necessary.

d. Contract held valid without third party; but absence of, not mentioned.

There are instances where there appears to have been no third party to the contract, and where the court, without reference to that fact, held the contract valid.

In MOAYON v. MOAYON there was a trustee for the children, but none for the wife.

In Reithmaier v. Beckwith, 35 Mich. 110, supra, III., the note which was held valid was given directly to the wife by name.

In Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J. Eq. 429, 24 Atl. 227, supra, IV., the agreement by the husband to convey the house and lot to the wife was oral, and the statement of facts indicates that there was no third party, and, as the contract which was upheld was not reduced to writing, it would seem impossible that there could have been.

e. Agreement without third party void; but not for that reason.

Again, there are cases in which there was no third party representing the wife, but the contract in which was declared void; but not on account of the absence of a third party, but for some other reason affecting its validity.

In Friedman v. Bierman, 43 Hun, 390, supra, V., it was evident that there was no third party. The husband paid the wife the money, which she afterwards loaned to him, taking therefor the note which was held void.

The following are cases in none of which there was a third party to the agreement, and in each of which the contract was held void for another reason; and the fact of the absence of the third party was not considered: Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 39 Pac. 801, supra, II.; Fisher v. Koontz, 110 Iowa, 498, 80 N. W. 551, 81 N. W. 702, supra, III.; Morgan v. Potter, 17 Hun, 408, supra, V.

f. Third party to contract; but contract void for other reason.

The following are cases in each of which there was a third party to the contract, and the agreement was held invalid on some other ground: Armstrong v. Armstrong, 1 N. Y. S. R. 529, supra, II.; Merrill v. Peaslee, 146 Mass. 460, 16 N. E. 271; Copeland v. Boaz, 9 Baxt. 223, 40 Am. Rep. 89; and Roberts v. Frisby, 38 Tex. 219, supra, III.

g. Cases in which it does not appear whether there was, or was not, a third party.

Taylor v. Taylor, 32 Misc. 312, 66 N. Y. Supp. 561, and Pettit v. Pettit, 107 N. Y. 677, 14 N. E. 500, supra, II.; Rozell v. Redding, 59 Mich. 331, 26 N. W. 498, supra, III.; Smith v. Smith, 35 Hun, 378, infra, VIII.

VIII. Other cases.

After a wife had brought an action against her husband for a separation for cruel and inhuman treatment, an agreement was made between them by which she was to return to his bed and board upon certain conditions which do not appear in the case, but a part of which agreement was that he should pay the costs and expenses of the suit to her attorney. The husband thereafter refused to pay the amount of a bill for such costs and expenses, and put in a verified answer to the complaint in the action. The action was held not to have been discontinued, and the court was held to have power to make an order fixing the amount of such costs and expenses and directing that the amount thereof be paid by the husband, together with the referee's fees and costs of the motion, and that on such payment the action be discontinued. *Smith v. In Polson v. Stewart, 167 Mass. 211, 36 L. R. A. 771, 45 N. E. 737, it was held that forbearance by a wife to bring a well-founded suit for divorce against her husband is a sufficient and legal consideration for a covenant by the husband to surrender all his marital rights in land belonging to the wife. In this case the parties were domiciled in North Carolina at the time the agreement was made, and the wife had taken steps under the statutes of that state, which gave her the right to contract as a feme sole with her husband as well as with others; and the Massachusetts court decided that, the contract being made in North Carolina, the law of that state governed, and that that part of it by which the husband agreed to release his marital rights in land of the wife in Massachusetts was binding and enforceable in the latter state, although an actual conveyance of the land directly from the wife to the husband would be void. It does not appear whether, by the terms of the agreement, the wife was to return or live separate.

Appellant Birdie Moayon and appellee, Max Moayon, are husband and wife. They have two children, who are infants. The Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company is the guardian of these children. Prior to December 4, 1900, there was a separation of these parties on a ground, as is alleged, which entitled the wife to a divorce a vinculo. It is not material to this decision as to the nature of this cause. The wife had retained counsel, who had prepared for filing a petition for divorce from appellee. On the 4th of December, 1900, at the instance of appellee, the parties treated for a settlement of their differences, resulting in a contract in writing between them, which we copy in full, as follows:

This agreement, made and entered into this 4th day of December, 1900, by and between Max J. Moayon and his wife, Birdie Moayon, and the Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company, trustee for Beatrice and Jessamine, children of the said Max and

In Newsome v. Newsome, L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. 306, 40 L. J. M. C. N. S. 71, 25 L. T. N. S. 204, 19 Week. Rep. 1039, there was an agreement that the wife, in consideration that the husband would surrender to her his interest in a copartnership and live apart from her, would not prosecute divorce proceedings against him so long as he remained true in love and duty. The judge ordinary said that an agreement not to come to the divorce court was not at all derogatory to the marriage vow, but the reverse; and there was no reason why it should not be upheld by the court; citing Rowley v. Rowley, and Hooper v. Hooper, supra, VI. But, on account of his violating his part of the agreement by a subsequent adultery, the wife was released from her part of it, and the original cause for divorce was revived, and a divorce decreed the wife on account of it.

Rep. 573, the master of the rolls said that, unless a married woman was allowed to contract herself out of her rights in the divorce court, no proceedings in that court could ever be compromised, but must be fought out to the end; and that it was absurd to say that a married woman is competent to commence a suit, but not competent to compromise it.

IX. Conclusion.

In OTTENHEIMER v. COLLINS the first reason given for the decision, viz., that, even where no rights of creditors are involved, a consideration consisting solely and exclusively in the with-

Birdie Moayon, witnesseth: That whereas, the said Max and Birdie are now, and have been for some months past, living separate and apart from each other; and whereas, the said parties have this day agreed mutually to forego their differences, and to be reconciled, and live with each other as husband and wife, after the full execution of this agreement: Now, and in view of the fact that the parties have agreed that a settlement is to be made upon the said children by the said Max Moayon, in order to insure a sufficient estate for them and for their maintenance, education, and support, and future welfare: Now, in consideration of the love and affection which the said Max Moayon bears the said children, Beatrice and Jessamine, and in consideration of \$1 cash in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and in consideration of the acceptance of the trust by said Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company under this agreement, the said Max Moayon hereby agrees to convey, transfer, and deliver in fee simple to the Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company, as trustee, for the use and benefit of the said Beatrice and Jessamine Moayon, his children, one third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of all of his estate, real, personal, or mixed, of whatever kind or nature, belonging to him in his own right, which he acquired under the will of Hannah Moayon, his mother, as well as all the other estate otherwise acquired or now owned by him; the said personal property to be delivered according to the rules of law, and the real estate to be conveyed by deed properly acknowledged and recorded as soon as the deeds can be prepared. The absolute estate is to be conveyed to said trustee for the use and benefit of the said children, and, in the event of the death of either of said children, the estate of such child shall go to and belong to said Birdie Moayon, for her own sole and separate use forever. Said trustee shall have the authority to collect all income from said estate so conveyed, and pay the same over to the said Birdie Moayon for the use and benefit of the said children's care and education. She shall not be required to render any account of the moneys thus received by her, but her receipt shall be an absolute acquittance of the trustee. Said trustee shall be authorized to convey, sell, exchange, or dispose of any part of the estate so conveyed, and transfer a fee-simple title, whenever the said trustee deems it proper to do so; and conveyance by the said trustee shall convey the fee-simple title, and the said trustee shall hold the proceeds received from any such conveyance for the same use, purposes, and to the same extent and in the same manner as the original estate is held under this agreement. It is agreed between the parties that within ten days a full inventory of all the estate of the said Moayon shall be delivered to the said Birdie Moayon and said Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company, and the deeds executed in accordance with this agreement, and the transfers of personalty made in accordance with the terms of this agreement and to carry into full effect the same. Witness the hands of the parties this 4th day of December, 1900, at Louisville, Kentucky.

The Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company joins in the foregoing arrangement for drawal by the wife of an action for divorce and a renewal of cohabitation is not sufficient to sustain an assignment of interest in property by the husband to the wife, is faulty, and is not borne out by the authority cited for it.

In Baum v. Baum, 109 Wis. 47, 53 L. R. A. 650, 85 N. W. 122, the judge who delivered the opinion of the court, speaking of the status or condition of the parties at the time of the making of the oral agreement between husband and wife to live separate and apart, there held to be invalid, said: "The plain inference is that the parties were then living together as man and wife;" while in OPPENHEIMER v. COLLINS an action for divorce was pending at the time of the making of the agreement between the husband and wife. Nobody disputes the proposition that a husband and wife, while living together as such, are incapable of making a valid and binding contract with each other to live separate; but an authority to that effect is not a very forceful one against the other proposition, stated and affirmed in the preceding cases, that, after husband and wife have actually separated, and a divorce suit has been commenced, a contract between them to compromise such suit is valid. The very fact that a wife has commenced an action for divorce against her husband (or vice versa) creates an inference, or a presumption, that the parties are living separate and apart from each other.

In those states where provision has been made by statute that husband and wife may contract directly with each other, there is, of course, no need of the intervention of a third party. See France v. France, 38 Misc. 459, 77 60 L. R. A.

N. Y. Supp. 1015, supra, II.; Goldstein v. Goldstein, 35 Misc. 251, 71 N. Y. Supp. 807, supra, III.

And in Fisher v. Koonts, 110 Iowa, 498, 80 N. W. 551, 81 N. W. 702, supra, III., it was stated that a provision of the statutes of Iowa (Code, § 3157) expressly authorized "a conveyance, transfer, or lien, executed by either husband or wife to or in favor of the other," and that the interest in the husband's property, claimed to have been restored by the oral agreement, might be the subject of contract between them.

As a result of the investigation, it appears that, whenever a party to a marriage,—and while in every known instance but one it seems to have been the wife, yet there is no apparent reason for saying it would never be the husband—separates from the other, and takes steps to, or actually does, commence a suit for a divorce, a subsequent contract between the husband and wife to compromise the divorce suit is valid; and further, that the agreement to do so on the part of the wife will furnish a sufficient consideration for covenants on the part of the husband for the maintenance of herself and children. That, in making such a contract under such circumstances, the wife (except as to rights and interests held by her with her husband) acts in all respects as a feme sole, and no third party to represent her is necessary. And that such a contract is valid, whether it provides that the parties shall thereafter live separate and apart from each other, or shall resume the marital relation.

Fidelity Trust & Safety Vault Company.
by John W. Barr, Vice President.

The foregoing facts are gathered from appellant's petition filed in this case seeking a specific performance of the above contract, it being also alleged that, in pursuance thereto, appellant Birdie had forgiven the wrongs of appellee, and had returned to his home, and resumed her relations as a dutiful wife; and from the date of this contract, and in performance of her part thereof, had continued to live with appellee as his wife, and was yet doing so. It was also averred that appellee had wholly failed to comply with his part of the agreement, the one above copied, and that he refused to do so. A full description of his property, alleged to be that intended by the parties to be, and that was, embraced in the terms of the written contract, was given in the petition. It shows a number of pieces of real estate in Christian county, this state, and personal property of the value of about $20,000. Appellee interposed a demurrer to the petition, which was sustained, and the petition dismissed.

In support of the judgment, it is argued that the contract is unenforceable for the following reasons: (1) That it is not founded upon a valuable consideration, and that it is disfavored upon principles of sound public policy; (2) that it is indefinite and uncertain and inequitable and unreasonable; (3) that it is lacking in mutuality of obligation and remedy on the part of the wife; (4) that the description of the property to be conveyed is not sufficiently certain, nor is it sufficiently identified to satisfy the statute of frauds; (5) that the wife cannot contract with her husband concerning her property rights, nor can she sue him therefor, other than in an action for divorce and alimony. As a determination for appellee of any one of the questions just outlined must result in an affirmation of the judgment, we will take them up and discuss and dispose of them in the order stated.

1. It is conceded by the demurrer that Mrs. Moayon had legal grounds for her separation and divorce; that she and her husband were then living apart because of those grounds; and that she had retained counsel to prepare, and he had prepared, a suit for her seeking a divorce from her husband. She, at her husband's solicitation, forgave his wrong, resumed a relation which he, by his conduct, had forfeited, and had no legal right to longer claim, and saved to him the costs of the threatened litigation. Also, under the facts admitted, she was certainly entitled to recover from him substantial alimony, including maintenance for herself and children pending the action, and including a sum sufficient to enable her to employ counsel and defray the costs of her suit against him. As between other persons, where one has a cause of action against the other, and is about to begin a suit on it, its abandonment and satisfaction will constitute a consideration to support a contract based upon that fact. Clarke v. McFarland, 5 Dana, 48; Brown v. Buford, 3 B. Mon. 508, 39 Am. Dec. 477; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 947, and cases. Nor is it even necessary that the party sought to be charged shall have been benefited by the abandonment of the suit. If the other party has thereby been put to an irretrievable disadvantage, that fact will equally constitute what is termed a valuable consideration. Ford v. Crenshaw, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 70; Gaines v. Scott, 3 Ky. L. Rep. 418. Becoming reconciled to the husband, with full knowledge of his actionable offense, will be a bar, as a condonement, to the suit of the wife for divorce, based upon the original facts. Independent of the question whether the fact of the reconciliation was not of as much value to the wife as to the husband, and that a mere claim or right to a divorce is of no legal value, yet her right to a settlement upon herself and children as alimony and maintenance was a right possessing money value. When she abandoned and obliterated her cause for divorce in this case, it likewise nullified her right to sue for and recover alimony.

It is argued, though, that it is the duty of the wife, no less than of the husband, to maintain in good faith the marital relation; that a promise of one to pay money to the other to continue the married relation is at best but an agreement to pay for the performance of a duty already undertaken for a sufficient consideration (to wit, the mutual undertaking to live together in the married state); and that, therefore, there is nothing upon which to rest the new promise. Were it the fact that there was no cause for the separation, this argument of appellee would be good. The other side of this proposition—that is, an agreement between husband and wife by which the former undertook to pay the latter a stipend in consideration of their living apart—has been before this court frequently. In all those cases it was shown that the marital relations had become unendurable to the parties, whether because of statutory grounds of divorce or not was not always shown. The contract of the husband to pay the wife a stipulated sum, or to convey to her certain property, was upheld on the theory that it was the legal and moral duty of the husband to support the wife, and that these contracts were but another form of, and were in lieu of, the original undertaking, and were consequently valid. Gaines v. Poor, 3 Met. (Ky.) 503, 79 Am. Dec. 559; Flood v. Flood, 5 Bush, 170; Loud v. Loud, 4 Bush, 455; Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky. 510, 20 S. W. 605. Nor was it held in those cases to be necessary that the suit for divorce should be pending in order to support the agreement. It was sufficient if there was an actual or impending separation and suit for divorce. Gaines v. Poor, 3 Met. (Ky.) 503, 79 Am. Dec. 559. It is the policy of the law, because it has been found best for social happiness and progress, that the state of marriage be encouraged. Certainly, if an agreement between husband and wife, settling the obligations of the husband to provide for the wife, in contemplation of their living permanently apart, will be specifically enforced, as being based upon a sufficient legal consideration and as being not contrary to the policy of the law, a fortiori must be a contract between them under like conditions, founded on the consideration of the restoration or preservation of the marital relation. See Bishop, Marr., Div., & Sep. § 1279. As said in Adams v. Adams, 91 N. Y. 381, 43 Am. Rep. 675: "While the law favors the settlement of controversies between all other persons, it would be a curious policy which would forbid husband and wife to compromise their differences, or preclude either from forgiving a wrong committed by the other." To the same effect is the case of Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 70, 25 Am. Rep. 295. In Barbour v. Barbour, 49 N. J. Eq. 429, 24 Atl. 227, the wife had abandoned her husband because of certain violations by him of the marital duties. She brought suit for divorce and alimony. He sought a reconciliation. Among other inducements offered by the husband was the agreement to convey her certain real estate owned by him if she would be reconciled to him. Relying upon his assurances and promises, she did become reconciled, and again took up her former relations with him as wife. He then refused to comply with his agreement to convey her the property as he had agreed. The court, at her suit for specific performance, granted the relief prayed for. In the course of the opinion it was said: "The agreement is an agreement respecting the conveyance of land. The consideration was a valuable one. No consideration can be named of higher importance or of more solemn significance. It is difficult to measure it. Dollars and cents afford no adequate conception of the true nature of the consideration moving upon the one side to the execution of this agreement. This agreement is thus brought within every case that recognizes the doctrine of part performance in the slightest degree. Upon the part of the wife it is not only partially, but entirely, performed. She not only agreed to become reconciled to him, but in the sincerest manner, by her conduct, manifested her determination so to continue." In addition to the foregoing, we think the principle is also sustained by the following authorities: Smith v. Smith, 35 Hun, 378; Shepard v. Shepard, 7 Johns. Ch. 57, 11 Am. Dec. 396; Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 449, 10 S. E. 799. We are, consequently, of opinion that the contract was based upon sufficient consideration, and is not opposed to a sound public policy.

2. That the contract is definite, certain, fair, and equitable, we have no doubt. The wife agrees to abandon, and it is alleged has abandoned, her suit for divorce, and has forgiven its cause. She agrees to resume the wifely relation, and has done so in pursuance to the agreement. The husband undertook, besides his promise of a fulfillment of the conjugal duties, to convey to a named trustee one third of all his property for the maintenance and education of their two children; it in event of their death to go to the wife. It also was provided for the management of the trust. The only serious criticism of the paper as to its indefiniteness or lack of equity, besides the matters of description and mutuality, which will be discussed further on, is the suggestion that it is unfair and inequitable to appellee to enforce a contract that may let into joint ownership with him in his property, and in his mercantile establishment, other persons probably not desirable, and whose interference would jeopardize, if not destroy, the value of his business. As to the real property, it not infrequently happens that it is owned jointly by persons of incompatible tastes. Yet we have never before heard it urged as a defense against the specific performance of one's contract to sell an undivided interest in his land that his vendee might sell the interest to some undesirable person, entailing, probably, a disastrous suit to sell the whole property because of its indivisibility. Those are questions that might properly influence one in determining whether he will sell an undivided interest in his property. But, after he has contracted to do so for an adequate consideration, we perceive no reason why equity should relieve him from a specific execution of his contract on such a ground. Upon the face of the contract, it does not appear to us to be unfair. It settles upon the wife's children, certainly, no more than the allegations of her petition show would probably have been set apart to her as alimony, had she prosecuted her suit. That she saw proper to have this sum settled on her children, instead of upon herself, is not a ground for objection by appellee.

3. It is very earnestly argued that the contract should not be enforced because of lack of mutuality in obligation and in remedy. It is asserted by appellee that, before a contract will be specifically enforced in equity, it must not only be reasonable and practicable, and supported by an adequate consideration, and be certain and definite in regard to the property to be conveyed, but it must be mutually binding upon the parties, and the remedy for its enforcement must also be mutual to the parties. It is the latter condition that we now address ourselves to. We concede the correctness of appellee's proposition. Yet it may be satisfied with less than an ideal fulfillment of its full text. For example, it is generally held that, under the statutes of frauds and perjuries, where the contract is not in writing, if one party, relying on the agreement, and induced thereby, has executed his part of the contract, the other party may be compelled to perform, or to respond in damages if specific performance is withheld. Not to do so would be to make the statute enacted to prevent frauds an instrument for effectuating a fraud. To examine minutely that part of the agreement bearing on this question, we again quote from it: "Whereas, the said Max and Birdie Moayon are now, and have been for some months past, living separate and apart from each other; and whereas, the said parties have this day mutually agreed to forego their differences, and to be reconciled and live with each other as husband and wife after the full execution of this agreement: Now, and in view of the fact that the parties have agreed that a settlement is to be made upon the said children by the said Max Moayon, in order to insure a sufficient estate for them, and for their maintenance, education, and support and future welfare; Now, in consideration of the love and affection which the said Max Moayon bears the said children, Beatrice and Jessamine, and in consideration of one dollar cash in hand paid," etc. We have not rested this contract on the consideration of the "love and affection" of the father to his children (though it seems that might, alone, have been sufficient in this state), any more than upon the $1 recited as having been paid. In the case of an executed contract, reciting several matters as constituting the consideration, if any one of them is sufficient, probably that would satisfy the inquiry. But in an executory contract, the execution of which is resisted by one of the parties, the inquiry should embrace all the matters recited as the consideration, because we cannot say that the complaining party would have entered into the contract in the absence of any of the matters recited as the moving consideration for his action. The consideration of this contract may be thus stated: (a) The mutual agreement to forego differences; (b) the mutual agreement to be reconciled; (c) the mutual agreement to live with each other as husband and wife; (d) love and affection of the husband for his children; (e) $1. The last two are not questioned. Appellant Mrs. Moayon did forego the cause of their difference. That part of the contract is unquestionably executed. She did become reconciled to appellee. That is executed. The only remaining part of the contract is (c) "the mutual agreement to live with each other as husband and wife after the full execution of this agreement." The parties saw proper to anticipate the time of execution of this clause of the contract, and resumed their living together before the full execution of the agreement. This was necessarily by mutual consent, and neither party can take advantage by complaint of that act. The case is rested, however, on this point, upon the argument by appellee that the contract contemplated not merely going back to their former relation, but permanently continuing in it; that the wife's undertaking on this score cannot be fulfilled short of the death of one of the parties, for, so long as they both live, she might leave him. It is then argued that, so long as she owes him any part of this undertaking (i. e., to live with him as his wife), it is a duty that could not be enforced against her by the court; that no civil court ever has attempted to compel two people to so live together, no matter which was in fault. Therefore it is claimed there is lacking that mutuality of remedy necessary to the enforcement in equity of this contract. Marriage contracts and marriage articles have been upheld and enforced by the courts from earliest times. They involve an agreement between a man and woman to assume the marital relation,—to live together as husband and wife,—in consideration of which each relinquishes his or her claim to the other's property, or one agrees to convey or deliver to the other certain property or money. If they, in pursuance of the agreement, did marry and live together as husband and wife, the contract has been considered always as executed, so far as that part of the undertaking was concerned. It has been held that neither misconduct of a party after marriage (Moore v. Moore, 1 Atk. 272; Sidney v. Sidney, 3 P. Wms. 269; Seagrave v. Seagrave, 13 Ves. Jr. 439; Fisher v. Koontz, 110 Iowa, 498, 80 N. W. 551, 81 N. W. 702), nor the subsequent divorce of the parties, in the absence of some term in the contract providing against such contingency, or of some statutory regulation of the subject, affects the validity of the marriage settlement (Evans v. Carrington, 2 De G. F. & J. 481; Barclay v. Waring, 58 Ga. 86; Babcock v. Smith, 22 Pick. 61; Child v. Pearl, 43 Vt. 224). Bonds for the payment of money have been enforced upon the executed consideration of marriage. Smith v. Patterson, Cheves Eq. 29; Ancker v. Levy, 3 Strobb. Eq. 197; Logan v. Wienholt, 1 Clark & F. 611. The promise of a woman to marry a man was held a sufficient and valuable consideration to support his deed to her, where it appeared that she had been prevented from executing the promise without her fault, but by his death. Smith v. Allen, 5 Allen, 454, 81 Am. Dec. 758. The marriage contract (that is, the agreement to marry), is complete and executed when the parties to it have entered into the married relation in the manner required by statute. Undoubtedly every valid marriage contemplates that the parties shall live together as husband and wife "till death them do part." In a case like the present one the agreement to live together as husband and wife could include nothing more on this point than the original vows of matrimony did. To say that marriage was not an execution of that part of a marriage settlement between a man and a woman, competent to marry, as would require the performance of the other undertakings in the settlement, would be to practically destroy that which for time out of mind has been regarded as a subject of such contracts, for it would necessarily postpone the execution of the remaining part of such contracts till the death of one of the parties; thereby substantially destroying their value, in many instances, to the party benefited and intended to be protected by them. We must hold, in reason and under the authorities, that this feature of the contract under consideration was executed by the resumption of the parties of the marital relation and duties. What relief appellee would be entitled to, as to a restoration of the property, or some part thereof, if Mrs. Moayon should subsequently abandon him without cause, is a question we do not determine.

4. Does the contract sufficiently describe the property to be conveyed? The description in the contract is: "One third of all his [appellee's] estate, real, personal, or mixed, of whatever kind or nature, belonging to him in his own right, which he acquired under the will of Hannah Moayon, his mother, as well as all the other estate otherwise acquired or now owned by him." Can the intention of the parties, and the property to be affected by the writing, be gathered from this description? If so, the statute is complied with. It is the purpose of the description of the property concerning which a contract is made, to identify it. As said in Warvelle on Vendors, vol. 1, § 96: "While an unequivocal description, giving location, area, and boundaries, is a literal and perfect observance of the rule, a less particular statement will usually suffice, provided it contains within itself the proper means of identification, as by reference to extrinsic facts or other instruments by means of which the land can be ascertained with sufficient certainty." The ideal, perfect description is preferred. But we cannot compel its adoption. It is our business to treat with such contracts as the parties have made, enforcing them when lawful and practicable. It is not necessary, then, that the writing should do more than indicate clearly what property is to be affected by it, if its description or identification can be gotten from the contract, or from any extrinsic fact or writing referred to in the contract. A portion of the property may be identified by the will of Hannah Moayon, specifically referred to in the contract. It is necessarily of record to be a will, and that record will satisfy so much of the contract as treats of so much of appellee's property as derives its title from that source. The remainder of the description is: "All the other estate otherwise acquired or owned by me." In Warvelle on Vendors, § 135, it is said that a description as "my house and lot" imports a particular house and lot, rendered certain by the description that it is the one that belongs to "me." The following descriptions have been held sufficient: "My lot . . . on the plat in the town of South Bend, on the plat of said town, on the river bank" (Colerick v. Hooper, 3 Ind. 316, 56 Am. Dec. 505); the "Snow farm" (Hollis v. Burgess, 37 Kan. 487, 15 Pac. 534); "H.'s place at S." (Hodges v. Kowing, 58 Conn. 12, 7 L. R. A. 87, 18 Atl. 979); the "Knapp home property" (Goodenow v. Curtis, 18 Mich. 298); an agreement to convey land described as "occupied" by the vendor or a third person (Angel v. Simpson, 85 Ala. 53, 3 So. 758; Towle v. Carmelo Land & Coal Co. 99 Cal. 397, 33 Pac. 1126; Dooter v. Hellberg, 65 Wis. 415, 27 N. W. 176). In all such cases parol evidence was admitted not to identify, but to designate, the subject-matter, already identified in the minds of the parties, in the language of the contract 60 L. R. A.

when read in the light of the facts. In this state, in Overstreet v. Rice, 4 Bush, 3, 96 Am. Dec. 279, the expression, "We have swapped farms," naming the terms, but without further description of either farm, was held sufficient, after the parties had themselves identified the lands intended to be affected, by taking possession of them. In Ellis v. Deadman, 4 Bibb, 466, the writing was: "4th January, 1808. Received of Jesse Ellis $—, in part pay of a lot he bought of me in the town of Versailles; it being the cash part of the purchase of said lot. Nathan Deadman." This court said: Had the receipt "specified the terms of the agreement, there would have been no doubt of the propriety of decreeing a special execution." It is as essential that the terms be specified as the description of the property. "Ten acres adjoining him on the north," in a bond for title to land of the vendor adjoining the vendee, was held sufficient in Hanly v. Blackford, 1 Dana, 2, 25 Am. Dec. 114. In Henderson v. Perkins, 94 Ky. 211, 21 S. W. 1035, the description was, "my home place and storehouse." It was held sufficient, on the authority of Ellis v. Deadman, 4 Bibb, 466, and Hanly v. Blackford, 1 Dana, 2, 25 Am. Dec. 114. In the case of Varnum v. State, 78 Ala. 28, the description was: "My entire crop of every description, raised by me, or caused to be raised by me, annually, till this debt is paid." While that was not concerning real estate, it was such a contract (one not to be performed within a year) as was, by the statutes of frauds, required to be in writing. Concerning that description that court said: "It is objected to the admission in evidence of this mortgage that it was void for uncertainty in the description of the crops intended to be included in it. Whatever force there may be in this objection to the instrument on its face, this alleged uncertainty was capable of being removed, when read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the contracting parties at the time of its execution, by extraneous parol identification." Parol evidence cannot be introduced to vary, enlarge, or restrict the written terms of the contract. But frequently it is the case that application of apparently vague descriptions must be by parol testimony, which puts before the court the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties when the contract was made or is to be executed, that its terms may be interpreted by the light from such surroundings. From this rule springs the maxim, "That is certain which can be made certain." In this case it has been said "all" means all. "All of my land" is a description, by necessary implication and common understanding, referring to such lands as I may own, evidenced by the public records where land titles are required to be recorded, or to my actual and continuous possession for such time as, under the law constitutes a title. This identification is complete, and admits of no possibility of mistake in this case. Applying to it the familiar usage of the courts in such matters, parol testimony may be allowed to designate the particular properties described and identified by the writing, and in the contemplation of the parties in making the contract.

5. It is true that, by the common law, contracts between husband and wife were void. Yet equity recognized numerous instances in which the parties had peculiar property rights which they were allowed to personally control, and to make contracts concerning. It would be an anomaly and a reproach to the law to say that it recognizes a legal property right in one, to whom all the doors of every court were closed. Therefore it was early held (Story, Eq. Jur. 1372) that, although contracts between husband and wife are void at law, they are not always so in equity. This court has repeatedly affirmed the same doctrine. In Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky. 510, 20 S. W. 605, it was said: Generally, "if a contract between husband and wife be just and reasonable, and would be good at law when made by the husband with a trustee for the wife, it will be upheld in equity." This case was followed in Bohan- non v. Travis, 94 Ky. 59, 21 S. W. 354. In Ward v. Crotty, 4 Met. (Ky.) 59, it was affirmed that the husband's contract with the wife would be specifically enforced against him in equity, without the intervention of a trustee. This has been adhered to in Maranan v. Maraman, 4 Met. (Ky.) 89, and Campbell v. Galbreath, 12 Bush, 459. It is further re-enforced by legislative enactment looking to the same end, viz., § 34 of the Civil Code, as follows: "In actions between husband and wife; in actions concerning her separate property; and in actions concerning her general property (and in actions for the personal suffering of or injury to her person or character . . .) in which he refuses to unite, she may sue or be sued alone." The wife may maintain her action.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

Petition for rehearing overruled February 20, 1903.

v.

NATIONAL MASONIC ACCIDENT ASSO-CIATION.

(.....Neb.....)

*A mutual accident association classified its members according to the hazard of their respective occupations. The plaintiff belonged to a class which entitled its members to $2,500 for the loss of a hand by accident. The members of another class were entitled to but $500 for such injury. A clause of the by-laws, which were a part of the contract of insurance, provided that no greater amount should be paid any member than the amount payable to the latter class for any injury received while hunting, or in any way using or handling firearms. The plaintiff lost his hand by the discharge of a gun which he was removing from one room of his house, where it was left by one of his boarders, to another. Held, that his recovery was limited to $500.

*Headnote by ALBERT, C.

NOTE.—As to right to recover full amount of policy issued to merchant though he was killed while hunting, where policy provided that in case of death while engaged temporarily in any act or occupation more hazardous than the one in which he was accepted, the amount should be equal to the rate of the occupation in which he was engaged, see, in this series, Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Frohard (Ill.) 10 L. R. A. 383.

As to right of bank cashier to recover for injury received in sawing a board for his own use, under accident policy providing that it shall be void as to all accidents occurring while engaged in any employment not rated as a preferred occupation, see *Hess v. ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor for only part of the demand in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Tibbets Brothers, Morey & Anderson, for plaintiff in error:

That the by-laws use the clause "in any way" to modify the verbs "handle or use" does not change or enlarge the meaning.

Messrs. Lambertson & Hall and C. O. Marlay for defendant in error.

Albert, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought on an accident insurance policy issued to the plaintiff by the defendant. Defendant is a mutual concern, and the members are classified according to the hazard of their occupations. The plaintiff was classified as the proprietor of a boarding house, and belonged to class 1, whose members were entitled to an indemnity of $2,500 for the loss of a hand, while those of class 6 were entitled to but $500 for such injury. The by-laws of the defendant, which are part of the contract of insurance, provide, among other things, as follows: "Nor shall any greater amount be paid to any member or his beneficiary than the amount named in class 6 for or on account of any injury received by any member while hunting, or while in any way using or handling loaded firearms." At the time when the policy was in force the plaintiff undertook to carry a loaded gun in his hands from the dining room, where it had been left by one of his boarders, to a closet in an adjoining room. While doing so, the gun was discharged, destroying his hand. As proprietor of a boarding house, he was entitled, under his policy, to an indemnity of $2,500, unless the act in which he was engaged at the time of the injury was handling firearms, within the meaning of the clause of the by-laws hereinbefore quoted, in which case he would be entitled to but $500. The trial court held that the act of removing the loaded gun from the dining room was handling firearms, within the meaning of said clause, and directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500, with interest. Judgment accordingly. The plaintiff brings error.

The sole question in this case is whether the plaintiff at the time he received the injury was in any way handling firearms, within the meaning of the qualifying clause of the by-laws; and this question depends upon the meaning to be given to the word "handling," as therein used. The plaintiff argues that the phrase "in any way," which precedes the word in the qualifying clause, does not enlarge the meaning of the word. The authorities cited in support of this proposition hardly support this claim. The phrase certainly does not restrict the meaning of the word. It should be given some meaning, if possible. While we may concede, for the purpose of the argument, that it does not enlarge the meaning of the word, we think it at least shows an intention on the part of the contracting parties that the word should be taken in the comprehensive sense in which it is generally used. It is a well-known rule of construction that words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning unless it appear that the parties used or understood them in a different sense. There is nothing in the context or in the record to indicate that the parties to the contract of insurance used or understood the word in question in any other than the ordinary sense. The plaintiff contends that, as the word is commonly used, it is synonymous with the words "ply," "wield," and "manipulate." We know of no common use of the word that gives the word a different meaning than that to be found in the standard lexicons of the language. To "handle" is defined by the Standard Dictionary (1894) as "to use the hands upon; to turn, adjust, examine, or feel with the hands; to touch; to manage, contrive, or direct with the hands; to use; to ply; to wield; to manipulate; as to handle a musket or oar, etc." By the Century Dictionary (1889) it is defined as "to touch or feel with the hand; use the hand or hands upon; to manage by hand; use or wield with manual skill; ply; manipulate; act upon or control by the hand; in general, to manage, direct, control." By Webster's Dictionary (1894) it is defined as "to touch; to manage in using, as a spade or a musket; to wield; often, to manage skilfully." From the foregoing definitions it will be seen that while the word may be synonymous with such words as "ply," "wield," and "manipulate," none of such words, nor all of them, are its verbal equivalent. It is a more comprehensive term, and includes, not only the act of plying, wielding, and manipulating, but touching, using the hands upon, acting upon or controlling by the hand, and other acts. Had the parties used the equivalent of the word, as shown by the foregoing definitions, instead of the word itself, there could be no question that the act in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of the injury was within the meaning of the qualifying clause of the by-laws. We are unable to see how the legal effect of the language is in any manner changed by the use of a word which comprehends all such acts. The plaintiff, however, invokes the rule that, when a policy admits of two meanings, that which is most favorable to the insured is always to be adopted. That rule has no application to this case. There is a difference between a comprehensive term and an ambiguous one. The question here is not which of two or more meanings shall attach to a word, but whether we shall exclude from the meaning of such word certain acts which standard authors hold to be included within it. In the absence of special circumstances to justify it, the rule does not warrant this court in arbitrarily holding that a part of the acts included within the meaning of the term were not within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made. In fact, we know of no general term that so aptly expresses what the plaintiff was doing with the gun when he received the injury as the word "handling."

It is also contended by the plaintiff that the injury was received while he was in the ordinary course of his occupation as a boarding-house keeper. We are unable to see how that affects the case. There was no unqualified promise to indemnify him against accidents occurring while he was engaged in such occupation, nor to pay him $2,500 for the loss of a hand resulting from such accident. On the contrary, the by-laws specifically excepted certain acts, among which was that in which the plaintiff was engaged when the injury occurred. For the injury resulting to the plaintiff while engaged in such act, the promise of the defendant was to pay him $500.

The judgment of the district court is the full measure of the defendant's liability, and we recommend that it be affirmed.

Ames and Duffie, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ERROR to the District Court for Boone County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to restrain the injuring of trees in the highway in front of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Mr. J. A. Price, for plaintiff in error:

The corporate authorities had caused shade trees to be planted. No effort of any kind had been made to obtain the right to mutilate these trees. Plaintiff had a right to maintain these trees, and they were hers, as owner of the adjacent lots.

Mr. M. W. McGan for defendants in error.

Pound, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff applied for an injunction to restrain defendant, a telephone company, from mutilating or injuring certain trees which she had planted in the street along and adjacent to her property. The trees had been planted under the provisions of a municipal ordinance, and were rightfully in the street, by virtue of art. 4, chap. 2, §§ 3-7, and Comp. Stat. art. 1, chap. 14, § 69, ¶ 24. The company was erecting poles and wires under a franchise from the city. Upon demurrer to the petition, the district court held that no cause of action was stated, and dismissed the suit.

The right of an abutting owner to maintain shade trees upon or overhanging the sidewalk is general and well recognized. In many jurisdictions it is customary. With us it has the sanction of express legislation. But this right is subject to all proper uses of the street for the primary purposes for which it was dedicated or condemned. Hence, although a telephone or telegraph company is undoubtedly liable for unnecessary or wanton injury to such trees in erecting its poles and wires, liability for injuries, even amounting to removal or destruction of the trees, which are necessary or proper in the due carrying out of the public undertaking, must depend upon the much-mooted question whether use of a street or highway for poles and wires is an ordinary use, within the contemplation of the parties when it was dedicated or condemned, or is a new and additional burden, for which the abutting owner is entitled to compensation in case of injury. The authorities are very evenly divided upon the question whether a telephone or telegraph company is liable to the owner of the trees, where the injury does not go beyond what is necessary in the reasonable prosecution of the work. Such liability is affirmed in Daily v. State, 51 Ohio St. 348, 24 L. R. A. 724, 37 N. E. 710; Board of Trade Teleg. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453; Bradley v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 66 Conn. 559, 32 L. R. A. 280, 34 Atl. 499; Clay v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 70 Miss. 406, 11 So. 658; McCruden v. Rochester R. Co. 77 Hun, 609, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1135. It is denied in Wyant v. Central Teleph. Co. 123 Mich. 51, 47 L. R. A. 497, 81 N. W. 928; Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Francis, 109 Ala. 224, 31 L. R. A. 193, 19 So. 1; Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Constantine, 9 C. C. A. 359, 23 U. S. App. 56, 61 Fed. 61; Dodd v. Consolidated Traction Co. 57 N. J. L. 482, 31 Atl. 980. All of the cases first cited are from jurisdictions where poles and wires which permanently and exclusively occupy portions of the street or highway are held to constitute an additional burden. Of those last cited, Wyant v. Central Teleph. Co. is from a jurisdiction wherein it is held that there is no additional burden in such cases. On the other hand, Dodd v. Consolidated Traction Co. was decided in a jurisdiction where telegraph and telephone poles and wires are not regarded as ordinary uses of the highway; and in Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Francis it is held that the right to remove trees in whole or in part, in the proper prosecution of such an enterprise, does not depend upon the question whether there is an additional burden, but follows from the paramount right of the public, to which the right to maintain the trees is subject, of removing such trees when necessary for public uses.

If this proposition is maintainable, we need not consider how far the poles and wires are an ordinary use of the street. But, in our opinion, it is not sound. The right to maintain the trees confers an additional value upon the abutting property. This value cannot be cut off without due compensation. When the public conferred it, a valuable property right was created. Relying upon the statutes and municipal ordinances pursuant thereto, owners have expended time and money in improving their property. This grant cannot be resumed, and the property thereby depreciated in value without compensation. Undoubtedly the grant in the first instance was subject to all ordinary uses to which the street might be put. But to say that it was subject to all public uses, whether ordinary or not, which might be deemed convenient thereafter, is going entirely too far. It becomes necessary, therefore, to decide whether telegraph and telephone poles and wires, which permanently and exclusively occupy portions of a public street or highway, constitute an additional burden for which the abutting owner is entitled to compensation in case he is damaged thereby. The text writers are pretty well agreed that they do. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 698a, Elliott, Roads & Streets, 534; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 131; Randolph, Em. Dom. 407. But Mr. Keasbey thinks it too soon to predict which view will prevail ultimately. Keasbey, Electric Wires, § 101. The adjudicated cases are ranged not very unequally on both sides. The following cases, among others, support the view that there is an additional burden: Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 143 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640, 38 N. E. 202, and other decisions in New York; Daily v. State, 51 Ohio St. 348, 24 L. R. A. 724, 37 N. E. 710; Callen v. Columbus Edison Electric Light Co. 66 Ohio St. 166, 58 L. R. A. 782, 64 N. Colby*, 16 Wash. 610, 48 Pac. 248; Kester v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 108 Fed. 926. The opposite view is supported by Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7 (decided by a divided court); Julia Bldg. Asso. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398, and other cases in Missouri; People v. Eaton, 100 Mich. 208, 24 L. R. A. 721, 59 N. The question has been threshed over so many times that it would subserve no useful purpose to enter into an exhaustive review of these decisions. As Mr. Keasbey puts it very aptly, the crucial point is "whether the rights and privileges of the abutting owner in the use and maintenance of the street as such are affected." Keasbey, Electric Wires, § 102. At one time there was a tendency to attach some weight to the ownership of the fee of the street or highway; but it is becoming well settled, for obvious and convincing reasons, that that question is immaterial. Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 143 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640, 38 N. E. 202; Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 66 Miss. 279, 4 L. R. A. 735, 6 So. 230; Keasbey, Electric Wires, §§ 83, 102; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 698a. And this court is in accord with that view. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. 53 Neb. 631, 39 L. R. A. 751, 74 N. W. 67. The case last cited involved an analogous question, and in passing thereon this court cited, with apparent approval, the decisions which hold telegraph and telephone poles and wires an additional burden. While the two cases are not in all respects the same, we think the position taken in Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. would be sufficient to turn the scale in this jurisdiction, if we were in doubt. We are of opinion on independent grounds, however, that such is the sounder view. When we recall the forest of poles, with their clumsy appurtenances, and the network of wires, and even cables, with which some of our city streets are encumbered, it seems hard to say that an owner whose light is cut off, who has the safety of his buildings and their occupants in case of fire endangered, and access to his property impeded, by these permanent obstructions, is less entitled to complain than one whose easement by adjacency is impaired by a steam railway. Of course, in the greater number of cases, the poles and wires work no substantial injury, and the owner has no ground of objection; but, because the damage in most cases is trivial or nominal, we should not be blind to the substantial and considerable damage that often exists.

It does not follow, however, that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. In case property is not taken or injured directly, so as to dispossess or otherwise immediately disturb the owner, but he suffers some injury in an incidental right growing out of his peculiar situation or position, so that ordinary condemnation proceedings and payment of damages in advance are not practicable, the owner should be left to his remedy at law, which in such event is entirely adequate, and is not entitled to an injunction unless upon proof of insolvency or some special circumstance. Such is the practice in cases where the construction of a railway causes damage to abutting owners. The abutting owners are not made parties to condemnation proceedings, nor can they enjoin construction of the road; but their remedy is in an action at law for damages. Republican Valley R. Co. v. Fellers, 16 Neb. 169, 20 N. W. 217; Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels, 26 Neb. 368, 370, 42 N. W. 93; Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Boerner, 34 Neb. 240, 51 N. W. 842. The same remedy is employed where a city, in improving a street, impairs the easement of the abutting owner. Omaha v. Flood, 57 Neb. 124, 77 N. W. 379. And it was adopted in Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. 53 Neb. 631, 39 L. R. A. 751, 74 N. W. 67. To hold otherwise would probably prevent many useful public improvements, since the legislature has never made provision for condemnation of rights incidentally affected. Where nothing is actually taken, and there is merely an injury to the rights which the abutting owner has by reason of his situation, the courts generally refuse to grant an injunction, in the absence of some special circumstances. Lorie v. North Chicago City R. Co. 32 Fed. 270, and cases cited; Maxwell v. Central Dist. & Printing Teleg. Co. 51 W. Va. 121, 41 S. E. 125. In the case at bar, we see no reason why damages will not afford an adequate remedy. We do not think public utilities of this kind ought to be suspended until every abutting owner upon the streets or highways to be used has been duly appeased. If he has been substantially or appreciably injured, an action at law will ordinarily afford him full compensation. If he has not, no opportunity for extorting an unreasonable settlement should be afforded him.

The petition alleges that the franchise under which the defendant is operating was granted by the city council to the mayor and one of the councilmen, by whom it was transferred to the company; and for this reason it is claimed that the grant is against public policy, fraudulent, and void. If the franchise was wholly void, so that injury to plaintiff's property was threatened by mutilation of her trees without any warrant of law and by mere trespassers, a case for an injunction might be presented. But the most that can be said under the allegations of the petition is that the circumstances might possibly afford ground for revocation or for ousting the company in a direct proceeding for that purpose. The company is possessed of the franchise. Whether the franchise was acquired, or is held rightfully, is to be determined only in a direct proceeding to oust the company, or in a proceeding to which some one who claims a better title is a party. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 5340.

We therefore recommend that the decree be affirmed.

*A contract between an attorney at law and one who is not such an attorney, by which the latter agrees to procure the employment of the former by third persons for the prosecution of suits in courts of record, and also to assist in looking after and procuring witnesses whose testimony is to be used in the cases, in consideration of a share of the fees which the attorney shall receive for his services, is against public policy, and void.

ChamPERTY is not a criminal offense, nor is a champertous contract illegal under our statutes; and, if this contract is champertous and voidable, it is because it is contrary to public policy to enforce it.

Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Brady, 39 Neb. 48, 57 N. W. 767.

One of the essential vices of a champertous contract, making its enforcement contrary to public policy, is the agreement to relieve the litigant of the costs of litigation, thus making litigation easy, and encouraging it.

Defendant secured employment that brought him a $700 attorney fee, through the efforts of plaintiff; his witnesses were interviewed by plaintiff; he accepted the services of plaintiff and profited by plaintiff's work; but, when his fee was earned, and plaintiff could be of no further use to him, he concluded that the contract under which plaintiff had rendered him the services was champertous.

Oldham, C., filed the following opinion:

In this case the plaintiff in the court below brought his action against the defendant, alleging, among other things, that the defendant was a resident and practising attorney of Omaha, Nebraska; that "on or about the 1st day of November, 1893, plaintiff, at request of defendant, entered into the service of the defendant, to get parties in this and adjoining counties, or from any place, who wished the services of an attorney for litigation or for advice, to employ said defendant as their attorney, and said plaintiff was also to assist the defendant in looking after and procuring proper and legitimate witnesses, whose testimony was to be used in said cases; that for such services the defendant was to pay to plaintiff 25 per cent of the fees charged by the defendant, Martin Langdon, in said cases; that said fee of 25 per cent was to be due and payable from the defendant to the plaintiff as soon as the attorney's fees in said cases brought by virtue of the above contract were due and payable to the defendant, Martin Langdon; that the plaintiff was to enter upon his duties under said contract immediately after the same was entered into as above set forth; that the plaintiff did enter upon said services at once, and continued to work for said defendant under said contract until about the 1st day of December, 1898; that on or about the 10th day of February, 1894, Bridget McGreavy, guardian of John McGreavy, insane, through the advice and influence of plaintiff, employed said defendant, Martin Langdon, as her attorney to bring an action for her, as such guardian, against W. G. Waters and others, to set the conveyance aside, for her ward, made by him to said W. G. Waters and others; the land in said conveyance being situated in Cuming county, Nebraska." The petition then sets out that after Bridget McGreavy, as guardian had employed the defendant, the plaintiff assisted defendant in procuring legitimate witnesses, testimony, and evidence to be used in behalf of said Bridget McGreavy in the district court of Cuming county, Nebraska; that the case was finally adjudicated and settled by the defendant as attorney for the said Bridget McGreavy; that the defendant received the amount of $700 as an attorney's fee in said cause; and that, by reason of the contract between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff was entitled to the sum of $175 of this fee from the defendant. The defendant filed an answer to this petition, denying that he ever entered into such a contract, and alleging that the contract was against public policy, and other special defenses, which need not here be noticed. On issues thus formed, there was a trial to a jury, verdict for plaintiff, judgment on the verdict, and defendant brings error to this court.

Numerous errors in the proceedings of the cause in the court below are called to our attention in the brief of plaintiff in error, only one of which it will be necessary to discuss; and that is whether or not this contract is against public policy and good morals, and therefore void. The substance of the contract is that the plaintiff, not an attorney at law, made an agreement with an attorney and counselor at law by which he was to procure litigants to employ the attorney, and procure legitimate witnesses to testify in behalf of the clients which he had solicited and persuaded to employ the defendant, and that, as compensation for such services, he was to receive 25 per cent of the fees earned by the defendant. Courts should only declare contracts void as against public policy when expressly or impliedly forbidden by the paramount law, or by some principle of the common law, or by the provisions of a statute. What the public policy is, must be determined by the Constitution, the laws, the course of administration, and decisions of the courts of last resort of the state. Licenses Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 469, 18 L. ed. 500; Luz v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 308, 10 Pac. 674. Hence, to determine what the public policy of this state is with reference to contracts of the nature of the one at issue, it is necessary to first examine such legislative enactments of this state as are declarative of the rights and duties of attorneys and counselors at law.

Comp. Stat., chap. 7, § 1, provides that "no person shall be admitted to practise as an attorney or counselor at law, or to commence, conduct, or defend any action or proceeding in which he is not a party concerned, either by using or subscribing his own name, or the name of any other person, in any court of record in this state, unless he has been previously admitted to the bar by order of the supreme court, or of two judges thereof," etc. Section 2 then provides for the examination of candidates for admission to the bar. Section 3 provides for the admission of practising attorneys from other states. Section 4 requires that every attorney shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, the Constitution of the state, and to faithfully discharge the duties of an attorney and counselor. Section 5 provides, among other things, that it is the duty of attorneys and counselors "to maintain the respect due to the courts of justice and to judicial officers; to counsel or maintain no other actions, proceedings, or defenses, than those which appear to him legal and just, except the defense of a person charged with a public offense. . . . Not to encourage the commencement or continuance of an action or proceeding from any motive of passion or interest." Section 6 provides for the disbarment of attorneys who are guilty of deceit or collusion, and consent thereto with the intent to deceive a court or judge, or a party to an action; and § 7 defines the powers of attorneys with reference to the execution of bonds for appeal and other papers necessary and proper for the prosecution of a suit, and confers the right to bind the client by agreement in respect to any proceeding within the scope of his proper duties or powers, and the right to receive money claimed by the client during the pendency of the action, before his discharge. Section 8 provides a lien for his services, and § 13 makes it the duty of an attorney to indorse his name on any original paper filed in the proceeding.

Even a cursory examination of these excerpts from the statute is sufficient to plainly indicate that it was the policy of the legislature of this state to absolutely exclude every one who has not complied with the provisions of chapter 7, supra, from engaging, either directly or indirectly, in the practice of law in any court of record in this state, in any case in which such person is not a party in interest. It is also apparent that it was the policy of the legislature to fix a high standard of professional ethics to govern the conduct of attorneys in their relations with clients and courts, and to protect litigants and courts of justice from the imposition of shysters, charlatans, and mountebanks. It seems to us that the contract in issue is but a thinly veiled subterfuge by which the plaintiff, who, it is conceded, was not a member of the bar, and who had never complied with any of the provisions of chapter 7, supra, for the purpose of authorizing him to engage in the practice of law, undertook to break into the conduct of proceedings in a court of record, to which he was not a party, by attempting to form a limited and silent partnership with one who had complied with the provisions of the law, and was entitled to the emoluments of the profession. Under a statute with no more stringent regulations governing the practice 60 L. R. A.

of law than our own, a contract on all fours with the one in the instant case was declared void, as against public policy and good morals, in Alpers v. Hunt, 86 Cal. 78, 9 L. R. A. 483, 24 Pac. 846. The case is supported in principle by the holdings in Burt v. Place, 6 Cow. 431; Munday v. Whisenhunt, 90 N. C. 458. Where, as in the case at bar, a part of the consideration of the contract in issue was an agreement to furnish evidence in litigation to be commenced, the supreme court of New York, in Lyon v. Hussey, 82 Hun, 15, 31 N. Y. Supp. 281, said: "It is clear that such a contract is against public policy. The recognition of contracts of this character would be the introduction of all sorts of fraud and deception in proceedings before courts of justice, in order that parties might receive compensation out of the results of their successful manufacture of proofs to be presented to the court, thus holding out a premium upon subornation. The mere statement of the proposition seems to show that such a contract could never be recognized in any court of justice." See also Lucas v. Allen, 80 Ky. 681; Getchell v. Welday, 4 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 65.

We are therefore of the opinion that the contract on which this cause of action is founded is against public policy and good morals, and recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and that plaintiff's petition be dismissed.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. Samuel J. Tuttle, for plaintiff in error:

The actual delivery of the notice, the second day after the third day of grace (Sunday, the 10th, being excluded), where the maker and indorser reside in different places not reached by the same postoffice delivery, was sufficient.

Phelps v. Stocking, 21 Neb. 443, 32 N. W. 217.

When notice is sent by mail to a drawer or indorser residing in another town, it is sufficient if the holder deposits it in the postoffice in due time; and the fact that it is received at a late day, or not at all, by the party notified, is immaterial.

Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1300.

The time for giving notice is in all cases prolonged during reasonable and diligent inquiry made by the holder for the residence of the party to be notified.

Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1252.

One who indorses a bill for collection only should have notice of dishonor as a distinct indorser.

Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1241; Wood River Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 36 Neb. 744, 55 N. W. 239.

The indorser is not bound to forward notice to a previous party on the same day on which he receives it, but may wait until the next.

Linn v. Horton, 17 Wis. 151; Eagle Bank v. Hathaway, 5 Met. 212.

Mr. T. J. Doyle, for defendant in error:

A reasonable time in which to give notice has never been construed to mean but one thing. That is, where the residence of the indorser is known to the holder, and notice is to be given by mail, that he will mail the notice, properly directed to the indorser, in time to get out on the first mail which leaves within business hours after the day of dishonor.

Sending the notice to the First National Bank instead of to Mr. Carr was the sole cause of the delay. If the notice had been mailed on the evening of the day after dishonor L. R. A.

honored, Carr would have received it just as early as he did. Under all of the authorities, that would have been too late.

The indorsement of a note for collection and account does not pass title to indorsee, nor confer upon him authority to transfer the note, so as to charge the former indorsers under the law merchant.

Boyer v. Richardson, 52 Neb. 156, 71 N. W. 981.

Lebingier, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action on a promissory note executed and delivered by one U. O. Anderson, of Seward, Nebraska, to defendant in error, who is a resident of Lincoln, and who, before maturity of the note, indorsed it in blank and sold it to plaintiff in error. By its terms, the note became due December 5, 1890; the three days of grace expiring December 8th. Some time before the first-named date it was deposited for collection with the First National Bank of Lincoln, which forwarded it to a correspondent bank at Seward, having first indorsed as follows: "Pay any bank or banker or order. First Nat. Bank, Lincoln, Nebr. H. S. Freeman, Cashier." On the last day of grace, a notary employed by the Seward bank presented the note for payment at the maker's office and residence, and, not finding him at either place, the note was duly protested. On the same day the notary mailed a notice of protest to the maker at Seward, another to the First National Bank of Lincoln, and a third directed as follows: "John Carr, Lincoln, Nebr. First National Bank;"—all of these notices being deposited in the Seward postoffice not later than the evening of December 8th. The first mail from Seward to Lincoln, if on time, was delivered at the Lincoln postoffice about 11, and there was a regular delivery by carriers about 12. The mail of the First National Bank, however, was delivered by its own special messenger; and the letter addressed to Carr was by this messenger carried with the bank's other mail, and appears to have reached the bank some time after noon of the 9th, which was Saturday. The cashier of the bank testifies that before 2 o'clock on that day a notice of dishonor from the Lincoln bank was mailed to defendant in error, but the latter testifies that he never received it. The notice from the notary at Seward, however, was given to the messenger of the Lincoln bank, and by him delivered to defendant in error on Monday forenoon at 10:40; one of the clerks having previously noted in pencil on the envelope defendant in error's address, "52 Brownell Block." This action is brought against the indorser alone, and the sole defense is that the notice of dishonor was not served in time. There was a trial to the court, a jury being waived, and a judgment for defendant, of which plaintiff now seeks a reversal by error proceedings.

At common law, by the weight of authority, the indorser of a dishonored note or bill was entitled to notice thereof on the day following the dishonor, if he resided in the same town with the maker; and, if he resided elsewhere, the notice was required to be posted by the first seasonable mail sent on the day following dishonor. The rule was not universal. In Bank of North America v. M'Knight, 1 Yeates, 145, an indorser living in the same city with the maker was held, though not notified until the second day after dishonor. Moreover, we have in this state a statute governing such cases, which provides that "notice of nonpayment or nonacceptance thereof to the indorser within a reasonable time shall be adjudged due diligence." Comp. Stat. chap. 41, § 3. Whether this statute enlarges the common-law liability of the indorser, and restricts his rights as to notice, or whether it is intended merely to re-enact the rule of the lex mercatoria, is a question which we need not here determine, because, as we view it, the case at bar is governed by a different principle, presently to be discussed. Suffice it to say that the cases relied upon in the able and ingenious argument for defendant in error were decided in jurisdictions which are without such a statute as ours. But the same law merchant which required the notice of dishonor to be given or sent on the day following nonpayment also limited the duty of the holder or protesting officer in this regard to a notification of the last indorser, who in turn was allowed an additional day to send notice to the indorser immediately preceding him, and so on until all had been notified. 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1261. Thus in the case before us the notary was not legally bound to notify Carr at all. It would have been sufficient had he simply sent the one notice to the First National Bank, which was the last indorser, and the latter would have had until the following business day to notify Carr. As the bank received its notice on Saturday, it would, under this rule, have until the following Monday to send its notice to defendant in error, for in such cases the intervening Sunday is not to be counted. Eagle Bank v. Chapin, 3 Pick. 180; Agnew v. Bank of Gettysburg, 2 Harr. & G. 478; and many cases cited in 7 Century Dig. § 1169.

It is claimed, however, that this doctrine should not be applied to a case like this, where the last indorser had received and indorsed the note simply for collection. It will be remembered that the indorsements themselves were not such as to disclose that the Lincoln bank was an indorsee for collection only. Carr had indorsed the note in blank, and the Lincoln bank had indorsed it merely so that its correspondent might collect, and there was nothing to indicate to the notary but that the Lincoln bank was the holder as well as the last indorser. But aside from this, no authority is cited for the exception contended for by plaintiff in error in the case of indorsers who hold for collection only. On the other hand, there is ample support for the proposition that it is sufficient to notify such indorsers in the same way as other last indorsers are notified, and that prior indorsers may be held by virtue of the usual notice from them. Carmena v. Bank of Louisiana, 1 La. Ann. 369; Eagle Bank v. Hathaway, 5 Met. 212; Brown v. Ferguson, 4 Leigh, 39, 24 Am. Dec. 707; Linn v. Horton, 17 Wis. 151; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1241, 1262. Boyer v. Richardson, 52 Neb. 156, 71 N. W. 981, cited by defendant in error, in no way conflict with the foregoing. The court there was simply considering the effect of an indorsement for collection on the title to a note, and held that such an indorsee acquired no right of action against a prior indorser.

But it is contended that the "First National Bank has never so notified Carr. . . . They simply attended to the courtesy of seeing that Carr finally got a letter that was sent to them in their care, without even knowing its contents." If it had developed that the letter which the bank delivered to Carr by its messenger was not in fact a notice of dishonor, and none other had been sent, he, of course, would have been released from liability. In taking the course it did, the bank might have been assuming some risk, though it must be remembered that its agent claimed to have mailed a separate letter to Carr, and testified that it was their custom, out of ample caution, to adopt in such cases both methods of notification. But since the letter delivered to Carr was complete and sufficient notice of dishonor, we are unable to see how it can profit defendant in error that it was not actually prepared by the clerks or officers of the Lincoln bank. The latter had a right to employ such agencies as it saw fit, both in the preparation, and delivery of the notice. Among others, it had a right to adopt and utilize the work of the notary employed by its correspondent bank at Seward. The form of the notice and the time of its delivery are the important elements. Who may have prepared it, provided it was done by authority, we deem unimportant. It seems to us, therefore, that this letter from the notary, received by the Lincoln bank in the due course of mail, and sent by it with a notation of his office address to defendant in error on the next business day, was a sufficient compliance with the rules of the law merchant, as well as with the requirements of our statute.

But it is urged that plaintiff in error did not, in the trial court, rely upon this so-called doctrine of the "sequence of notices," but claimed to have notified Carr directly. What plaintiff in error's counsel may have urged in his argument below, we have no means of knowing, nor do we deem it material. In the petition, which is our only guide in determining what was the cause of action, it is alleged, after setting forth the nonpayment of the note, that plaintiff "caused due notice of such demand and nonpayment to be forthwith served upon said defendant, said John Carr, and he duly received such notice." It will be seen that this is not an averment that plaintiff notified Carr directly, but merely that she "caused due notice . . . to be served;" and it would seem to constitute a sufficient compliance with § 129 of the Code, requiring the facts "which fix liability" to be stated. Whether the allegation might not have been open to a motion to make it more specific by stating the manner and means of service, we need not now inquire, for no motion of the kind was made; and, in its absence, the averment was certainly sufficient to permit the introduction of evidence that the notice was served by an agent for collection employed by the plaintiff. At any rate, no objection was made to the admission of such evidence, and we are unable to see how the alleged variance on the theory of recovery, even if it existed, could now avail defendant in error.

The conclusions at which we have arrived might, we think, be reached in another way, and still satisfy the strict requirements of the law merchant. Under that law, where a note or bill is sent by the holder to an agent in another town for presentment to the maker, the agent is allowed one day to post the notice of dishonor to his principal, and the latter is entitled to an additional day to send notice to the last indorser, and the agent is not required to notify the indorser directly, though this would afford them earlier notice. Ellis v. Commercial Bank, 7 How. (Miss.) 294, 40 Am. Dec. 63; Lawson v. Farmers' Bank, 1 Ohio St. 206; Church v. Barlow, 9 Pick. 547; Bank of United States v. Goddard, 5 Mason, 366, Fed. Cas. No. 917; State Bank v. Ayers, 7 N. J. L. 130, 11 Am. Dec. 535; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1262. If, therefore, in the case at bar, the notary had sent the notice of dishonor directly to plaintiff in error, and she had received it in the due course of mail, and had presented her notice to defendant in error by the time the bank's messenger reached him, she would have been within the letter of the lex mercatoria. Can it make any legal difference that her place in the transaction was taken by her agent, the First National Bank? The Seward notary might well have thought that he was complying with this rule in sending the notice to the Lincoln bank, for the indorsements were such as to indicate that it was the holder. And as was well stated by Ross, J., in First Nat. Bank v. Wood, 51 Vt. 471, 31 Am. Rep. 692, where a notice of dishonor, sent to the wrong address, and thence forwarded, was held sufficient: "All the rules requiring the holder to use diligence to ascertain the residence of the indorser, and to leave notice at his place of business or residence, when they reside in the same town, or to mail notice as soon as the day following the day of the maturity of the note, addressed to him at his place of residence," when they reside in different towns, are made and enforced, that the indorser may be informed that his liability on the note has not been discharged by the party whose duty it was to pay the note at maturity. When, therefore, the indorser in fact receives notice in due season that the note has been duly presented for payment and protested, the purpose of the law has been accomplished, although the holder of the note has not complied with one of the established rules in regard to the use of diligence in giving notice."

It seems to us that in this case both the purpose and the letter of the law have been complied with, and we are forced to the conclusion that the learned trial judge erred in finding for the defendant. We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and remanded for further proceedings according to law.

*A promissory note is not rendered nonnegotiable by an agreement to pay the sum named "with exchange" on a place other than that at which it is payable.

ERROR to the District Court for Platte County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. McAllister & Cornelius, for plaintiff in error:

A stipulation in an instrument for the payment of a certain sum of money, payable with current exchange on a place other than the place of payment, is not destructive of negotiability.

Our supreme court has passed on other questions in a more liberal manner than some of the courts that have held that "with New York exchange" did not destroy the negotiability of a note.

Messrs. Reeder & Hobart, for defendants in error:

The note is nonnegotiable.

Found, C., filed the following opinion:

In Garnett v. Myers (Neb.) 91 N. W. 400, this court expressly left open the much-vexed question whether a note or bill for the payment of a certain sum "with exchange" is rendered nonnegotiable by the agreement to pay exchange. The subject has been discussed exhaustively in a number of recent cases, and now that the question is squarely presented, we have only to range ourselves upon the one side or the other, and indicate our reasons briefly. Most of the text-writers have held that such a stipulation has no effect upon the negotiability of the instrument. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 54; 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 200; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 280; Norton, Bills & Notes, § 26. But it may be observed that these authors wrote, for the most part, before certain recent decisions, in which the opposite view has been asserted with much force and ability. The adjudicated cases are in conflict, and almost evenly balanced. The view that such a provision is without effect upon the negotiability of the instrument is supported by Clark v. Skeen, 61 Kan. 526, 49 L. R. A. 190, 60 Pac. 327; Hastings v. Thompson, 54 Minn. 184, 21 L. R. A. 178, 55 N. W. 968; Smith v. Kendall, 9 Mich. 241, 80 Am. Dec. 83, and subsequent decisions in Michigan; Whittle v. Fond du Lac Nat. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 1106; Morgan v. Edwards, 53 Wis. 599, 40 Am. Rep. 781, 11 N. W. 21; Bradley v. Lill, 4 Biss. 473, Fed. Cas. No. 1,783. The contrary position is maintained in Culbertson v. Nelson, 93 Iowa, 187, 27 L. R. A. 222, 61 N. W. 854; Flagg v. School Dist. No. 70, 4 N. D. 30, 25 L. R. A. 363, 58 N. W. 499; Nicely v. Commercial Bank, 15 Ind. App. 563, 44 N. E. 572, and subsequent cases in 60 L. R. A.

Indiana; Fitzharris v. Leggatt, 10 Mo. App. 527; First Nat. Bank v. Bynum, 84 N. C. 24, 37 Am. Rep. 604; Read v. McNulty, 12 Rich. L. 445, 78 Am. Dec. 467, and subsequent cases in South Carolina; Hughitt v. Johnson, 28 Fed. 865, and several subsequent decisions in the Federal courts. Some of the cases on each side are open to obvious criticism. Morgan v. Edwards is a dictum as to this point, and Bradley v. Lill goes so far as to hold that an instrument payable "in exchange" on a certain point is negotiable. See Chandler v. Calvert, 87 Mo. App. 368. On the other hand, some of the decisions taking the opposite view are based on special provisions of statutes. The whole matter turns upon the question whether such a stipulation renders the amount uncertain, so as to destroy one of the essential elements of negotiability. While it is true that in a sense an uncertain element is imported into the instrument by the agreement to pay exchange, the difficulty is more specious than real. Business is carried on more or less in subordination to certain financial centers, to which and from which money is constantly flowing. When a note is made payable in Lincoln with Chicago exchange, the practical business effect is the same as if it had been payable in Chicago, but, for convenience, the parties had agreed that it might be paid at Lincoln, with the cost of transmission. Clark v. Skeen, 61 Kan. 526, 49 L. R. A. 190, 60 Pac. 327; Morgan v. Edwards, 53 Wis. 599, 40 Am. Rep. 781, 11 N. W. 21. Looked at in this way, the exchange becomes a mere incident, not affecting the amount of the debt itself, and analogous to such matters as attorneys' fees and costs of collection, which do not affect negotiability. As Mr. Daniel puts it: "The spirit of the rule requiring precision in the amount of negotiable instruments applies rather to principal amount than to the ancillary and incidental additions of interest or exchange." 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 54. These questions are primarily questions of business and business usage, and, so far as not foreclosed by any established course of decision, ought to be resolved in a liberal spirit, to promote the interests of business, rather than by a strict adherence to the letter of the rules. The policy of the rule as to negotiability is in no way infringed by the provision as to exchange. The custom and convenience of business men have introduced it in such instruments, and would, perhaps, afford sound reason, in view of the general approval of standard text-writers, for a modification of, or exception to, the general rule, if necessary. But there is sufficient ground to hold that the reason of the rule is unaffected, and the infringement of its letter, if any, is of trivial consequence.

It is argued that the provisions of the note in suit for payment of "attorneys' fees" generally, without specifying for what purpose, destroy negotiability. But we must give the instrument a reasonable construction. It is self-evident that fees for collecting the note, if not paid at maturity, were referred to. As our law now stands, this clause was mere surplusage, and may be wholly disregarded.

Objection is made also to the petition. The allegations of that pleading are not as precise as they might be. But the defendant pleaded that the note was taken after maturity, and without consideration, and plaintiff denied these allegations generally. The parties went to trial upon the theory that those questions were in issue, and decisive of plaintiff's rights, and the trial court expressly based its decision upon the question whether the instrument was negotiable. The theory which the parties held below ought to bind them here, and the cause will be treated as all parties as well as the trial court there treated it.

We recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the cause remanded.

I concur in the conclusion reached by my learned associate in this case, because I believe the opinion is in harmony with the former holdings of this court on the question of negotiability of the instrument, but on sound principle I believe the decision is wrong.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. F. M. Hall, C. C. Marlay, and Barger & Hicks for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Halleck F. Rose and Willmer B. Oomstock for defendants in error.

Messrs. C. C. McNish and Greene, Breckenridge, & Kinsler, amici curiae:

The refusal of the insured to comply with the appraisal clause of the policies must abate this suit.

An agreement between parties to submit a single question, which may be the subject of dispute between them, to the judgment of arbitrators or appraisers will be gladly enforced; such an agreement not being one which ousts the jurisdiction of the court to determine the question of liability between the parties, and the enforcement of which would greatly simplify and minimize the labor of the court in determining the rights of the parties.

Mirkpatrick, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action brought to recover for a loss claimed to have accrued under a policy of insurance. The insured had judgment below, and the case is brought to this court upon error by the insurance company. The single question presented and requiring consideration is the validity of a provision in the policy making a submission of the question of the amount of loss to arbitrators, and an award thereon, a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action. The agreement providing for arbitration is as follows: "In the event of disagreement as to the amount of the loss, the same shall, as above provided, be ascertained by two competent and disinterested appraisers, the insured and this company each selecting one, and the two so chosen shall first select a competent and disinterested umpire. The appraisers together shall then estimate and appraise the loss, stating separately sound value and damage, and, failing to agree, shall submit their differences to the umpire; and the award in writing of any two shall determine the amount of such loss No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements." It has been ably and earnestly contended in briefs of counsel and in the argument at the bar that there is nothing in the provision quoted contrary to sound public policy, or contrary to the prior decisions of this court, and that it ought, therefore, to be given full force, rendering a refusal on the part of the insured to arbitrate a good plea in bar to the action.

breach on the part of one of the parties thereto gives to the other a cause of action enforceable in a court of law or equity; and an agreement between parties to a contract that neither shall maintain a suit thereon after breach, any differences to be settled by arbitration, is without binding force, as tending to oust the jurisdiction of the courts. The doctrine is stated by Mr. Justice Hunt in Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445-451, 22 L. ed. 365-368, as follows: "Every citizen is entitled to resort to all the courts of the country, and to invoke the protection which all the laws or all those courts may afford him. A man may not barter away his life, or his freedom, or his substantial rights. . . . In a civil case he may submit his particular suit, by his own consent, to an arbitration, or to the decision of a single judge. So, he may omit to exercise his right to remove his suit to a Federal tribunal, as often as he thinks fit, in each recurring case. In these aspects any citizen may, no doubt, waive the rights to which he may be entitled. He cannot, however, bind himself in advance by an agreement, which may be specifically enforced, thus to forfeit his rights at all times and on all occasions, whenever the case may be presented." The case quoted from involved the validity of a contract between the state of Wisconsin and the Home Fire Insurance Company of New York, by which the latter agreed, in compliance with a statute of Wisconsin, not to remove any suit brought against it in the state courts for trial into the Federal courts, and the agreement was held to be nonenforceable. That decision announced the proposition that a party might, in any particular case, waive his right to remove his suit to the Federal courts, but that he could not in advance, by agreement, bind himself that, in case a future suit should arise, he would not avail himself of the right to remove it to such courts, because every man is entitled to resort to all the courts and invoke their protection, and cannot be held to an agreement, to enforce which would result in depriving him of a substantial right guaranteed by the law. The provision found in the Constitution of the state (Bill of Rights, § 13) embodies the same general proposition: "All courts shall be open, and every person, for any injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have a remedy by due course of law, and justice administered without denial or delay." Thus it will be seen that a stipulation that no suit shall be maintainable upon a contract after breach is void. This proposition, we understand, is conceded in the case at bar; and, if the stipulation above quoted results in ousting the courts of jurisdiction, it must be held unenforceable.

But it is contended that the provision does not contemplate ousting the jurisdiction of the courts; that the contract merely provides for an adjustment by arbitration of the amount of the loss, leaving the question of liability to be adjudicated in the usual channel of the courts. Between this kind of a stipulation, it is said, and one providing for the submission of all matters in dispute, including the question of liability, there is a definite distinction,—the former valid and enforceable, and the other admittedly opposed to the policy of the law. The theory of plaintiff in error is that under such a stipulation in the contract the award becomes a condition precedent to the right of action; that no cause of action accrues until the arbitrators have made an award. Such an agreement, it is contended, does not oust the courts of jurisdiction, for the reason that parties are at liberty to contract that, in the event of unliquidated damages arising from contract, such damages shall be liquidated and ascertained by a given mode; both parties binding themselves to refer that question to a private tribunal of their own selection, clothing that tribunal with power finally and conclusively to adjudicate that question. Stated in other terms, the contention of plaintiff in error amounts to a concession that the parties cannot bind themselves to settle the question whether the company is liable at all in this manner, because the policy of the law forbids such an agreement, but that they are free to stipulate that the amount of the loss shall be ultimately decided by a mode agreed upon, other than a resort to the courts. If this distinction is sound, the arbitration and award must be held, in accordance with the plain reading of the agreement, a condition precedent to a right of action. If, on the contrary, there is no real or substantial distinction in principle between an agreement to refer the whole controversy and an agreement to refer only a particular part of it, the agreement under consideration must, of course, be held to come within the doctrine prohibiting agreements which oust the courts of jurisdiction. An agreement, as we have already seen, that neither party should maintain an action on a contract, either at law or in equity,—any controversy to arise to be referred to arbitration,—cannot be enforced, upon the theory that the powers of all the courts may always be invoked by every citizen for the protection of his rights; that the enforcement of a valid and subsisting cause of action is a substantial right; and that he cannot be held to have bartered that away by any agreement made before it arose. Upon principle, therefore, we assume it to be true that an agreement by which the parties thereto bind themselves to refrain from resorting to the courts for the adjudication of a cause of action to arise between them in the future is void, and the real question in this case is whether this principle has been violated by the arbitration agreement pleaded.

In the contract upon which this action is brought, plaintiff in error agrees to be liable not beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs. To the extent of such loss or damage, it does not question its liability. Further than this there is nothing in the contract by which the liability of the company is indicated. All the residue of the clause relates to the mode of ascertaining or estimating the "actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs." The contract further provides: "In the event of disagreement as to the amount of loss, the same shall, as above provided, be ascertained" by appraisers; indicating the manner of their selection, and the rules to govern their deliberations. The award of the appraisers, of course, not being subject to review by a court of law or equity, and being unimpeachable except for fraud, becomes conclusive of the question of the amount of the loss. It is therefore apparent that, so far as the question of the amount of the loss is concerned, the party has, by the agreement into which he has entered, closed up all access to the courts. The agreement to arbitrate contemplates a reservation by the company and the insured of the question of liability in any event. Inasmuch as it is not to be assumed that the company would go to the trouble of an expensive arbitration of the amount of the loss, bearing its share of the cost, unless it was ready to concede its liability for some loss, the presumption would naturally be that, when arbitration of the loss is once undertaken, the extent of the loss is the question of chief importance to all concerned. But even if the question of the company's liability is not in every instance tacitly conceded by entering into arbitration of the amount of the loss, it is certain that in some instances this would be the case; and in every such instance, at least, all of the rights at stake between the parties would be wholly and exclusively in the hands of a private tribunal, to be finally adjudicated by them, in compliance with a contract entered into long before any dispute had arisen, and before the parties knew that any dispute would arise. Now, in a case such as that supposed, the company tacitly or expressly admitting its liability, what would be the question for settlement? Namely, the extent of the company's liability, measured "by the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs." Is it not a matter of very substantial interest to the parties that this question should be settled rightly? A settlement of the matter upon a basis which would give to the insured an amount either too small or too large would be for one of the parties to suffer, just to that extent, a deprivation of his property rights. But it is said the parties have agreed upon that mode of settlement, and, if one or the other should suffer such a deprivation, it must be held to come within the reasonable and necessary intendments of the contract. The answer is that the courts of law, established and maintained by society, with all the safeguards surrounding their administration of justice, are constituted and maintained for the specific purpose of settling just such differences. A jury may or may not be as competent and skilful in arriving at the exact amount of the loss as would be a board selected by the parties themselves; but the law gives to either party the right to have a jury, safeguarded by all the machinery of a duly constituted court of justice, pass upon that question; and to this effect the Constitution (§ 6, Bill of Rights) has provided: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." It may be readily admitted that in such a case, after it has arisen, the party may submit this particular question, by his own consent, to arbitration, or to the decision of a single judge. But we cannot see upon what principle his agreement, made in advance, and binding himself before this right accrues, to forfeit it after it does accrue, can be specifically enforced against him. To so enforce it would be tantamount to saying that, while parties cannot by contract barter away all of their substantial rights which may later be involved in controversy between them, they can make a severance, and barter away the one which is likely to be of chief significance when the controversy does finally arise.

If the position contended for be correct, the principle would apply to all contracts. Should a person or corporation, employing a large number of servants, in each contract of employment stipulate that, in case of personal injury to the servant during employment, the amount of damage should be submitted for arbitration to a board of physicians, their determination of that question to be final and conclusive, the question of liability to remain for the determination of the courts, it will be hardly contended that such an agreement would be enforced; yet the principle involved would be identical with that in the case at bar. To recognize the existence of such a distinction would, it seems to us, be a plain evasion of a salutary doctrine firmly imbedded in the law,—that courts will not lend their aid in the enforcement of contracts the effect of which would be to close their doors to suitors who would otherwise be entitled to their protection.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445-460, 22 L. ed. 365-368, is found this language: "Should a citizen of New York enter into an agreement with the state of Wisconsin, upon whatever consideration, that he would in no case, when called into the courts of that state, or the Federal tribunals within it, demand a jury to determine any rights of property that might be called in question, but that such rights should in all such cases be submitted to arbitration or to the decision of a single judge, the authorities are clear that he would not thereby be debarred from resorting to the ordinary legal tribunals of the state." And if a citizen of New York could not be held, upon principle or authority, to such a contract as that supposed, with the state of Wisconsin, it seems to us equally clear that he could not be held to a contract with a citizen of that state, binding himself, in any suit thereafter to arise between them, not to demand a jury trial to determine any rights of property that might be called into question, but that such rights should, in any case to arise, be submitted to arbitration, or to the decision of a single judge. Yet the latter is, according to our view, in effect, the contract under consideration in the case at bar; and we are of opinion that it cannot be enforced, but that it is revocable by either party at any time before arbitration is had.

We are not unmindful of the fact that there are many cases in both Federal and state courts recognizing the distinction sought to be maintained here. These decisions are for the most part based upon Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. Cas. 811, decided in 1856. That was a case involving marine insurance, where the contract provided that the loss, as to amount, must first be settled by what was styled a "committee," which seems to have been a board of officers of the insurance company, but, if a difference should arise between the insured and the committee, such difference should be referred to arbitration,—the award of the arbitrators to be final,—with the further provision that, if the insured refused to accept the settlement made by the committee, the obtaining of the decision of the arbitrators was a condition precedent to the maintaining of an action. In that case it was conceded by all the lords that it had become the settled law that a contract which required all questions in controversy to be submitted to arbitrators, whose award should be final, was void, as a contract tending to oust the courts of their jurisdiction, and for that reason contrary to public policy; but it was held by a majority of the lords that the provision in the policy was valid because it only required that the question of amount be submitted to arbitration. We have made a very careful examination of the arguments advanced in the several opinions given by the lords in support of the conclusion reached by the majority, and, with all due respect, are forced to the conclusion that the position taken is unsound. The distinction urged does not seem to have any solid foundation upon which to rest. The real question is, Will parties bound by a contract to settle differences by arbitration which shall be final, and by stipulation entered into when the contract is formed, deprive themselves of the right to the protection of the courts? Suppose, in a controversy arising upon a loss sustained under an insurance policy, three distinct questions are presented for determination. It is conceded by all parties that an agreement to submit all of the questions to arbitration is against public policy and void. Upon what sound reason can it be said that an agreement to submit one or two of the questions in controversy can be sustained? As we have seen, the one or two questions may be the questions of vital importance, and the third may sink into insignificance, or may be entirely eliminated by the arbitration of the two questions. Or suppose ten questions are in controversy: Will the courts say that a contract to submit nine is valid, and will be enforced, so long as the party has one question left, concerning which he has a right to be heard in the courts. Of course, the one remaining question may be of minor importance, and the party may not desire to go into the courts upon that. Yet, so long as the contract does not deprive him of the right to go into the courts upon all the questions involved, it is valid and will be enforced. It seems clear to us that an agreement which deprives a party of a right to the protection of the courts upon a single question, which may be the question of greatest importance in the controversy, violates the principle involved to the same extent as would an agreement requiring all matters to be submitted. If we say that an agreement to submit one question to arbitrators is valid, then there is no middle ground upon which to stand. If one question can be submitted, and the determination of the arbitrators be final, then all questions involved can, upon the same principle, be submitted. The distinction made by the learned lords in Scott v. Avery does not rest upon sound principles. It is a difference in degree, rather than in kind. The question was passed upon by the court in German-American Ins. Co. v. Etherton, 25 Neb. 505, 41 N. W. 406. The policy in that case, among other things, contained the following provision: "It is expressly stipulated by the parties hereto that no suit or action against this company shall be sustained in any court of law or chancery until after an award shall have been obtained, fixing the amount of such claims in the manner above provided." Reece, Ch. J., in considering this clause in the policy, said: "As to the first of the above-quoted clauses, we apprehend that there is practically no dispute but that the whole provision is void." In the syllabus in that case it is said: "A provision in a policy that no suit or action against the insurer 'shall be sustained in any court of law or chancery until after an award shall have been obtained' by arbitration 'fixing the amount' due, after loss, is void; the effect of such provision being to oust the courts of their legitimate jurisdiction." It is said by counsel for plaintiff in error that the loss in that case arose from the destruction of a dwelling house and contents, and that the clause quoted in the policy was void as being contrary to the valued policy law, and that, while the decision in that case was correct, the learned judge writing the opinion gave a wrong reason. In this counsel is in error. The valued policy law took effect July 1, 1889, while the policy considered in that case was written December 21, 1886. The question under consideration has been more or less directly involved in the following cases: Union Ins. Co. v. Barwick, 36 Neb. 223, 54 N. W. 519; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Bean, 42 Neb. 537, 60 N. W. 907; Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Bachler, 44 Neb. 549, 62 N. W. 911; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Kennedy, 47 Neb. 138, 66 N. W. 278; Schrandt v. Young, 62 Neb. 254, 86 N. W. 1085. And the doctrine has been assumed to be firmly established in the body of our law; but because of the very earnest and able manner in which the doctrine has been challenged by counsel for plaintiff in error, and the authorities cited from various courts 60 L. R. A.

entitled to fair consideration, we have seen fit to re-examine the question; but we cannot, on principle, see any valid reason why a doctrine which has stood for many years, and which has become a rule of property, should now be abandoned. On the contrary, we can see many reasons why it should be adhered to.

From what has been said, it follows that the judgment of the district court should be affirmed, and it is therefore recommended that the same be done.

Hackett v. Hackett, 18 R. I. 155, 19 L. R. A. 558, 26 Atl. 42.

Ames, C., filed the following opinion:

At the times hereinafter mentioned, Mt. Calvary Cemetery was a tract of land in the vicinity of the city of Lincoln, in this state, set apart as a burial place for the communicants of the Roman Catholic Church and their relatives, the legal title to the tract being in the defendant the Reverend Thomas Bonacum, as bishop of the diocese, and previously in his predecessor in office. Edward P. Cagney, now deceased, was the son of the plaintiff Catherine McEntee by a former husband, and the brother of the plaintiff Marista Cagney, and a half-brother to David C. McEntee, son of Catherine. So far as appears from the record, the plaintiffs are the only relatives by blood of the deceased who were living at the time of the beginning of this action. Edward's father died when he was a child, and at about the age of nine or ten years he was taken into the family of his mother's brother, John Fitzgerald, by whom he was nurtured and educated, and by whom he was provided with employment after he had attained to sufficient maturity. From the beginning he made his home continuously and exclusively with his uncle, who, and whose family, appear to have regarded him with a warm affection, which was fully reciprocated; but there was never any estrangement between him and the plaintiffs, or any of them. He died at the home of his uncle in Lincoln in the month of April, 1891, and was buried in the above-mentioned cemetery in a plot of ground, which, by some means or procedure, not described in the record, had been assigned or allotted for the use as a burial place of the uncle and his relatives. A few years later the uncle also died, and was buried in the same plot; his widow, the defendant Mary Fitzgerald, being appointed as the sole administratrix of his estate. She was not related to the deceased otherwise than by her marriage to his uncle, and as to what right or authority, if any, over this parcel of land or over the subject of this litigation, her appointment conferred upon her, the record and briefs of counsel are silent. The defendant Walton G. Roberts is an undertaker, and is described as a trustee of the cemetery, but what were his powers or duties as such, or what were his official relations, if any, to the church or to the land, the legal title to which was, as we have said, in the bishop, we are not informed. The property is described in one of the so-called "statutes" of the diocese as belonging to the parish in which it is situated, though it certainly does not so belong in a legal sense—First, because its title is vested elsewhere; and, second, because the law does not recognize any such territorial subdivision or legal entity as a parish, and concerning such political corporations as the state does contain the church does not possess any power of legislation. Until further advised, we shall feel obliged to say that the defendant Roberts appeared to have no title or interest, personal or otherwise, in the controversy. During all these times the plaintiff Catherine McEntee and her children Marieta and David C. were living, and they now live at the city of Plattsmouth, in this state, where they have burial rights in a Catholic cemetery, in which one of her sons is now buried, and where she, being very old, anticipates that before very long she will herself be also interred. Animated by a desire that ultimately her family should, as far as possible, be brought together at this final resting place, she applied in May, 1901, to the defendants Roberts, Fitzgerald, and Bonacum for permission to remove the body of her son from the cemetery at Lincoln to that at Plattsmouth. The request was denied by each of the defendants, and, upon repairing to the Lincoln burial ground with vehicles and apparatus requisite to carry out the object she had in view, she was met at the entrance by a person in charge of the premises, who threatened her with prosecution if she should not desist. Thereupon she and her two children began this action to perpetually enjoin the defendants, and each of them, from preventing her carrying out her aforesaid desires, or from obstructing her in so doing. On the trial the bishop testified, in substance, that he had no interest or inclination in the matter, except in so far as he deemed it to be his official duty to protect the rights and maintain the status of persons to whom burial privileges in the cemetery had been allotted. The pleadings are not divergent in any essential degree as to any of the above-recited facts, which, except as below stated, are all that we think material in the present inquiry. The defensive matter stated in the answer is that Edward P. Cagney, "long prior to his death, had expressed a wish that his remains be interred in the family burying ground of said John Fitzgerald, and had selected for that purpose, by and with the consent of the said John Fitzgerald and Mary Fitzgerald," the plot where he was in fact buried, "and it was his dying wish that his former request in that behalf should be carried out." It is further alleged that after his decease the said John and Mary, "in pursuance of said wish, and without any opposition or remonstrances whatever on the behalf of the plaintiffs, or any of them, or anyone else," caused his body to be buried at the spot designated. That a dying request by a decedent as to the disposition of his remains is obligatory upon his next of kin, we very much doubt. Probably, if, in this case, such a request had consigned the body to a dissecting table, all the parties to this action would have unanimously repudiated it as an obligation upon the living. But we need not decide the question at this time, because the answer does not allege such request. It alleges a wish as consequent upon a request made "long prior," but it is not alleged that the wish was expressed by word or gesture, and, so far as appears from the pleading, it may have been a mere inference from the precedent request. It appears from the evidence that the request referred to was made some eleven years before the death of Edward, who died unmarried, at about the age of twenty-one years, so that at the time he made it he was a child of nine or ten years of age, who had been living with his uncle something more than a year. This request was made of the Fitzgeralds alone, and, if it was repeated,—about which there is some doubt,—it was repeated to them alone. It did not come to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, or of any of them, until after Edward had died. This falls far short of being a dying request, or of proving a dying wish. The allegation that the burial was "without the opposition or remonstrance" of the plaintiffs is, we think, immaterial. The great weight, if not the unanimous voice, of the authorities is that the right of disposition of the body of a deceased person resides in his or her surviving consort or next of kin, and we think this court would be unwarranted in holding that such right can be relinquished, if at all, without some affirmative act evidencing a deliberate purpose so to do. That the plaintiffs, or any of them, ever committed such an act, is not only not alleged, but it is not proved. What the evidence does establish quite clearly, and all that it tends to establish, is that when the body was lying in wait for the grave a discussion arose about the place of sepulture, the plaintiffs then expressing a desire that it should be at Plattsmouth, and that, after having been repeatedly besieged by the Fitzgeralds and by a priest of the church, they reluctantly ceased, for the time being, their active opposition to the burial which took place. But that they ever freely and voluntarily consented to it there is not a syllable of evidence to prove. We do not think that this is a case to which the doctrine of estoppel applies, but, if it was so, the evidence would be insufficient to maintain the issue on behalf of the defense. The right of a surviving husband or wife, or, if there be none, of the next of kin, to have the custody of the body of a deceased person, and decide upon the place of its final burial, is supported by the better reason, and by the almost unanimous voice of the authorities. There are, of course, exceptions, as there are to nearly all general rules; but they arise for the most part out of some such circumstances as would deprive a natural guardian of the custody of a living child. The sentiments, sympathies, and affectionate wishes of parents and near relatives concerning their deceased children and next of kin are not to be lightly set aside at the instance of strangers to the blood or of distant relatives. Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; Wynkoop v. Wynkoop, 42 Pa. 293, 82 Am. Dec. 506; Snyder v. Snyder, 60 How. Pr. 371; Re Beckman Street, 4 Bradf. 507, Appx.; O'Donnell v. Slack, 123 Cal. 285, 43 L. R. A. 388, 55 Pac. 906; Smiley v. Bartlett, 6 Ohio C. C. 234.

We do not think that the record in this case offers any occasion for an exception. The district court dismissed the plaintiffs' petition, and granted a perpetual injunction in behalf of the defendants. The plaintiffs appeal. We recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and that a judgment be rendered in this court according with the prayer of the petition.

Messrs. L. W. Billingsley, R. J. Greene, and William V. Allen also for defendant in error.

Albert, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover for personal injuries sustained by him by reason of the alleged negligence of the defendant. At the close of the testimony the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and from a judgment rendered thereon the plaintiff prosecutes error to this court.

At the threshold of this case we are met by an objection to the bill of exceptions. The defendant insists that a part of the evidence is omitted therefrom, and for that reason the bill of exceptions should be disregarded. The evidence which it is claimed is omitted consists of ponderous articles, which do not admit of physical attachment to the record proper. These articles are all referred to in the written portion of the bill of exceptions, and articles answering to such reference were filed with the record in the case, and produced at the hearing in this court, bearing the marks of identification of the official reporter of the trial court. Their identity is unchallenged, save in the course of the argument. Under such circumstances, the articles produced will be regarded as a part of the bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions, therefore, is complete, and will be considered as a part of the record in the case.

Coming down to the merits of the case, it is undisputed that at the time of the injuries complained of the plaintiff was in the service of the defendant in the capacity of brakemen on one of its freight trains. In the course of his employment he stepped between two cars to uncouple them. While between the cars his foot caught between the guard rail and one of the main rails, and, before he could extricate himself, he was struck by one of the cars, thrown down, and part of the train passed over both his legs, whereby they were crushed and mangled so that amputation was necessary. The negligence imputed to the defendant by the plaintiff is its omission to fill or block the space between the guard and the main rail of the road. That the guard rail is a source of danger to those employed in operating trains is sufficiently clear from the evidence. It is an ordinary iron rail, varying in length according to the requirements of the particular place. It is placed on the inner side of the main rail, and parallel with it, at points on the road where there is danger of derailment. The space between the guard and main rail is usually about 4 inches, except at the ends of the former, which are somewhat curved. What renders this contrivance dangerous is that the rails in cross sections are in the form of the letter "T," and the guard rail being curved, at its ends, from the main rail, the foot of one walking on the track is liable to be forced into the space between the two rails, and, when it is, it is difficult to withdraw it. It sufficiently appears from the evidence that, long prior to the injury complained of most railway systems had adopted the precaution of blocking the space between the two rails with wood, thereby lessening the danger to the employees. As to the relative advantages and disadvantages of this precaution, the evidence is conflicting; but, the court having directed a verdict, it will suffice for present purposes to say that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a finding that ordinary care and prudence, and a due regard for the safety of its employees, required the defendant to keep such places blocked, and that the injury to the plaintiff would not have occurred but for the omission of the defendant in this regard. In other words, there was sufficient evidence to establish negligence on the part of the defendant. The defendant invokes the rule that a servant, by his contract of service, assumes the risks and dangers incident to his employment, and insists that such rule relieves it of liability for the injury sustained by the plaintiff. That the servant, by his contract of service, assumes certain risks, is true. Just what such risks are, we are not required to determine in this case, because it is sufficient to say that the negligence of his employer is not one of the risks assumed. On the contrary, a servant has a right to assume that his employer has used ordinary care and prudence to insure his safety in the course of his employment. Seley v. Southern P. Co. 6 Utah, 319, 23 Pac. 751; Miller v. Southern P. Co. 20 Or. 285, 26 Pac. 70; Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebreghsten, 57 N. J. L. 400, 31 Atl. 619; Carter v. Oliver Oil Co. 34 S. Co. v. Baxter*, 42 Neb. 793, 60 N. W. 1044. We do not deem it necessary to discuss the rule laid down in that case, because, in our opinion it is not applicable to the state of facts shown by this record. In that case it was neither alleged nor shown in evidence that the plaintiff was ignorant of the defects causing injury. In the reasoning employed in the deduction of the rule in that case, great stress is laid on that omission. In the present case it is alleged in the petition and shown by the evidence that the plaintiff had been in the employ of the defendant but a short time when the injury occurred, and was ignorant of the defect causing the injury. Hence the rule stated in the case referred to does not apply to the one at bar.

This brings us to what we regard as the most difficult question presented by the record, and that is whether the plaintiff himself was guilty of such negligence in the premises as to preclude a recovery. It is conclusively established that the train by which the plaintiff was injured at the time of such injury was under his control and direction; that, at the time he stepped between the cars to uncouple them, they were moving at the rate of about 4 or 5 miles an hour; that he might, by a mere signal, have had them stopped, and thus effected the uncoupling without danger to himself. There is evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that the plaintiff, though an experienced man, had been in the employ of the defendant but a short time when the injury occurred, and was ignorant of the guard rail at the point where the injury occurred. The defendant insists that the plaintiff's acts, under the circumstances, amount to contributory negligence, and bar a recovery. It would serve no useful purpose to cite authorities in support of the general rule that there can be no recovery if the negligence of the injured party proximately contributed to the injury. The soundness of the rule is not questioned. The only question is whether it was correctly applied in this case. In other words, the question is whether the trial court was warranted in holding, as a matter of law, that the acts of the plaintiff, in the light of all the circumstances, constitute such negligence as would defeat a recovery. Negligence is rarely an unmixed question of law. It has been defined by this court as doing that which an ordinarily careful and prudent man would not do under the existing circumstances. Dailey v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 58 Neb. 400, 78 N. W. 722. The risk involved is the deterring cause. If the risk is so great that an ordinarily careful and prudent man would not, under the circumstances, assume it, then to assume it is negligence. The magnitude of the risk is to be determined by many considerations. Among them are the experience and skill of the individual in the performance of such acts, the time and place and the instrumentalities involved. These and other elements affecting the risk, which readily suggest themselves, the plaintiff was bound to take into account in deciding whether to assume the risk of going between the moving cars to uncouple them. But he was not required to weigh the chances of negligence on the part of the defendant. On the contrary, he had a right to assume that it had used ordinary care, and taken due precautions to protect its employees from danger. He was not required to anticipate the negligence of his employer, but had a right to assume that it had performed its duty. The case just cited amply sustains this proposition. Such an assumption is not only warranted, but is essential to the successful operation of a railroad, which will not admit of the employee's stopping to weigh the probabilities of negligence or a mistake on the part of his superiors, but requires prompt and unquestioning obedience. This leaves, then, the bare question whether, as a matter of law, one who goes between cars, moving at the rate of 4 or 5 miles an hour, on a road where ordinary precautions have been taken for the safety of the employees, is guilty of negligence. As before stated, negligence is seldom an unmixed question of law. Whether an ordinarily careful and prudent man would do a particular act depends upon the attendant risk. As we have seen, the risk depends in part on the individual doing the act. A young man with long experience as a brakeman might go between moving cars and uncouple them without incurring any serious risk, while the same act by an old and inexperienced man would be perilous in the extreme. Again, the risk would vary according to the condition of the road; being greater if it should be rough and uneven, or covered with ice and snow, than if smooth and level, and free from such covering. These and an almost infinite number of other elements must be taken into account in estimating the risk incurred by the individual doing the act. In view of the manifold factors entering the problem of estimating the risk, it is impossible to say, as a matter of law, what an ordinarily careful and prudent man, under the circumstances, would do. From the evidence, reasonable minds might reach different conclusions; hence, the question was one of fact for the determination of the jury. Omaha Street R. Co. v. Martin, 48 Neb. 65, 66 N. W. 1007; Omaha & K. Valley R. Co. v. Morgan, 40 Neb. 604, 59 N. W. 81; Trott v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 115 Iowa, 80, 86 N. W. 33; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Wymore, 40 Neb. 645, 58 N. W. 1120. It follows, therefore, that the trial court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; and such is our recommendation.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Ames, C., on December 3, 1902, filed the following response thereto:

This was submitted and decided at a former term of the court, and an opinion filed on the 19th day of June, 1901. See 62 Neb. 358, 86 N. W. 1098. Afterwards a motion for a rehearing was granted, and the cause has been exhaustively reargued by the counsel for both parties, and resubmitted for our consideration. The vital question in the case is one of extreme importance, not only to the parties thereto and to railroad companies, but to all persons making use of mechanical devices in the conduct of their business, and to their servants and employees, and to the public generally. We do not conceive that, in the absence of legislation, any different rule of liability or responsibility is applicable to railroad companies than to other persons under substantially similar circumstances. The plaintiff in error was injured in the service of the company by reason of having one of his feet caught under an unblocked guard rail while he was attempting to uncouple some cars belonging to one of the trains of the defendant. Other circumstances of the accident are set out in the former opinion, but are not required to be repeated here. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant in obedience to a peremptory instruction by the court. The charge of negligence by the company consists in its omission to block the rail. We are convinced that we fell into error of fact in the statement in the former opinion that "it sufficiently appears from the evidence that, long prior to the injury complained of, most railway systems had adopted the precaution of blocking the space between the two rails with wood, thereby lessening the danger to the employees." A more thorough examination of the record, aided by a more complete analysis thereof by counsel than we were favored with on the former hearing, has disclosed that there were wide differences of opinion between railway companies and their skilled managers with respect to the relative safety to their servants and to the public of the blocked and unblocked guard rails; that a very large number—perhaps a majority—of the principal railway systems of the country continue the use of unblocked rails; and that in some instances the managers of the companies have used the blocked and unblocked, alternately, because of an inability to satisfy their own minds which, upon the whole, is the safer and more prudent course to pursue. There is also some evidence that in the opinion of some managers the relative safety of the use of the device of blocking, and the contrary, is dependent upon the situation of the road to which it may be applied, and to the character of the soil over which the road extends, and the liability of the spaces between the rails becoming filled up with drifting sand and dirt. But the plaintiff offered no evidence to prove what is the effect, if any, of the use of blocks upon the safety of the transportation of persons and property over the railways, or the facility of moving trains. Upon this state of the record, can it be properly said that a railroad company is negligent because of using, or of failing to use, the block? We think not. It is a case not analogous to the use of defective machinery, or of omitting the use of a device generally approved, and obviously adapted to prevent or lessen a known and specific danger. The rule of law is that in such cases the employer must exercise such care and skill as, under the circumstances, reasonable and ordinary prudence requires to be used. The phraseology by which the rule is variously stated is somewhat indeterminate, because the idea sought to be expressed is in like degree vague, and its application in any case depends in a great measure upon the attendant facts; but it may be said generally that a man cannot be held responsible in damages for the consequences of an error in judgment, carefully formed after an intelligent survey of all the elements entering into the problem which he is called upon to solve. Such a responsibility would transcend any which any accepted theory of ethics has ever demanded, and would exceed the ability of civil tribunals to enforce or even to expound. Mechanical devices, like medicinal remedies, are innumerable, and the only sure test of either is that of experience; and, until the latter has pronounced a definite judgment, one who, in the exercise of ordinary skill and care, makes use of that which, in his opinion, is most conducive to the accomplishment of a desired result, cannot be held responsible for the consequences. Extremes meet. Under the contrary rule, responsibility of each to all, and of all to each, being theoretically universal, would practically cease to exist. Scientific progress would be arrested, and society would dissolve into its primary elements. Whatever may be the theological consequences of an "honest doubt," it cannot be sufficient ground for recovery in a civil action for damages. Civil tribunals have not the attribute of omniscience, without which an issue pertaining thereto cannot be tried, or an adequate judgment thereon pronounced. Servitude, in this age and country, is voluntary. The servant assumes the risks incident to the nature of his employment. Among these is the danger of error of judgment by his employer in the choice of tools and mechanisms with which his tasks are to be performed, and he cannot be held civilly liable in choosing one of two or more mechanisms regarded by those called on to use such devices, and competent to judge of their safety from long use and experience in their operations, as among the best in use, even though an accident may happen to an employee in the use of the one selected, that could not have occurred in the same manner, had another kind been chosen. When experts skilled and experienced in their profession differ with respect to the choice of the means, remedies, or mechanisms best adapted or adaptable to the accomplishment of a given end, especially if that end be not simple and single, but is itself compounded of many elements, courts and juries are incompetent to decide between them. A world-old problem is expressed by the inquiry, "When doctors disagree, who shall decide?" In whatever field of inquiry, proof of the best is a requirement which it is impossible to meet. That of the comparative is often beyond reach. The highest scientific attainments vary in their conclusions, while varying degrees of practical skill often differ where the former agree. Judicial tribunals cannot supervise or correct the mistakes of either. They cannot so do, if for no other reason, because their decision in a particular instance decides nothing but the matter then being especially litigated. The decision furnishes no rule for the future guidance of the parties. The very act or omission which in one case has served as the occasion of punishment or exculpation may in the very next case, tried upon the same or following day, have an exactly opposite consequence. Such results would travesty the administration of justice, and so we think that the courts have nearly universally held that errors of judgment, not occasioned by wilful ignorance or a reckless inattention to duty, are not evidence of negligence, or a ground of civil liability.

As having a direct application to cases like the one at bar, we quote the following authorities: Thus, in Titus v. Bradford, B. & K. R. Co. 136 Pa. 618, 626, 20 Atl. 518, the court says: "All the cases agree that the master is not bound to use the newest and best appliances. He performs his duty when he furnishes those of ordinary character and reasonable safety, and the former is the test of the latter; for, in regard to the style of implement, or nature of the mode of performance of any work 'reasonably safe' means safe according to the usages, habits, and ordinary risks of the business. Absolute safety is unattainable, and employers are not insurers. They are liable for the consequences, not of danger, but of negligence; and the unbending test of negligence in methods, machinery, and appliances is the ordinary usage of the business. No man is held by law to a higher degree of skill than the fair average of his profession or trade, and the standard of due care is the conduct of the average prudent man. The test of negligence in employers is the same, and, however strongly they may be convinced that there is a better or less dangerous way, no jury can be permitted to say that the usual and ordinary way, commonly adopted by those in the same business, is a negligent way, for which liability shall be imposed. Juries must necessarily determine the responsibility of individual conduct, but they cannot be allowed to set up a standard which shall, in effect, dictate the customs or control the business of the community." And in Reese v. Hershey, 163 Pa. 253, 257, 29 Atl. 908: "The average untrained mind is apt to take the fact of injury as sufficient evidence of negligence. Moreover, the use of a dangerous machine is very commonly considered ground for holding the employer responsible, whereas the test of liability is not danger, but negligence, and negligence can never be imputed from the employment of methods or machinery in general use in the business." And in Harley v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co. 142 N. Y. 31, 34, 36 N. E. 813: "The master does not guarantee the safety of his servants. He is not bound to furnish them an absolutely safe place to work in, but is bound simply to use reasonable care and prudence in providing such a place. He is not bound to furnish the best known appliances, but only such as are reasonably fit and safe. He satisfies the requirements of the law if in the selection of machinery and appliances he uses that degree of care which a man of ordinary prudence would use, having regard to his own safety, if he were supplying them for his own personal use. It is culpable negligence which makes the master liable, not a mere error of judgment. Here the belt was fastened at one of its splices with what was called the Buffalo Belt Fastener, and while the machinery was running the fastener gave way, and the belt parted and caused the injury to the plaintiff. It was shown upon the trial that there were several kinds of belt fasteners in use. . . . Under such circumstances, how can it be said that the defendant violated any duty it owed to the plaintiff? It was impossible, from the evidence, to determine whether these fasteners were or were not the best in use for such a belt and such machinery as the defendant had at the time and place of the accident. Suppose a master, needing fasteners in his shop, makes inquiry among men of skill and experience as to the best kind of fasteners to use, and he is informed by some that one kind is the best, and by others that another kind is the best, and so on, and he finally makes a selection, using his best judgment, and suppose it should turn out that it was not the best; could he, under such circumstances, be held liable for an injury received by a person in his service from the parting of a belt on account of the insufficiency of the fastener under any particular strain to which the belt had been subjected? But we may go one step further. Suppose, under such circumstances, he purchased fasteners for use in his shop, which, according to the judgment of his skilled workmen, were found to be useful, convenient, and safe, and the very best in use; can he then be charged with negligence for continuing to use them, and be made liable to one who is accidentally injured by the parting of a belt? Suppose, under the circumstances which exist here, the defendant had adopted one of the other fasteners for this particular belt, and an accident had happened from its parting; there would have been substantially the same evidence for the jury, and the same claim could have been made which is now made, — that there was a question of fact for the jury as to its negligence in making the selection. This judgment cannot be affirmed without subjecting the master in such a case as this to the risk of liability for injuries from the parting of a belt moving machinery in his shop, whatever fastener he may use, because, if he uses one kind, according to the evidence in this case, it is easy to find persons who will testify that, from their experience and observation, some other kind was better. It must always be true that where several appliances are in use, each of which is regarded by men of skill and experience as safe and proper, the master cannot be made liable for an injury to one of his servants, if, in selecting the particular appliance, he takes what, according to his judgment, is the best or most suitable, guided by his experience and observation, and those of the skilled men in his employment. Upon the evidence in this case, it cannot even be determined that the managers of the defendant erred in their judgment in the selection of this kind of fastener. But if there was an error in judgment, it was not such as to constitute that degree of negligence and want of prudence which, under the rules of 60 L. R. A.

law above cited, can impose liability for such an accident as this." And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 Ala. 112, 8 So. 371, it is said: "We have said many times that railroads are not required to adopt every appliance which some roads, even a majority of the well-regulated, have incorporated into their system of management. Something must be accorded to diversity of judgment. If many well-regulated railroads abstain from adopting a particular appliance, which other roads, even a majority, consider wise precautions, and adopt such abstention cannot be pronounced, per se, recklessness or negligence." And in McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co. 49 Mich. 466, 472, 13 N. W. 819, 821: "Railroading is at least a business with many dangers, and scarcely any machine, implement, or expedient made use of in it but is liable at some times and under some circumstances to imperil human lives. Suppose the block had been made use of, and an accident had occurred, which was thought to be attributable to it; how, on the plaintiff's theory, would the defendant have excused itself for adopting it? A jury verdict in favor of its use in a previous case could be no protection, for a verdict makes no precedent, and settles nothing but the immediate controversy to which it relates. The next jury, on precisely similar facts, is at liberty to find directly the contrary. The defendant would therefore be compelled to defend its adoption of the block by showing that it tended to make the management of trains more safe. But if the plaintiff in the suit were to proceed to show — what fully appears in this case — that, though the device had been known for several years, the experts in charge of railroads the country over, naturally solicitous, as they must be, on grounds of personal interest, if not of humanity, to diminish the risks to life, had failed to be convinced of the expediency of making use of the block, this showing would have made out a case against the defendant which could not well have been answered. The prima facie showing that the device had been hastily, if not heedlessly, adopted, would certainly have been very strong; and if the two cases, charging respectively negligence in rejecting, and then in adopting, the same device, could go to successive juries, we might witness the instructive result of a verdict against the defendant in both. But such a result is inconsistent with a proper administration of definite rules of law and justice." And to the same effect is Southern P. Co. v. Seley, 152 U. S. 145, 38 L. ed. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530, Reversing 6 Utah, 819, 23 Pac. 751, cited in our former opinion, and, to a like effect, Luke Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. McCormick, 74 Ind. 440.

We think that the foregoing decisions establish beyond controversy, both upon reason and authority, that an employer is not liable in damages for the consequences of mere error in judgment in furnishing structures, machinery, and appliances for the use of his servants in the prosecution of his business, unless it is shown that such error is itself the result of negligent or wilful ignorance or inattention. Of this latter there is no evidence in this case, and the instruction complained of was therefore rightfully given.

We recommend that the former judgment of this court be vacated and set aside, and the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Duffie, C.:

I fully agree with all that is said in the foregoing opinion, and think that the case should be affirmed for the reasons above given. I wish to add, however, that I think the evidence shows that the plaintiff in error was guilty of contributory negligence, and that on that account alone the law can afford him no relief.

Sedgwick, J.:

On account of the importance of the question involved, and the difference of opinion of the commissioners, argument was had before the court. There can be no doubt that if the company acted in good faith, and with an honest desire to adopt the methods best calculated to promote the safety of its employees generally, as well as of the traveling public, it cannot be charged with negligence, even though we should believe from the evidence before us that the purposes the company had in view would have been better served by blocking the rails, as plaintiff contends. There is still less reason to impute negligence to the company if the evidence shows that, in the present condition of experience, it is impossible to say which method, upon the whole, affords the best guaranty of immunity from danger. It was contended upon the argument that the claim that the unblocked guard rail is less dangerous than the blocked rail was an afterthought, and not urged in good faith by the company, and that for this reason the case should have been submitted to the jury. Of course, the question of good faith on the part of the company in determining the advisability of blocking the guard rails is a question of fact, and as such, when in dispute, is to be determined by the jury. If there was no reasonable ground for doubt as to the better course to pursue, the company cannot defend against a charge of negligence by urging that it was in doubt, and acted on its best judgment. But if the best course to pursue, in the interest of the safety of the employees and of the traveling public alike, was an open question, and difficult to determine, the company cannot be charged with negligence in having adopted the one course rather than the other. Upon examination of the evidence, it appears that there is no dispute that the safety of the employees of the company and the safety of the traveling public are both involved in the determination of the question of the advisability of blocking the guard rails. So far as safety to the employees is concerned, there is a large mass of testimony, from which it cannot be determined with any degree of certainty which is the better practice; and when we further consider that there is much apparently reliable evidence tending to show that danger to the traveling public is increased by the practice of blocking the rails, and no evidence is offered to show that any system of blocking can be adopted without increasing that danger, we think there is an entire failure of proof that the company acted in bad faith in adopting the unblocked system.

We have therefore adopted the majority opinion of the commission, as prepared by Mr. Commissioner Ames, and the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Per Curiam:

For reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the former judgment of this court be vacated and set aside, and the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

APPPLICATION for a writ of quo warranto to annul defendant's charter. Judgment of ouster.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank N. Prout, Attorney General, Norris Brown, and William B. Rose, for the State:

The scheme of defendant is impracticable, and it cannot keep its promises. The enterprise will collapse, and many contract holders will lose their investments.

The Nebraska Home Company's contracts are unlawful for the reason that they require the corporation to discriminate between investors, giving some an unreasonable profit at the expense of others.

The Nebraska Home Company collects from investors unconscionable compensation for services.

Unconscionable terms imposed by investment companies upon investors are unlawful, and cannot be enforced.

It is the policy of the law to make savings and investment institutions safe and economical, and to protect investors from fraud and plunder. An investment company employing no capital in its business, and operating under a plan which requires it to keep its treasury empty, should not be permitted to use its charter to solicit contracts of investment without security.

A provision in a contract of investment for forfeiture to the investment company of all investments, upon default in payment of instalments, is unconscionable and unlawful.

The Nebraska Home Company is conducting a lottery, or scheme of chance, and its contracts for the promotion and operation of that enterprise are unlawful.

The term "liberty," as used in the Bill of Rights in the Constitution, includes the right of every citizen to choose and follow a particular business, and to take and advertise in any legitimate manner, subject to the restraints necessary to secure the common welfare.

The contract is not contrary to public policy on the ground that it cannot be carried out without practising deception, or is incapable of performance.

The contract in this case is clear and explicit in its terms. The holder knows, before he enters into the contract, the number of the same and its position in the series. The conditions and promises are fully and fairly set out in the contract. There are no latent interpretations or meanings therein to defraud the parties. There are no subtle conditions to mislead a man of common intelligence and understanding. The purpose of the contract is not only lawful, but such as the government and every other good influence in the country should encourage.

Pratt v. Hutchinson, 15 East, 511; King v. Webb, 14 East, 406.

Messrs. Bartlett, Dundey, & Martin, also for defendant:

A corporation which has for its object the purchase of land and the construction of houses thereon, the funds being realized from the capital stock paid in by subscribers in instalments, and finally the allotment of the lots and houses among the stockholders in satisfaction of their stock, is one organized for the purpose of carrying on a lawful business, and authorized by the general incorporation law.

York Park Bldg. Asso. v. Barnes, 39 Neb. 834, 58 N. W. 440.

On motion for rehearing.

The law will not presume a contract to be illegal or against public policy, and so void, when it is capable of a construction which will make it lawful and valid.

Ormes v. Dauchy, 82 N. Y. 443, 37 Am. Rep. 583.

Courts will not declare contracts void on the ground of public policy, except where the case is free from doubt, and when an injury to the public interests clearly appears.

Barrett v. Carden, 65 Vt. 431, 26 Atl. 530.

All business depends upon continued patronage for success, and the business and legal world has always observed a presumption that business would continue. If the iron rule should be applied that no business should be permitted unless it would succeed by a limited and stationary patronage, then every industry in the land would be palsied. If the presumption is indulged that the business would continue,—and there is no reason why this rule should not obtain,—then these contracts would not only be practicable, but a great benefit would be given to those who made them; and it is a well-established rule of law that, where a contract is open to two constructions, the one lawful and the other unlawful, the former must be applied.

Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567, 29 L. ed. 940, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 870; United States v. Central P. R. Co. 118 U. S. 235, 30 L. ed. 173, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1038.

The burden is on the party claiming that the contract is contrary to public policy to show that its enforcement would be in violation of the settled public policy of this state, or injurious to the morals of its people.

Swann v. Swann, 21 Fed. 299; Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229.

If the contract is within the range of possibility, however absurd or improbable the idea of execution will be, it will be upheld.

Mr. A. G. Wolfenbarger, amicus curiæ:

Five laborers are enabled to save \$4 a month each, after paying the family expenses, including \$16 a month house rent in each case. Each is striving to get a \$1,000 home; each one has saved up \$200 to that end. By working alone it will be one hundred thirty-eight months before anyone can accomplish his purpose, including interest on his money. They put their money together and buy a home for number 1, who then puts into the common fund the \$16 a month he has been paying as rent, in addition to his savings; then their combined savings are \$30 a month, and in 27 $\frac{1}{3}$ months they have saved enough to buy a home for number 2; then their combined savings are \$52 a month, so in 19 $\frac{1}{3}$ months more they buy a home for number three; then their combined savings are \$68 per month, so in 14 $\frac{1}{3}$ months they buy a home for number 4; then their combined savings are \$84 per month, and in 11 $\frac{1}{3}$ months they buy a home for number 5. Number 5, by this co-operation, would get his home in seventy-five months, and have it all paid for in one hundred months, making a net saving to the last man of thirty-eight months over what would have been possible without co-operation. When the one hundred and thirty-eight months have expired that it would have taken them to secure homes without co-operation, by this co-operation they have paid for their homes, and have combined savings to the amount of \$6,300 in addition thereto.

This is the scheme set forth in defendant's contract.

The attempt to restrain and interfere with the private right of contract in the absence of complaint from any party to the contract, and in the absence of any violation of law, should not be tolerated.

Sedgwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information in the nature of quo warranto to annul the corporate existence of defendant, and oust it of its corporate powers, franchises, and privileges. To the answer of the defendant the attorney general filed a general demurrer. The answer alleges that defendant has been and is entering into contracts with various parties in pursuance of its franchise. The terms of these contracts are set out in full in the answer. The principal questions presented and discussed by counsel are: First. Do these contracts contain the elements of a lottery? Second. Are they unlawful as against public policy? By the terms of the contract the company "agrees and undertakes to assist the said holder of this contract in purchasing and paying for a home." The holder agrees to pay $3 for the "company's services in registering and issuing each application and contract," and "to pay to the company at the home office of the company in Omaha, Nebraska, $1.35 each month, on or before the last day thereof, from the date hereof, until this contract shall mature as hereinafter described." After the contract matures, the amount of the monthly payments is increased to $5.35, and they continue "until the holder shall have paid into the home fund, as herein provided, the total sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, or such fractional part of such sum as shall be furnished for him by the company. Five dollars of said sum of $5.35 so paid shall be placed by the company in the home fund as hereinbefore described, and 35 cents thereof is in payment for the services of the company." The contract also provides: "First. Said company shall number and date all contracts issued in regular numerical order as applications are received at the home office, and shall keep a record thereof, showing the date and serial number of each contract. Sixth. This contract shall be deemed to be matured, within the meaning hereof, when there shall be, over and above what is required to be paid out on contracts of lower serial number than this contract, either (1) an income of fifty ($50.00) dollars per month, due said home fund from contract holders; or (2) an amount of money in said home fund, which, when added to the income so due from contract holders for a period of twenty months, will equal one thousand ($1,000) dollars. Seventh. When this contract matures, the company agrees on each and every month thereafter, for twenty months, to pay out of the said home fund the sum of fifty ($50.00) dollars in assisting the holder to purchase a home, to pay off a mortgage on a home owned by the holder, or to erect a dwelling house on a lot belonging to a holder, as said holder may prefer. It is understood and agreed that the holder shall select property of the value of one thousand ($1,000) dollars on the basis of said payments thereon of fifty ($50.00) dollars per month, and thereupon the company shall immediately proceed to investigate title and value of the property, and, as soon as possible, notify the holder of its approval or disapproval of the holder's selection. If the company approves the selection, it shall immediately cause the property selected to be purchased, and put the holder in possession thereof, on the terms and conditions hereinafter contained."

1. Does this scheme involve the elements of a lottery? To constitute a lottery, there must be a prize offered, and the payment of something for a chance to obtain it. The attorney general has furnished the court with an "expert's table," which is derived from a computation based upon the issuing of contracts upon 1,000 applications received at the same time, and each holder paying his instalments according to his agreement. We do not understand that defendant's attorneys deny the accuracy of the result obtained upon the basis assumed, and it appears that the twenty-two holders of the lowest numbered contracts would get their first instalments, respectively, within the first twenty-month period after the contracts were made, and would receive the full sum of $1,000 within the next twenty-month period thereafter; whereas the holder of contract numbered 1,000, although making his payments monthly, would not have any return from his investment until more than seventy years from the time he took his contract and began payment. The advantage of the fortunate holder of the early number is manifest. To obtain such a preference is to obtain something of value. "It is idle to say that a sum or an obligation for a sum due and payable to-day or at an early day is of no more value than an obligation for an equal amount, without interest, payable at a remote and indefinite time." MacDonald v. United States, 12 C. C. A. 339, 24 U. S. App. 25, 63 Fed. 426. The question, then, is whether the element of chance enters into the scheme by which one contract holder obtains this advantage over another. The contracts are to be "numbered and dated in regular numerical order as applications are received at the home office." The applicant must take his chances as to how many applications may be received at the same time that his is received, and, if there are several at the same time, he must take the chance of preference over other applications received with his. In MacDonald v. United States, 12 C. C. A. 339, 24 U. S. App. 25, 63 Fed. 426, Judge Woods said: "Whether or not a purchaser will obtain a bond of one number or another depends . . . upon the order in which his application shall reach the hand of the secretary, and that is largely a matter of chance. The secretary receives applications by mail and otherwise; sometimes singly, and sometimes a number together; and in the order of receipt, and as he chances to take up one or another first, passes them through a registering device, and, in accordance with the notations thereby made upon the applications, the bonds are numbered and issued. But for the purchaser's hope, or, as it may well be said, for his chance, of getting a multiple number, the business would soon cease." He held that "the element of chance incident to the numbering of the bonds before they were issued" made the scheme a lottery. The reasoning of the court in the MacDonald Case was adopted by Judge McComas in a similar case recently decided in the supreme court of the District of Columbia. United States v. Sherwood (D. C.) 31 Wash. L. Rep. —. Judge McComas fortifies his conclusions by quotations from other authorities, and holds that under such a plan "the number of the certificate and their consequent value depends upon chance." A certified copy of his very clear and satisfactory opinion is on file in this case. He says: "In different states applicants on the same day may mail subscriptions for certificates in this company. Whether or not an applicant will receive a certificate of one number or another depends upon the order in which the application may reach the officer of this company who issues the certificates, and that is a matter of chance. This officer receives these applications by mail or otherwise, it may be one at a time, it may be many at the same time, and according to the order he chances to receive them, or as he chances to take up one or another, and determines the number of each applicant's certificate, the certificates are numbered and issued. He who, by these chances, luckily receives an earlier number, will be paid sooner, and will pay in less money, than another, who, subscribing on the same day, receives a later number, and will, by these chances, be required to pay longer, and pay more money, and wait longer for payment of his shares. It is this element of chance in the numbering of the certificates which I believe to be in violation of this anti-lottery law. It is evident that the inducement to subscribe consists mainly in the chance of securing an early or lucky number." This reasoning is satisfactory to our minds, and we have been referred to no authority conflicting with the views so announced. The suggestion that the applicant will know the number of his contract before he accepts it, and, if not satisfied, may reject the contract, is without merit. By his application he agrees to accept the contract, and he is presumed to know the terms of the contract before he makes the application. The suggestion is predicated upon the idea that he will not perform the agreement that he has made in his application, but will forfeit the fee "for registering and issuing each application and contract," and so risk only the $3. If that is the proper construction of the contract, the result is the same. It involves the payment of $3 for the chance of obtaining an early number.

2. This defendant cannot be allowed the protection of its charter to do business in this state for another reason. Its plan involves taking money from its patrons upon contracts which, on its part, it is impossible to perform. It professes to be "a home company," and it "agrees and undertakes to assist" the holders of its contracts "in purchasing and paying for a home." It issues contracts which, through the misfortune of the holders in the numbering of the applications, will bring no assistance before the expiration of the ordinary allotment of three score years and ten. It cannot result in assistance to such holders in procuring a home in this world, and it does not profess to render assistance in any other. If it is intended that there will be new patrons, whose monthly payments shall be used to make good the company's promise to holders of earlier contracts not otherwise provided for, the situation is still worse. The company cannot furnish the funds to assist these new patrons to obtain homes before the time will come when, in the ordinary course of nature, they cannot avail themselves of such assistance. Their own payments cannot do so, nor help to do so. These are pledged to make up a deficiency existing before they obtained their contracts. They can hope to obtain the fruits of their contracts during their natural lives only from the payments to be made by others who obtain contracts after them, and there must be a sufficient number of these others in order to bring about the hoped-for result. It appears from the table referred to that about one third of the holders of the first 1,000 contracts supposed to be issued at one time would be able to procure homes within twenty-five years. To enable 1,000 to do so, there must be 3,000 contracts taken, or 2,000 new patrons, who must take their contracts soon after the first 1,000 are taken. To enable these additional 2,000 to obtain the promised assistance, there must be a still larger number of other contracts taken within a short time after the 2,000 take theirs, and so on in progressional numbers, which must in a few years run into infinity. The contracts, so contemplated, cannot, of course, all be fulfilled, and public policy will not permit the state to become a party to such a scheme. The defendant's business is, for these reasons, unlawful.

The demurrer is sustained, and judgment of ouster will be entered as prayed.

Petition for new trial denied.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Wesley BUCK

v.

NEW JERSEY ZINC COMPANY of Pennsylvania, Appt.

(204 Pa. 132.)

1. One whose duty is to do the blacksmith work necessary upon the implements used in the construction of a manufacturing plant is, in making a link for the chain used to hold in position the box of a dump car, a fellow servant of one engaged in operating the car, so that the common employer is not liable for injury to the latter through insufficiency of the link made by the former.

2. An employee operating a dump car, who is charged by the master with the duty of seeing that the links in the dumping mechanism of the cars are sound, is, in procuring and placing a link on a car, a fellow servant of one subsequently employed to operate it, so that the master is not liable for an injury to the latter because of the insufficiency of the link.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The duty which a master owes to his servant is to provide him with safe tools, machinery, and appliances with which to do what is required of him. The mere fact that a car which was the cause of the employee's injury was in an unsafe and dangerous condition is not prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the employer.

It is the duty of the servant to observe, and report to his employer any defect which may become apparent in tools or machinery; and the employer is not liable to an employee for the negligence of a fellow servant in the same employment.

Messrs. William G. Freyman and Eugene O. Nothstein, for appellee:

It was the duty of the defendant company to furnish reasonably safe appliances, tools, and machinery to its servants in the construction of its plant; yet it wholly neglected its duty in this respect.

An employer who has had ample opportunity to discover a defective appliance, and does not repair it within a reasonable time, is liable in damages to an employee who is injured by reason of the defective appliance while in the performance of his duties.

Bennett v. Standard Plate Glass Co. 158 Pa. 120, 27 Atl. 874.

There was not only a duty resting on the defendant to keep the cars in reasonable repair, but to make such inspections as the nature of the business required; and whether the cars belonged to a private owner or not is immaterial.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant in this case, the zinc company, was engaged in the construction of a large manufacturing plant. For the purpose of grading the ground and carrying cinders and building materials wherever they might be needed during the progress of the operation, temporary railroad tracks were laid. The cars used for this purpose were dump cars, which turned upon an axis running lengthwise of the car, so as to discharge the contents upon either side. In maintaining the normal equilibrium, the body of the car was held in place by short chains fastened upon each side. These chains were composed of 4 or 5 links, and each link was some 4½ inches in length. Usually the chains were not tightly drawn, but had considerable play, permitting the body of the car to rock somewhat upon its central axis. During the progress of the work the links of the chains were liable to become worn, or to break, and whenever this occurred it was customary to substitute, for the time being, an open link. Usually two men were assigned to each of the dump cars to see to the loading and unloading, and they were expected to ride back and forth upon the cars. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was so engaged. It appears from the testimony that another workman, named Beitle, who was working with the plaintiff, had received orders from the foreman of the yard to watch the cars, and, whenever he found a worn link, to cut it out, and put an open link in. He testifies that five days before the happening of the accident he did replace a worn link in the chain on the car upon which the plaintiff was employed with an open link, and that it was then all right; that he took a hammer, and welded the open points as close together as possible; that he saw this link just before the accident, and it was then in position, and well secured. While the car was in motion, and the plaintiff was sitting upon it, either from a sudden lurch, or from some other cause, this open link suddenly broke, permitting the car body to turn sideways, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground. The immediate cause of the accident was, therefore, the breaking of the link. These links were not purchased ready-made by the defendant, nor were they prepared in advance of the need for their use. They were made by the blacksmiths upon the premises, when ordered by the men. The defendant company had furnished large supplies of iron suitable for the various needs which might arise during the course of construction. This iron was kept in racks in the supply house, assorted according to size, so that the workmen could make a suitable selection as the occasion arose. The testimony shows that from 30 to 40 tons of iron of different sizes were thus kept in store, and three blacksmiths were provided to work it up into the various shapes as required by the workmen. As a witness stated, the blacksmiths did all kinds of work,—making the iron up into bolts, hangers, clasps, links, and anything else which was required. They made open links, welded links, and all kinds of links. Whatever the men needed and asked for was made by the blacksmiths. When anything of the kind was ordered, the blacksmiths went to the supply house, and selected from the stock of iron there on hand such as appeared to be suitable for the purpose required, and made it up into links, stirrups, bolts, clasps, and all the things necessary for use in the construction and erection of the plant. It must be borne in mind that the particular work which was being carried on at that time and place by the defendant company was the construction of the new works, and to this end everything was made to bend, and all of the workmen were engaged in carrying out this general purpose. While the plaintiff himself did not procure from the blacksmith the link which broke, yet it was procured by his fellow workman, Beitle, who was engaged in precisely the same duties, and was working side by side with him upon the cars. The particular inquiry in this case is whether the blacksmith who made the link in question was a fellow servant with the plaintiff and his immediate fellow workman who placed the link in the chain upon the car, and were using it at the time of the accident.

In Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Jones, 86 Pa. 432, the rule is laid down that, to constitute fellow servants in contemplation of the law, "they need not at the time be engaged in the same particular work. It is sufficient if they are in the employment of the same master, engaged in the same common work, and performing duties and services for the same general purposes." In applying this principle in the case of New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Bell, 112 Pa. 400, 4 Atl. 50, it was held that trainmen working on cars carrying supplies were fellow servants with the men in the shops who had put up a gas pipe for their own convenience, but which resulted in injury to a trainman. In the present case, if there was any negligence disclosed by the evidence, it was that of the blacksmith, either in making choice of the material out of which he formed the link, or in the exercise of his judgment as to the particular form and shape which he gave to it. The link was made at the request of Beitle, and was accepted by him from the hands of the blacksmith, without any objection or criticism as to its form or shape. He took it to the train upon which both he and the plaintiff were working, and placed it in position in the chain. They were working either upon the same or adjoining cars, and the duties performed by each were practically the same, as they consisted merely in attending to the loading and unloading of the cars. As it happened, Beitle was the one to whom the foreman had spoken, requesting him to look out particularly for the condition of the chains, and directing him to have any worn links replaced by sound ones. But the plaintiff was employed side by side with Beitle, and all the conditions were equally obvious to him. The blacksmith shop was open, and the blacksmiths were there for the purpose of making up into the shape desired whatever the men wanted in the way of links or other ironwork. Provision was made for direct and immediate communication between the men engaged in the work and the blacksmiths. The iron was furnished in quantities, and in various sizes for varied use as needed, and the blacksmiths were in attendance, not for the purpose of carrying on any separate or distinct department of the defendant's work, but to aid and assist in every way in which their service could be of use to the other workmen, who were, with themselves, all engaged in carrying out one common end,—the construction of the new works. Under the circumstances of the common employment at that time and place the blacksmiths were as truly the helpers and assistants of the other workmen as would be a blacksmith engaged at a stone quarry or a coal mine to sharpen or repair the picks and working tools of the quarrymen or miners. We cannot avoid the conclusion, therefore, that the blacksmith and the plaintiff were coemployees. Both were employed by the same master; were engaged in the same circle of employment; each was helping to carry forward in his own way a definite portion of the work directed to a common end. There is no proof in the case that the blacksmith was incompetent, or not sufficiently skilled for the purpose of his employment. Nor is there any proof that the iron furnished by the defendant in large quantities was either insufficient or unsuitable. This case is clearly ruled by the principles laid down in Ross v. Walker, 139 Pa. 40, 21 Atl. 158, 159. As was there said: "The master does not insure his employees against each other, nor is he bound to supervise and direct every detail of their labor. They must exercise their own senses in the selection of material out of the mass provided for them; they must use their own judgment as to the manner of handling it." And again (p. 51, 139 Pa., and p. 159, 21 Atl.): "For an error in judgment, or for a neglect of duty on the part of any one of his employees, from the foreman down to the humblest unskilled laborer, he [the employer] was not liable." We are of opinion that the defendant was entitled to an affirmance of its tenth point for charge, which is as follows: "The blacksmith that made the link, the laborer who ordered it made and put it on the car, and the plaintiff who worked as a laborer on the car, were fellow servants. They assumed all the risks incident to this work, and the master or employer cannot be held liable for the negligence of either or any of them which resulted in an injury to either." The fourth assignment of error, which is to the refusal of this point, is therefore sustained; as is also the first assignment of error, which was to the refusal of binding instructions in favor of the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

Mestresat, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment entered in this case. A brief statement of the material facts which are not controverted is necessary for a consideration of the question involved. Wesley Buck, the plaintiff, was employed by the defendant company as a laborer at the time he received the injuries for which the action was brought. The company built a large zinc manufacturing plant at Hazard, in Carbon county. During its construction a temporary railroad track of possibly 1 mile in length was laid for the purpose of carrying cinder, gravel, and other material to be used in grading the ground and in the construction of the buildings. Dump cars drawn by an engine were used on the road. The body of the car was held in place by a chain of 5 links, each about 4½ inches in length, on either side attached to the truck. When the contents of the car were to be discharged, the chain on the opposite side of the dump would be unloosed. The work in the construction of the plant was being done by the defendant company. The labor, as well as the cars, appliances, etc., were furnished by it. The cars belonged to the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and were leased to the defendant company. On the premises where the plant was being constructed the defendant had a blacksmith shop, at which all kinds of work was done. Near the shop was the company supply house, in which were kept large quantities of iron and other material, which were subject to the requisition of the employees in the different departments of the work. Five days prior to the accident, Robert Beitle, then a laborer on the gravel train, and subsequently plaintiff's fellow workman, went to the blacksmith shop, and procured 2 open links to be made by the defendant's blacksmith, to take the place of links which were worn or broken in the chains on the cars. Mr. Courtright, the chief constructing engineer in charge of the work, was at the shop, and Beitle told him that the cars were in a bad condition, and that he came there to get a few open links to be used on the gravel train. On his return to the cars Beitle put the open links in the chains, one in a chain of the car on which the plaintiff subsequently was riding at the time of the accident, and which broke, and caused his injuries. The plaintiff was one of a gang of men operating a train of 8 cars on this road in December, 1899. They loaded and unloaded the cars, and in passing between the points where they performed this service they were required to ride on the cars, and were not permitted to ride on the engine. On the afternoon of December 30th, the cars having been loaded with cinder, the men took their places upon them, and the train started for its destination. After it had gone about 30 yards, one of the chains on the car on which the plaintiff was riding broke, the car was dumped, and he was thrown to the ground, and seriously injured.

On examination it was discovered that the link which broke was an open one. Such links are used only in the case of an emergency, and until the car is taken to the shop, where the chain is repaired with a welded link. The plaintiff had been at work less than three days when he was injured, and did not know there was an open link in the chain until after the accident.

The learned trial judge, in his charge, limited the jury to a consideration of the condition and sufficiency of the link which broke as the only ground of negligence on which there could be a recovery. He held that the broken link was the proximate cause of the accident, and submitted to the jury to determine whether the defendant was negligent in supplying a link defective in its construction or in the material of which it was composed. He charged that "the defendant was bound to furnish a reasonably safe link, not only in matter of construction, but as to the constituent elements of it; and, while he is not liable for any latent defects in it, yet he is liable for negligence in not furnishing the proper material—safe material—for that kind of device. If the link was defectively constructed, or was of defective material, then the plaintiff may recover on both or either of these grounds, if the preponderance of the evidence satisfies you of the correctness of the plaintiff's contention as to those particulars." It was the personal, absolute duty of the defendant to provide the plaintiff with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and with proper and suitable tools and appliances with which to perform his work. This is familiar law. The fact that the cars did not belong to the defendant company did not, as contended by appellant, relieve it from the duty of seeing that they were reasonably safe. They were furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff and his collaborators of the train gang with which to carry or haul the cinder, and that imposed the duty upon the defendant, regardless of the ownership of the cars. Aside from this, however, it was not the cars nor the chain which the defendant hired from the Central Railroad of New Jersey that caused the accident, but the open link, made by the defendant company, and by it inserted in the broken chain on one of those cars prior to the time when the plaintiff entered the defendant company's service. In procuring the link Beitle was not performing work which made him a fellow servant of the plaintiff, even if the latter had then been engaged on the work; nor was the blacksmith in the construction of the link. The duty in either case was that of the defendant company, without regard to the fact that it was performed by an employee of the same grade as the plaintiff. It is the character of the act which causes the injury to an employee, and not the rank of the coemployee to whom its performance is intrusted, that determines the liability of the employer. Ricks v. Flynn, 196 Pa. 263, 46 Atl. 380. When the master delegates to his servant or other agent the performance of a duty obligatory upon him, the agent becomes a vice principal, for whose acts the master is responsible. Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 11 Atl. 514. "But there are some duties," says Paxson, J., delivering the opinion of the court in the case last cited, "which the master owes to the servant, and from which he cannot relieve himself except by performance. Thus, the master owes to every employee the duty of providing a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe instruments, tools, and machinery with which to work. This is a direct, personal, and absolute obligation; and, while the master may delegate these duties to an agent, such agent stands in the place of his principal, and the latter is responsible for the acts of such agent."

There were no open links in the chain when the cars were received by the defendant from the Central Railroad of New Jersey. The proximate cause of the accident was the breaking of an open link inserted in the chain by the defendant company before the plaintiff was in its service, and not a defect in any other part of the car or in the chain. The case at bar very much resembles Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Agnew, 11 W. N. C. 394, though the facts of that case are very much stronger in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff was a brakeman, and was injured by the snapping of a brake chain on a coal train. A chain on one car had snapped, and a broken link was found. The evidence tended to show that the broken link was not in the chain when purchased, but had been placed there in the repair shop of the defendant. The plaintiff recovered a verdict, and judgment was entered in his favor. In the opinion of this court it is said: "A chain is no stronger than the weakest link in it. There was evidence that the link which broke was not in the coil of the chain welded in the factory, but was put in afterwards at the repair shop of the company. It matters not, therefore, how strong or perfect the other parts of the chain were. This link was weak and imperfect, and the breaking thereof caused the injury. . . . The company was bound to exercise reasonable care in procuring good and strong chains, and in maintaining and repairing them. The verdict establishes they did not do the latter." In Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Leslie, 42 Phila. Leg. Int. 267, it was held, as stated in the syllabus, that a boiler maker in the machine shop of a railroad company is not such a coemployee or fellow servant with the engineer and fireman of a locomotive as would relieve the company from his negligent manner of repairing the locomotive boiler, whereby the accident was alleged to have occurred. Gordon, J., speaking for the court, says: "How a boiler maker employed in a machine shop can be regarded as a coemployee with a fireman and an engineer engaged in running a locomotive on the railroad, in the sense of making the latter responsible for the negligence of the former, is something that is difficult to understand." So may it be said here: How a blacksmith in a repair shop can be regarded as a coemployee with a laborer on a gravel train in the sense of making the latter responsible for the negligence of the former is something that is difficult to understand. There is no connection between the two employees. The blacksmith has no business about the cars, and the laborer has no business about the shop. In McKinney, Fellow Servants, § 25, it is said: "The agents [of the master] who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not, in the true sense of the rule relied on, to be regarded as fellow servants of those who are engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to his servants." In Wood, Mast. & S. § 409, the author says: "The question is whether any fault is imputable to him [the master] either in the selection of mechanics, material, or in the inspection of the machinery when completed. . . . If so, he is liable, whether the machinery was made by his own mechanics or purchased from others." In an extended note to Mast v. Kern (Or.) 75 Am. St. Rep. 580, the learned editor, Judge Freeman, states the following as deducible from the numerous cases he cites on the subject (p. 623, 75 Am. St. Rep.): "Agents charged with the duty of procuring safe machinery, or agents charged with the duty of inspecting and keeping machinery and appliances in suitable repair, are not to be regarded as fellow servants with those employed to labor in the business wherein such machinery and appliances are used, or, in some cases, even with those engaged to operate the same. Such agents are, in legal effect, vice principals, and the master is liable for injuries resulting, without contributory negligence, to other servants, through the ordinary negligence of his employee or agent thus charged with the duty of procuring or repairing, whether such negligence be in originally failing to purchase safe machinery or appliances or in failing to keep the same in proper condition for use." In Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Jones, 86 Pa. 432, a "mining boss" and a "driver boss" engaged in the mining and removal of coal were held to be fellow servants. But it must be observed that both employees were engaged in the same general business of getting out coal under the orders of a general superintendent. They were performing parts of one common service. Neither was furnishing tools or appliances to the other, nor in any other way performing towards the other the duty of an employer. This observation applies to the case of New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Bell, 112 Pa. 400, 4 Atl. 50. In Ross v. Walker, 139 Pa. 42, 21 Atl. 157, 159, relied upon by the majority of the court, the plaintiff, a laborer employed in building a bridge, was injured by the breaking of a defective timber supporting the scaffolding on which he worked. "The scaffold was built by the workmen as it was needed to support the ironwork while it was being put in place in the erection of the bridge." This court held—and it was the principal question decided—that it was not the duty of the employer, after having provided materials ample in quantity and quality, to supervise the selection of every stick of timber out of the mass for every purpose. With that conclusion I heartily agree. In the case at bar, if the plaintiff had been a blacksmith, and had been furnished with proper material by the defendant, and had made the link which, breaking, caused his injury, the case would have been similar to the one cited. But the difference in the facts of the two cases is clearly apparent. The reasoning in the opinion in Ross v. Walker sustains the position assumed here. Justice Williams, in delivering the opinion of the court, holds that it is the duty of the master to provide suitable appliances for his employees, and that for any negligence in the performance of this duty imposed upon the master he is responsible, regardless of the grade or character of the person who performs it. He says: "The person who is thus put in place of the principal to perform the duties which the law imposes is a vice principal, and quoad hoc represents the principal, so that his act is the act of the principal." In my judgment, the case at bar carries the fellow-servant rule far beyond any other case in the books. It makes an employee who acts for and performs the duty of his principal a collaborator of another employee who is injured by the failure of his employer to furnish him suitable appliances with which to work. It was the duty of the defendant company, under all the decisions, to furnish reasonably safe cars, including the chains, and to maintain them in that condition. It did furnish cars, but they were unsafe before and at the time the plaintiff entered its service. It is a truism, having, as we have seen, the judicial sanction of this court, that a chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Supplying a link, found by the jury to be defective, was the furnishing of a defective chain, which was a necessary and constituent part of the car, which the law required to be reasonably safe when delivered to the plaintiff. An important and controlling fact in the case, it seems to me, is that when Beitle procured the link and inserted it in the chain the plaintiff was not in the service of the company. He entered it two days subsequent. Even if Beitle were a fellow servant of the plaintiff at the time the latter was injured, he was clearly not such when he procured the defective link and put it in the chain. With due deference to the majority of the court, the defendant company is clearly and unquestionably responsible for the condition of the car when it put the plaintiff in charge of it. The case was, therefore, for the jury, and, having been submitted with proper instructions by the learned trial judge, I would affirm the judgment of the court below.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

CHATTANOOGA LIGHT & POWER COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

George J. HODGES, Admr., etc., of Milton Palmer, Deceased.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The proximate cause of the death of an employee mortally burned in the employer's burning building, which he had entered to telephone an alarm of fire after he had failed to give the alarm elsewhere as he had left the building to do, is not the employer's negligence in constructing and maintaining the building so as to be likely to burn, but the employee's act in re-entering the building after he had reached a place of safety.

2. The question of proximate or intervening cause is for the court, where the facts are fairly incontrovertible.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown & Spurlock for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Richmond, Chambers, & Cooper for defendant in error.

Beard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the defendant in error to recover damages for the death of his intestate, Milton Palmer, resulting, as is alleged, from the negligence of the plaintiff in error. There were a verdict and judgment in favor of the administrator for $10,000, and the case has been brought to this court by the light and power company.

The deceased was one of the engineers of the company, and at night had charge of its power-house engines and other machinery. While he was on duty, and about 9:30 P. M., fire was discovered in a framework cover of the electric wires which led up through the hallway to the room above, Laack* (Ill.) 18 L. R. A. 215. As to negligence in incurring danger to save life of another person, see Corbin v. Philadel-

where they made their exit from the building. The fire rapidly spread, and occasioned the terrible injuries from which Palmer died. The theory of the plaintiff below was that negligence on the part of the defendant company in the use of combustible lumber in making this framework, and also in the location and condition of these wires, occasioned the fire which fatally burned the deceased while he was discharging his duty in seeking to save the property of his employer. The record shows that on discovering the fire young Palmer, instead of sounding the alarm through a telephone in the building, ran to a house across the street, and sought to do so with a telephone located there. After an ineffectual effort to make connection, he abandoned it, and returned to the power house. By that time the fire had spread until it was a serious conflagration. The flames and smoke were pouring out of the main entrance and the windows in that part of the building. There were other openings or doors into the power house, but, seeing Palmer in the act of passing in through this main entrance, a policeman on the ground expostulated with him on what he characterized as "foolhardiness." Disregarding the expostulation, however, Palmer entered there, and went down the burning hallway into the telephone booth or box when it was on fire. Remaining there but a short time, he came out with his clothing aflame, and so horribly burned that in catching at himself the flesh parted or slipped from his hands. From these injuries he died. This is a meager outline of the fire and its results, so far as they affect the present case. While the evidence attributing the origin of the fire to negligence of the company was attenuated, it may be assumed that, with its inferences, it was sufficient to preclude us, under the rule, from saying that there was not material evidence to support the verdict on this point. Assuming, therefore, that the jury were warranted in finding that the defendant company was guilty of such negligence, were they also warranted in finding that this negligence was the proximate cause of Palmer's fatal injuries? For there must be a concurrence of these essentials in order to maintain the present action.

It seems to be well settled that, where one person is exposed to peril of life or limb by the negligence of another, the latter will be liable in damages for injuries received by a third party in a reasonable effort to rescue the one so imperiled. Pennsylvania Co. v. Roney, 89 Ind. 453, 46 Am. Rep. 173; Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506, 30 Am. Rep. 692; Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 503, 3 Am. Rep. 721; Gibney v. State, 137 N. Y. 6, 19 L. R. A. 365, 33 N. E. 142. But even in such a case the rescuer must not rashly and unnecessarily expose himself to danger. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 28 N. E. 172. But whether the benefit of this rule is to be extended to one injured in an effort to save his own or another's property, exposed to danger by the wrongdoing or negligence of a third party, is a question that has provoked much difference of judicial opinion. Opposed to this extension are found the cases of Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 502, 3 Am. Rep. 721; Morris v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 148 N. Y. 186, 42 N. E. 579; Condiff v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 45 Kan. 260, 25 Pac. 502; Cook v. Johnston, 58 Mich. 437, 55 Am. Rep. 703, 25 N. W. 388, and Seale v. Gulf, O. & S. F. R. Co. 65 Tex. 274, 57 Am. Rep. 602. On the other hand, in Berg v. Great Northern R. Co. 70 Minn. 272, 73 N. W. 648; Liming v. Illinois O. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 248, 47 N. W. 66; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215, 32 N. E. 295; Reater v. Starin, 73 N. Y. 601, and Wamer v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 80 N. Y. 212, 36 Am. Rep. 608,—the rule has been extended so as to give the party injured redress where his effort to save property has been such as a reasonably prudent man would have made under similar circumstances.

In his charge to the jury the trial judge gave the administrator of the deceased the benefit of the rule as announced in Berg v. Great Northern R. Co. 70 Minn. 272, 73 N. W. 648, and the other like cases. We do not, however, feel called on to choose determinately between the divergent decisions on this point, and certainly we are not prepared to say the trial judge was in error. But granting that he laid down the law correctly, the question recurs, Was the injury received by Palmer, which resulted in his death, the proximate result of the negligence of the plaintiff in error? An examination of the cases will confirm the statement of Mr. Archibald Watson, of the New York bar, in his recent and very valuable work, entitled "Damages for Personal Injuries," that "no branch of the subject of personal injuries presents greater difficulty than the determination of liability for a specific loss, with reference to its naturalness and proximity as a consequence of the wrongful act complained of." So great has this uncertainty been felt, that many courts have reached the conclusion that, at last, "to a sound judgment must be left each particular case." Harrison v. Berkley, 1 Strobb. L. 547, 47 Am. Dec. 578. The same view was expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Troesdel, 7 Wall. 49, 19 L. ed. 65, in the following language: "We have had cited to us a general review of the doctrine of proximate and remote causes, as it has arisen and been decided in the courts in a great variety of cases. It would be an unprofitable labor to enter into an examination of these cases. If we could deduce from them the best possible expression of the rule, it would remain, after all, to decide each case largely upon the special facts belonging to it, and often upon the very nicest discrimination." While there is much of practical truth in these statements, and the most careful study of the best text-books and opinions of courts will fail to discover an infallible guide, yet it will be found that all agree on certain general formulas or rules, which, though difficult of application in some, are of value in all, cases involving this question of proximate or remote cause. In Deming v. Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Co. 90 Tenn. 353, 13 L. R. A. 518, 17 S. W. 89, this court said: "The proximate cause of an injury may, in general, be stated to be that act or omission which immediately causes or fails to prevent the injury; an act or omission occurring or concurring with another, which, had it not happened, the injury would not have been inflicted." This definition was approved in that case, and in the later cases of Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Zopf, 93 Tenn. 369, 24 S. W. 633; East Tennessee R. Co. v. Kelly, 91 Tenn. 699, 17 L. R. A. 691, 20 S. W. 312; and Anderson v. Miller, 96 Tenn. 35, 31 L. R. A. 604, 33 S. W. 615. In each of these cases, while the injury complained of was not the necessary effect of the particular act of negligence held to be the proximate cause, yet it was the natural result, and one which, in the face of human experience, might well have been anticipated as possible, if not probable. In all of them the principle recognized was that a wrongdoer is liable, not only for the injury which immediately results from his act, but for such consequential injuries as, according to the common experience of man, were likely to result. But the consequential injury, according to the authorities, must be natural, "following upon the original wrongful act, in the usual, ordinary, and experienced course of events." Wiley v. West Jersey R. Co. 44 N. J. L. 248; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256. But it is to be observed that the result will not be unnatural, so as to relieve the original wrongdoer of responsibility, because he did not foresee or contemplate the precise consequence of his misconduct. It will be sufficient to fix liability on him if the particular result is one naturally connected, either immediately or through a series of events, with the original wrongful act. Watson, Damages & Personal Injuries, § 145. On the other hand, where the result is such that no reasonable man would expect it to occur, and no knowledge is shown in the person doing the negligent or wrongful act that such a state of things exists as to make the damage probable, we think the rule is that the injury will not be regarded as actionable as against the wrongdoer. Sharp v. Powell, L. R. 7 C. P. 253. And especially should this be true where the injury results from an act committed by the injured party so obviously fraught with peril as should be sufficient to deter one of reasonable intelligence. In such a case it would seem impossible to find any ground upon which to maintain that the person guilty of the first act of negligence should be held liable to the party so injured, and the law, upon uncontroverted evidence showing such facts, without more, should relieve the original wrongdoer from liability. In such a case the intervening act of the party injured should be treated as the proximate cause of the injury. Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 85 Tex. 274, 57 Am. Rep. 602; Pike v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 39 Fed. 255. On this phase of the subject, Mr. Watson, in § 82 of the work already referred to, says: "It is not, it is believed, necessary to show that the plaintiff's intervening act, which may render the defendant's act the remote cause of the former's injuries, amounted to contributory negligence in law. Whether, in its character, the plaintiff's act is negligence or otherwise, it will, just as an intervening cause of any other nature, if unexpected, and of a character which could not have been contemplated or foreseen, and without which no injuries would have been occasioned, relieve of liability the author of the earlier act or omission complained of."

Now, in view of these general rules, which it would seem, are based on common fairness and right reason, where, upon the undisputed facts as disclosed in the record, rests the responsibility for the loss of young Palmer's life? Granting every inference indicating negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error which had to do with the origin of this fire, was the fatal injury sustained by him the natural or probable result therefrom? Could any reasonable man, though guilty of this negligence, have contemplated that one, from a place of safety, would go through flame and smoke to his mortal injury? Was such an act within the bounds of human experience? Or was there an unbroken connection between the negligent act and the injury? On the contrary, was not this intervening act of the deceased, however heroic it may have been,—one of extreme rashness, called for by no requirement of duty to his employer,—the proximate cause of his death? Was it not an intermediate, efficient cause, operating to disconnect the fatal consequence from the original act of negligence? While ordinarily the answers to those questions would naturally fall within the province of the jury, and, when made in their verdict, would be regarded as binding, yet, where the facts are fairly incontrovertible, the question of proximate or intervening cause is for the court. Holman v. Boston Land & Security Co. 8 Colo. App. 282, 45 Pac. 519; Stone v. Boston & A. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536, 41 L. R. A. 794, 51 N. E. 1; Bradley v. Ft. Wayne & B. R. Co. 94 Mich. 35, 53 N. W. 915; Butcher v. Hyde, 152 N. Y. 142, 46 N. E. 305.

Whatever may hereafter be developed, at least on the record as it now is, we think these questions must be answered, as a matter of law, against the contention of the plaintiff below, and that the judgment must be reversed because of a lack of evidence to support the verdict on this material point. The case is remanded for a new trial.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

TEXAS & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,
v.

Michael CARLIN.

(49 C. C. A. 605, 111 Fed. 777.)

1. An action for negligent injuries should not be withdrawn from the jury, unless the conclusion follows, as matter of law, that no recovery can be had upon any view that can be properly taken of the facts the evidence tends to establish.
2. Under statutes requiring employees to be in the same grade of employment to be fellow servants, a foreman in control of a bridge gang is not a fellow servant of a member of the gang.
3. A foreman of a bridge gang, whose duty is to see that the bridge is clear of obstructions upon the approach of trains, may be found negligent from the fact that a passing train struck a maul, where the surface of the bridge was plain, with nothing to cover or hide the maul.
4. The fact that the particular injury resulting from negligence was not to be anticipated will not defeat liability therefor if the negligence was such as to be likely to produce injury.
5. The negligence of a bridge foreman, whose duty it is to see that the bridge is free from obstructions on the approach of trains, in failing to see a maul left by a workman in such a way as to interfere with the passage of the train, and not that of the workman in so leaving it, is the proximate cause of an injury to a member of the bridge gang who is struck by the maul as it is hurled from the track by the train.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Pardee, McCormick, and Shelby, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. T. J. Freeman, F. B. Stanley, M. A. Spoonts, and George Thompson, for plaintiff in error:

Before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the burden of proof is imposed.

If an ordinarily prudent person ought to have foreseen that injury might likely result to any person by reason of the negligence of the foreman in not discovering the maul on the track, under the circumstances, the anticipation of any injury would be sufficient to constitute the leaving of the maul there, while a train was approaching, the probable cause of the injury done, and the proximate cause thereof.

Shelby, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for personal injuries, brought by Michael Carlin, plaintiff, against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, defendant. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a member of what is known as the "bridge gang," and, while at work near where a bridge was being repaired, a train approached with great speed, and as it ran over the bridge a spike maul or heavy iron hammer, weighing 6 or 8 pounds, with a handle attached to it, was caught by the train, and thrown against the plaintiff, injuring his leg so that it had to be amputated. The negligence of the company was charged in several ways, one being that the foreman of the bridge gang had failed to see and remove the maul from the bridge.

The defendant's answer contained a general denial, and a plea that, if there were negligence, it was that of a fellow servant of the plaintiff, for which the defendant was not liable, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The case was tried on these issues, and there was a verdict for the plaintiff for $6,000 damages, on which judgment was entered. A bill of exceptions was reserved by the defendant, and the case is brought here on writ of error.

The plaintiff in error contends that the trial court should have directed a verdict for the defendant. Several of the assignments of error are dependent on that contention, and they are discussed together in the arguments submitted.

In every jury trial there is a preliminary question for the court. The court must determine whether or not there is sufficient evidence upon which the jury could base a verdict for the plaintiff. If there is no evidence, or if it is such that, on a fair construction, it does not sustain the plaintiff's case, and that no fair inference to be drawn from it sustains it, the court should give the peremptory instruction. There is no good sense in permitting a verdict that it would be the duty of the court to set aside. But it is not the province of the court to weigh the evidence, and decide between conflicting statements of witnesses, or to decide what inference should be drawn from uncontradicted evidence, if different minds could fairly come to different conclusions from it. A question of negligence, dependent on evidence, should not be taken from the jury, except in cases where there is no material conflict, and where there is no room for different minds to draw different inferences from it. The question of negligence is one of law for the court, only when the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusions from them. A case should not be withdrawn from the jury unless the conclusion follows, as matter of law, that no recovery can be had upon any view that can be properly taken of the facts the evidence tends to establish.

The plaintiff, Carlin, was one of several members of a bridge gang. Welsh was the foreman in charge and control of the gang. The foreman and gang had gone to the bridge on the defendant's railway to repair it. Ed. Carver, one of the gang, used an iron maul or hammer about 10 inches long, weighing 6 or 8 pounds, to drive spikes in the bridge. It had a wooden handle about 3 feet long. Welsh, the foreman, directed the plaintiff to sharpen a saw. Pursuing their work under the direction of the foreman, all the men left the bridge. Welsh alone remained on the bridge. It was his duty to see that the bridge was kept free from obstructions, so that trains could safely pass. Where Carver laid the maul when he left the bridge is not shown by direct evidence. Ten or fifteen minutes after he was using the maul, a train approached rapidly, and crossed the bridge. Welsh says he looked on the bridge, and saw no obstruction; that he did not see the maul. He stepped out of the way of the passing train. As the train passed, the plaintiff, who was more than 20 feet from the track, was seen to fall. His leg was broken so as to require amputation. Lying near him was the iron maul, with the handle freshly broken. The conclusion is irresistible that the cars in passing had struck the maul, breaking the handle, and hurling it against him.

One of the averments of negligence in the petition is that the company was negligent, in that Welsh, the foreman of the bridge gang, failed to see that the bridge was clear of obstructions, and in failing to detect the maul on the bridge, and in leaving it there to obstruct the bridge.

In the absence of a controlling statute, it may be conceded that Welsh, the foreman, and the plaintiff, a member of the bridge gang, would have been fellow servants, and Carlin would have had no cause of action against the company. McDonald v. Buckley, 48 C. C. A. 372, 109 Fed. 290; New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 44 L. ed. 181, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85. But there are statutes in Texas applicable to the case. By these statutes, in a case like this, a servant or employee, who has the authority to direct any other employee in the performance of any duty of such employee, is a vice principal, and not a fellow servant. By the express terms of the statute, employees are not considered fellow servants unless they "are in the same grade of employment, and are doing the same character of work or service, and are working together at the same time and place and at the same piece of work and to a common purpose." Sayles's Anno. Civ. Stat. (Tex.) 1897, arts. 4560f-4560h. The statutes are printed in the margin.*

It is clear on the proof that Welsh was in control and command of the plaintiff, and that they were not in the same grade of employment, nor at the time of the accident were they doing the same character of work or service. Under the Texas statute, according to its letter, or as construed by the Texas supreme court, they were not fellow servants. Long v. Chicago, R. I. & T. R. Co. 94 Tex. 53, 57 S. W. 802; Nix v. Texas P. R. Co. 82 Tex. 473, 18 S. W. 571. We must be controlled by these statutes and their construction by the Texas supreme court. U.

S. Rev. Stat. § 721; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914. It follows that the company would be responsible to the plaintiff if he received the injuries from the negligence of Welsh.

The contention for the peremptory charge must be and is based on the idea that there is no proof of negligence on the part of Welsh. There is no conflict in the evidence that it was Welsh's duty to see that the bridge was not obstructed. He says he looked, and saw no obstruction. It is claimed that there is no evidence as to the location of the maul when the train reached the bridge; that there is no proof that it was in sight; that, if Carver had placed it where Welsh could not have seen it, it was not negligence in Welsh to fail to see and remove it. Negligence, like any other fact, may be proved by circumstantial evidence. The indisputable fact that the cars struck the maul, and hurled it so that it struck the plaintiff, shows that the maul lay where the cars could strike it. Welsh was alone on the bridge as the train approached. It was proved that the surface of the bridge was plain,—made with the cross-ties about 18 inches apart, on which were the rails and the guard rails, with nothing on them or near them to cover or hide the maul. When the evidence shows that the cars struck the maul on the bridge so constructed, is not that a fact from which the jury might infer that it was lying in plain view, near the rail? If such inference be not unreasonable, the question was one for the jury.

We cannot adopt the suggestion or intimation that in cases like this, owing to the alleged inclination of juries to find against corporations, we should assume that the jury has been influenced otherwise than by a consideration of the evidence. To adopt the expression of a distinguished judge: "We see no reason, so long as the jury system is the law of the land, and the jury is made the tribunal to decide disputed questions of fact, why it should not decide such questions as these, as well as others." Jones v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 128 U. S. 443, 32 L. ed. 478, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118.

It must be conceded that the injury for which the action is brought occurred in an extraordinary and unusual manner. Just such an occurrence was not to be anticipated. The defendant requested the trial judge to instruct the jury that, although they may find that the foreman failed to discover the maul, "yet, if you believe from the evidence that the result which followed from his failure to discover it was not such result as ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances, then, in such event, the failure of the foreman to discover the proximity of the hammer would not be such negligence as would make the defendant liable, and you must find for the defendant." The court did not err in refusing to adopt this view of the case. It may be true that the accident in its extraordinary form, with its peculiar circumstances, could not have been expected to happen from the maul being left on the bridge near the rail, yet the act of permitting it to remain there was none the less negligent, for it threatened danger in many directions. It was liable to produce familiar results, which would cause serious injury. The fact that it happened to cause the injury in a manner so unusual that it was not to be expected cannot prevent the act from being negligent when it was likely to cause injury in a way that might be foreseen. It may be true that the negligence in this case produced an effect not before observed, the circumstances of which could not have been anticipated. But, if it was negligence likely to produce other and familiar injuries, the peculiarity of the accident does not prevent liability. Doyle v. Chicago, St. P. & K. O. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 607, 4 L. R. A. 420, 42 N. W. 555. The extraordinary circumstances attending the injury cannot serve as a defense. To so hold would be to say that a plaintiff must show similar injuries to have occurred in the same manner before he could recover. And it would lead to the anomalous result that for the first, and perhaps the second, injury occurring in such manner there could be no recovery; but for the third, or when the circumstances ceased to be peculiar or became familiar, the defendant would be liable.

It is contended that, if Ed. Carver left the maul close to the rail or track, this act of Carver's was the direct or proximate cause of the injury. It is true that, if the maul had not been placed near the rail, Carlin would not have been injured. But we do not think that this act of Carver's, conceding it to be proved, constituted the proximate cause of the injury. When he finished driving the spikes with the maul he would be expected to lay it down. The tools of the workmen, and the material in use to repair the bridge, could only be rightfully on the bridge and on the track when no train was to pass. Sometimes they would necessarily be left for a short time on the bridge. They could be there without negligence on some occasions. It would, of course, be negligence to leave them on the track for a train to run over them. The fact that they were so placed on the track, the men negligently leaving them there, could not make it the less negligent for the foreman to fail to perform his duty to remove them or cause them to be removed. To illustrate: The gang might remove a defective rail on a bridge to put in a new one. If the foreman failed to put out a flag, or to use or cause to be used other means to stop the train coming on the bridge while the rail was off,—that being his duty,—and an accident occurred, it could not be said that the act of the gang in removing the rail was the proximate cause of the accident. The proximate cause of the accident would be the failure of the foreman to stop the train. Placing the maul on the bridge may have been an innocent act connected with its use. It may be conceded that Carver was negligent to leave it here. The fact, not disputed in evidence, that the duty was imposed on the foreman to see that the bridge was kept free from obstructions, shows that it was deemed unsafe by the company to rely alone on the men to voluntarily keep it free. Conceding the negligence of Carver, could that excuse or relieve Welsh from the performance of his duty? He was left alone on the bridge, and, as the proof tends to show, near the maul, when the train was approaching. He had time to remove it. If he negligently failed to see it, or, seeing it, failed to remove it, that was the negligence constituting the proximate cause of the accident. The preceding act of Carver could not relieve the company of its responsibility for Welsh's failure to perform his duty.

We have carefully examined all the assignments of error, and find no reversible error in the case. The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

Fines Brock, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Texas.

(.....Tex. Crim. App.....)

1. Refusal of a continuance of a prosecution

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that bigamy is not a personal wrong within the meaning of the statute allowing testimony of a 60 L. R. A.

cution for statutory rape upon a person under fifteen years of age, to enable defendant to procure the attendance of a witness who would testify that he knew that prosecutrix was born more than fifteen years before the commission of the alleged offense, is ground for new trial in case of conviction.

2. Testimony discovered after a conviction husband or wife against the other in case of personal wrong or injury, see People v. Quantstrom (Mich.) 17 L. R. A. 723.

viction of statutory rape upon a female under fifteen years of age, that the mother of prosecutrix bore a female child a little more than fifteen years before the commission of the alleged offense, which may have been the prosecutrix, will warrant a new trial.

3. A husband cannot waive the provisions of a statute that his wife shall in no case testify against him in a criminal prosecution except for an offense committed against her.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Tom Green County convicting him of rape. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. E. Dubois and Allen & Upton, for appellant:

The court erred in overruling defendant's application for continuance.

Dinkens v. State, 42 Tex. 250; Williams v. State, 10 Tex. App. 532; Peeler v. State, 2 Tex. App. 455.

A new trial should have been granted because of newly discovered testimony.

Thomason v. State, 2 Tex. App. 550; West v. State, 2 Tex. App. 209; Lindley v. State, 11 Tex. App. 283; Jackson v. State, 18 Tex. App. 596; Estrada v. State, 29 Tex. App. 169, 15 S. W. 644.

Mr. James O. Wiley also for appellant.
Mr. Robert A. John for appellee.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment is for rape,—the first count charging rape upon Hattie Meads, a girl under fifteen years of age; and the second count, rape upon the same girl by force, threats, and fraud. Both counts were submitted to the jury, and a verdict of guilty was returned, assessing the death penalty. The offense occurred May 28, 1902.

The absent witness Elliott was expected to testify that he knew the age of the prosecutrix; that the date of her birth was the 25th of April, 1887 (the alleged rape having occurred the latter part of May, 1902); that he was living in San Angelo, where Meads and his wife were married, during the years 1886 and 1887, and neighbor to the mother of the prosecutrix, when prosecutrix was born; that the mother's maiden name was Corintha Bell Stewart; that she married Gid Meads, father of prosecutrix, on June 14, 1886; that during the years 1886 and 1887 Gid Meads and his wife were neighbors to witness and his family; that their families visited, and witness knows all the above facts to be true. This application for continuance was refused. Attached to the motion for new trial is the affidavit of Mrs. A. J. Potter and her son Sid. Sid Potter states in his affidavit that his age is twenty-six years in September of this year; that he knew all the parties to this transaction, and knows the mother of prosecutrix gave birth to a girl child after her marriage, prior to May, 1887,—in other words, fixes the date of the birth of the child more than a 60 L. R. A.

month prior to the 28th of May, 1887. Mrs. A. J. Potter states in her affidavit that she now lives and has resided in the town of San Angelo for twenty years, continuously, and was living in the town during the years 1886 and 1887; that she was well acquainted with Corintha Bell Brock, mother of prosecutrix; that her maiden name was Stewart; that she was well acquainted with her former husband, Gid Meads, father of prosecutrix, and remembers the circumstances of the marriage of Mrs. Brock with Gid Meads; that they were married in 1886 by the Reverend A. J. Potter, affiant's husband; that immediately after the marriage Mr. and Mrs. Meads moved into the "same block" in which affiant then lived, at the rear of affiant's lot, and lived there the remainder of the year 1886 and the year 1887, during which time affiant was a constant visitor of the Meads family; that some time during the spring of 1887 Mrs. Meads gave birth to a female child; that this particular child was born in about ten or eleven months after the marriage of the mother to said Gid Meads; that affiant was at the residence of Mrs. Meads shortly after the birth of the child, and knows it was a female child, and, if called upon, would testify to the above facts. This is alleged to be newly discovered testimony, and is brought strictly within the rules authorizing a new trial upon such testimony. If the testimony of Elliott or the testimony of Mrs. Potter and her son is true, or would raise a reasonable doubt as to the age of the girl in the minds of the jury, then it was most material. A new trial should have been awarded upon both grounds.

The wife of appellant was used as a witness by the state, and gave evidence of a most damaging character against him. She was required to hold up before the jury the family quarrels, the family disturbances, and alleged assaults upon her by appellant, as evidence against him. This testimony showed him to be of a cruel disposition. In fact, it shows a life of turmoil and trouble, and assaults and threats by the husband against the wife and the prosecutrix, continuing for some time prior to the alleged rape. The question of her competency was not raised in the trial court, but for the first time is questioned on appeal. The proposition being that, under our statute, the wife is not a competent witness against the husband in a criminal proceeding of this character, with or without his consent; that neither spouse can consent to the other's testifying against him in a criminal case, except where it is an offense of one against the other. So far as we are aware, for the first time this question has been presented to this court for adjudication. In Daffin v. State, 11 Tex. App. 76, while not discussed, it was held that objection to an illegal cross-examination of the wife came too late after trial. In Dill v. State, 1 Tex. App. 278, there is an intimation that the wife would not be permitted to testify against appellant under any circumstances unless it was an offense by her husband against her. In this particular case she not only testified to various violations of law not involved in the rape case, as well as the alleged rape, but also confidential communications and matters of that character. Code Crim. Proc. art. 774, provides that "neither husband nor wife shall in any case testify as to communications made by one to the other while married; nor shall they after the marriage relation ceases be made witnesses as to any such communication made while the marriage relation subsists, except in a case where one or the other is prosecuted for an offense and a declaration or communication made by the wife to the husband or by the husband to the wife goes to extenuate or justify an offense for which either is on trial." Code Crim. Proc. art. 775, further provides: "The husband and wife may in all criminal actions be witnesses for each other, but they shall in no case testify against each other except in a criminal prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other." The question as to whether or not this is a question of privilege, subject to waiver by the parties, or can be waived by consent of the parties, has been a matter of some discussion in the courts. In New York it was held that it could be waived, but that statute is totally unlike the Texas statute, and its language is peculiar. It provides the husband or wife of the person indicted or accused of a crime is in all cases a competent witness on the examination or trial of such person, but neither husband nor wife can be compelled to disclose a confidential communication made by one to the other during their marital relation. N. Y. Penal Code, § 715. That was the article the New York court construed in the cited cases. It would seem that in England the rule is not satisfactorily settled, but, as we understand the weight of the authorities there, the husband or wife cannot consent to the other testifying against him, and various reasons are assigned why this is true. Practically, the authorities there, as well as in the United States, have agreed that the best reason for the rule is based on public policy. Courts have been driven or have resorted to reasoning why statutory rules are prescribed. What actuated the legislative body in creating certain enactments may be satisfactory to a court to understand; but, whatever the reason for rules of this character may be, if the wording is plain it is totally unnecessary to seek out reasons. It is sufficient for the court, where the language is plain, to adhere to the language employed. Usually a party upon trial may waive such matters as are usually termed "rights," but it may be stated accurately that such matters as he may waive are those that are usually known as "privileged,"—as the relation, for instance, between attorney and client. If his rights alone were the issue, it might be, perhaps, held that they could be waived; but where the policy of the law enters into it, and goes beyond this, or where the statute places it beyond the question of privilege of the accused, and makes the inhibition a matter of public policy, it is to be seriously questioned that the court would be justified in holding such matters could be waived. In this particular character of case the spouse upon the stand has a right to be protected, under the statute, from being required to answer; the other spouse, being upon the trial, has a right to be protected; and society has an overshadowing right that family matters should not be dragged into the courts of the country, to the subversion of the family relation, which is the paramount substratum and basic principle of society. In Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. 209, 10 L. ed. 129, the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice McLean, said: "The rule which protects an attorney in such a case is founded on public policy, and may be essential in the administration of justice. But this privilege is the privilege of the client, and not of the attorney. The rule which protects the domestic relations from exposure rests upon considerations connected with the peace of families. And it is conceived that this principle does not merely afford protection to the husband and wife, which they are at liberty to invoke or not, at their discretion, when the question is propounded; but it renders them incompetent to disclose facts in evidence in violation of the rule. And it is well that the principle does not rest on the discretion of the parties. If it did, in most instances it would afford no substantial protection to persons uninstructed in their rights, and thrown off their guard and embarrassed by searching interrogatories. In the present case the witness was called to discredit her husband; to prove, in fact, that he had committed perjury; and the establishment of the fact depended on his own confessions,—confessions which, if ever made, were made under all the confidence that subsists between husband and wife. It is true, the husband was dead, but this does not weaken the principle. Indeed, it would seem rather to increase than lessen the force of the rule. Can the wife, under such circumstances, either voluntarily be permitted, or by force of authority be compelled, to state facts in evidence which render infamous the character of her husband? We think, most clearly, that she cannot be. Public policy and established principles forbid it. This rule is founded upon the deepest and soundest principles of our nature,—principles which have grown out of those domestic relations that constitute the basis of civil society, and which are essential to the enjoyment of that confidence which should subsist between those who are connected by the nearest and dearest relations of life. To break down or impair the great principles which protect the sanctities of husband and wife would be to destroy the best solace of human existence." In a late case by the same august tribunal the case of Stein v. Bowman was cited with approval. See Bassett v. United States, 137 U. S. 496, 34 L. ed. 762, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165. This opinion was delivered by Justice Brewer, and the question was whether or not one of the polygamous wives could be heard to testify against her husband. The Supreme Court held her incompetent. This language is found in the opinion: "Is polygamy such a crime against the wife? That it is no wrong upon her person is conceded; and the common-law exception to the silence upon the lips of husband and wife was only broken, as we have noticed, in cases of assault of one upon the other. That it is humiliation and outrage to her is evident. If that is the test, what limit is imposed? Is the wife not humiliated, is not her respect and love for her husband outraged and betrayed, when he forgets his integrity as a man, and violates any human or Divine enactment? Is she less sensitive, is she less humiliated, when he commits murder or robbery or forgery, than when he commits polygamy or adultery? A true wife feels keenly any wrong of her husband, and her loyalty and reverence are wounded and humiliated by such conduct. But the question presented by this statute is not how much she feels or suffers, but whether the crime is one against her. Polygamy and adultery may be crimes which involve disloyalty to the marital relation, but they are rather crimes against such relation than against the wife; and, as the statute speaks of crimes against her, it is simply an affirmation of the old, familiar, and just common-law rule. We conclude, therefore, that under this statute the wife was an incompetent witness as against her husband." It has been held in this state that the statute has not changed the common-law rule. If that be true, then the two cited decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States are in point. It occurs to us that the common-law rule is rather broadened and emphasized, than weakened, by our statute. This line of reasoning finds support in many of the text-writers. See 3 Rice, Ev. p. 282. There this language is found: "And it is well that the principle does not rest on the discretion of the parties. If it did, in most instances it would afford no substantial protection to persons uninstructed in their rights, and thrown off their guard and embarrassed by searching interrogatories." See 3 Jones, Ev. § 757, and authorities cited in note 6; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 340; Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 T. R. 678; [Sedgwick v. Walkins] 1 Ves. Jr. 49. The only English authority which has been called to our attention, laying down a contrary doctrine, is Pedley v. Wellesley, 3 Car. & P. 558. That case does not enter into a discussion of the question, or state any reason for the holding; nor does it state whether it is under the common law, or the act of Parliament, which seems to have abridged the common law in regard to this rule. Without further discussion of the question, we are of opinion that it was error, though no exception was reserved, to use the wife as a witness against appellant. In other words, under the statute she is an incompetent witness, whose evidence cannot be used even by the consent of the husband, and she can only be used when placed on the stand by her husband, except where the offense is against her personally. Offenses against the daughter are not offenses against the wife.

For the errors discussed, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Utah, Resp't.,

v.

Henry SOPHER, Appt.

(.....Utah.....)

1. Forbidding a barber to exercise his trade on Sunday is a proper exercise of the police power, and does not unconstitutionally restrain him of personal liberty, or deprive him of liberty or property without due process of law.
2. It is not an act of necessity to keep open a barber shop on Sunday for the transaction of business.
3. Forbidding the keeping open of a barber shop on Sunday, while permitting hotels, boarding houses, baths, restaurants, taverns, livery stables, and retail drug stores to be open, is not unconstitutional as depriving barbers of the equal protection of the laws, since the classification is not arbitrary.

(February 4, 1903.)

NOTE.—For work of barber as work of necessity within meaning of Sunday law, see also, in this series, Com. v. Waldman (Pa.) 11 L. R. A. 563, and Ex parte Kennedy (Tex. Crim. App.) 51 L. R. A. 270.

As to constitutionality of statute prohibiting 60 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County convicting him of keeping his place of business open on Sunday, contrary to the provisions of the statute. Affirmed.

Statement by Hart, District Judge:

Defendant is charged with the offense of keeping open a place of business on Sunday. It is alleged that he did "wilfully and unlawfully conduct and operate a barber shop and keep the same open, and did then and there unlawfully conduct a general barber business therein." Defendant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and he was found guilty in the justice's court, and also in the district court, and fined in each court the sum of $15.

From the agreed facts it appears that defendant is a barber by occupation, and that on Sunday, June 16, 1901, he was in a barber shop in Salt Lake City, Utah, following his vocation as barber; that one J. H.

the business of a barber on Sunday, see also, in this series, People v. Bellet (Mich.) 22 L. R. A. 696; People v. Havnor (N. Y.) 31 L. R. A. 689; Eden v. People (Ill.) 32 L. R. A. 659; and Ex parte Jentsch (Cal.) 32 L. R. A. 664.

Rothwell (who was a member of the Barbers' Union, which union was against Sunday labor), the complaining witness, came into said barber shop, entering by the side door of the shop, and asked to be shaved; that defendant shaved the said Rothwell, who paid said defendant on said day the sum of 25 cents; that said barber shop was connected with the Albany hotel, in said city; and that the evidence fails to show that anyone else was shaved by defendant on said day. Defendant's motion in arrest of judgment and motion for new trial were overruled, and defendant appeals to this court, contending that the law under which this prosecution was conducted (Rev. Stat. 1898, §§ 4234, 4235) is unconstitutional and void for the following reasons: (1) As being an undue restraint of personal liberty, and deprives a person of life, liberty, and property without due process of law; (2) it is special legislation, based upon an arbitrary classification; (3) the act complained of was an act of necessity, which is allowed to be performed on Sunday; (4) it is not a proper exercise of the police power of the state.

Section 4234 prohibits, in general, the keeping open on Sunday of any place of business for the purpose of transacting business therein, while § 4235 excepts from the preceding section hotels, boarding houses, baths, restaurants, taverns, livery stables, or retail drug stores, for the legitimate business of each, or such manufacturing establishments as are usually kept in constant operation. The appellant does not contend that § 4234 would be unconstitutional if it stood alone, but that it is rendered so by the exceptions of the section which follows.

Messrs. Richard B. Shepard and Harrison O. Shepard, for appellant:

The act is an undue restraint of personal liberty, and deprives a person of life, liberty, and property without due process of law.

liams, 1 Pearson (Pa.) 61; Petit v. Minnesota, 177 U. S. 164, 44 L. ed. 716, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 666.

Hart, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

General laws prohibiting the transaction of business on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, are so uniformly upheld by the courts as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state that it is unnecessary to cite or discuss authority in support thereof. It is only upon special statutes, or special exceptions to general so-called Sunday laws, that the constitutionality of such enactments is seriously called in question. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 530.

In Cooley, Const. Lim. 734, the author says on Sunday laws: "There can no longer be any question, if there ever was, that such laws may be supported as regulations of police." The dissenting opinion of Judge Field in Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 518, which afterwards became the opinion of the court (Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 678; Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6, 43 Am. Rep. 231; and Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 177), and which has been extensively quoted and followed by other courts, clearly and forcibly explains the grounds upon which such laws safely rest. At page 520 of his opinion, in defense of a Sunday law, it is said: "In its enactment the legislature has given the sanction of law to a rule of conduct which the entire civilized world recognizes as essential to the physical and moral well-being of society. Upon no subject is there such a concurrence of opinion, among philosophers, moralists, and statesmen of all nations, as on the necessity of periodical cessations from labor. One day in seven is the rule, founded in experience and sustained by science. There is no nation, possessing any degree of civilization, where the rule is not observed, either from the sanctions of the law or the sanctions of religion. This fact has not escaped the observation of men of science, and distinguished philosophers have not hesitated to pronounce the rule founded upon a law of our race." And again: "Labor is in a great degree dependent upon capital, and, unless the exercise of the power which capital affords is restrained, those who are obliged to labor will not possess the freedom for rest which they would otherwise exercise. . . . The law steps in to restrain the power of capital. Its object is not to protect those who can rest at their pleasure, but to afford rest to those who need it, and who, from the conditions of society, could not otherwise obtain it. Its aim is to prevent the physical and moral debility which springs from uninterrupted labor, and in this aspect it is a beneficent and merciful law." The same authority quotes with approval the following from the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Specht v. Com. 8 Pa. 312, 49 Am. Dec. 518): "All agree that to the well-being of society periods of rest are absolutely necessary. To be productive of the required advantage, these periods must recur at stated intervals, so that the mass of which the community is composed may enjoy a respite from labor at the same time. They may be established by common consent, or, as is conceded, the legislative power of the state may, without impropriety, interfere to fix the time of their stated return, and enforce obedience to the direction. When this happens some one day must be selected, and it has been said the round of the week presents none which, being preferred, might not be regarded as favoring some one of the numerous religious sects into which mankind are divided. In a Christian community, where a very large majority of the people celebrate the first day of the week as their chosen period of rest from labor, it is not surprising that that day should have received the legislative sanction. . . . It is still, essentially, but a civil regulation, made for the government of man as a member of society."

The necessity for Sunday laws is stated by Mr. Tiedeman as follows: "If the law did not interfere, the feverish, intense desire to acquire wealth, so thoroughly a characteristic of the American nation, . . . would ultimately prevent, not only the wage-earner, but likewise the capitalists and employers themselves, from yielding to the warnings of nature, and obeying the instinct of self-preservation, by resting periodically from labor, even if the mad pursuit of wealth should not warp their judgment and destroy this instinct. Remove the prohibition of law, and this wholesome sanitary regulation would cease to be observed." Tiedeman, Pol. Power, 181.

It is true there are some cases holding unconstitutional, for various reasons, special Sunday laws directed against some particular vocation, such as barbering; but the decisions upon such statutes are not uniform. For instance, California, while strongly upholding a general law prohibiting the transaction of general business on Sunday (Ex parte Andrews, 18 Cal. 678; Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6, 43 Am. Rep. 231; and Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 177), has held unconstitutional a law directed against the open barber shop on Sunday. Ex parte Jentsch, 112 Cal. 468, 32 L. R. A. 664, 44 Pac. 803. This case is also followed in Tacoma v. Krech, 15 Wash. 296, 34 L. R. A. 68, 46 Pac. 255, involving the validity of an ordinance of the plaintiff city prohibiting barbering on Sunday "while other laboring people in different characters of employment are allowed to prosecute their work."

Illinois and Missouri have each held a special law against Sunday barbering to be unconstitutional, there being at the time in Illinois a general law making unlawful "whoever disturbs the peace and good order of society by labor (works of necessity and charity excepted)," and in Missouri a general law broad enough to include barbering, and also a constitutional provision enacting that "where a general law can be made applicable no local or special law shall be enacted." Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 296, 32 L. R. A. 659, 43 N. E. 1108; State v. Granneman, 132 Mo. 326, 33 S. W. 784. It may be noted in this connection that Illinois has held invalid a statute enacting that no female shall be employed in any factory or workshop more than eight hours in any one day, or forty-eight hours in any one week (Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 101, 29 L. R. A. 79, 40 N. E. 454), in marked contrast to the decision of this court in sustaining an eight-hour law (State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 71, sub nom. Holden v. Hardy, 37 L. R. A. 103, 46 Pac. 756, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383). Again, the general Sunday law of Illinois, above referred to, was so construed as to permit other business of a general nature to be transacted on the Sabbath. And so it was forcibly argued in the Eden Case that "if the merchant, the grocer, the butcher, the druggist, and . . . other trades and callings, are allowed to open their places of business and carry on their respective vocations during seven days of the week, upon what principle can it be held that a person who may be engaged in the business of barbering may not do the same thing?" The case of Ragio v. State, 86 Tenn. 272, 6 S. W. 401, cited by appellant, cannot be considered as lending much support to this contention, as the law passed upon in that case was so framed as to permit a hotel keeper, or anyone else except a barber, to keep open a bathroom on Sunday. Besides, the act legislated upon two subjects, contrary to the state Constitution.

But special laws directed exclusively against Sunday barbering and other vocations, and other Sunday laws with broader exceptions than in our own statute, have been strongly upheld by the greater number of the states and by the Supreme Court of the United States. Thus, the case of People v. Huvnor, 149 N. Y. 195, 31 L. R. A. 689, 43 N. E. 541, goes to the extreme of sustaining a law against Sunday barbering, with an exception in favor of barbering in the city of New York and the village of Saratoga Springs until the hour of 1 o'clock on Sunday afternoon. The decision collects many cases upholding laws which to some extent interfere with property and liberty, and the limitation is held to be "that the real object of the statute must appear upon inspection to have a reasonable connection with the welfare of the public," and the conclusion is reached that, "when thus exercised, even if the effect is to interfere to some extent with the use of property or the prosecution of a lawful pursuit, it is not regarded as an appropriation of property or an encroachment upon liberty, because the preservation of order and the promotion of the general welfare, so essential to organized society, of necessity involve some sacrifice of natural rights." In the same case it is said: "According to the common judgment of civilized men, public economy requires, for sanitary reasons, a day of general rest from labor, and the day naturally selected is that regarded as sacred by the greatest number of citizens, as this causes the least inconvenience through interference with business."

Michigan also holds valid a special law against Sunday barbering, with an exception in favor of those who observe the seventh day of the week as a day of rest. People v. Bellet, 99 Mich. 151, 22 L. R. A. 696, 57 N. W. 1094.

The ordinance approved in Lieberman v. State, 26 Neb. 464, 42 N. W. 419, excepts many more vocations from the general prohibition of Sunday labor than does our Utah statute. Bathrooms, under that ordinance, may be kept open on Sunday until 12 o'clock noon.

That Sunday labor is constitutionally punishable under general and special Sunday laws, see State v. Nesbit, 8 Kan. App. 104, 54 Pac. 326; Com. v. Deatra, 143 Mass. 28, 8 N. E. 756; Com. v. Waldman, 140 Pa. 59, 11 L. R. A. 563, 21 Atl. 248; State v. Frederick, 45 Ark. 347, 55 Am. Rep. 555; Breyer v. State, 102 Tenn. 103, 50 S. W. 769.

The Minnesota statute prohibits on Sunday all labor except works of necessity or charity, and declares that keeping open a barber shop shall not be deemed a work of necessity or charity. The law is held to be constitutional in the case of State v. Petit, 74 Minn. 376, 77 N. W. 225, confirmed in 177 U. S. 164, 44 L. ed. 716, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 666. In the latter case the Supreme Court of the United States quoted with approval the following language from the Minnesota decision: "Courts will take judicial notice of the fact that, in view of the custom to keep barbers' shops open in the evening as well as in the day, the employees in them work more, and during later hours, than those engaged in most other occupations, and that this is especially true on Saturday afternoons and evenings; also that, owing to the habit of so many men to postpone getting shaved until Sunday, if such shops were permitted to be kept open on Sunday the employees would ordinarily be deprived of rest during half that day. In view of all these facts, we cannot say that the legislature has exceeded the limits of its legislative police power in declaring that, as a matter of law, keeping barbers' shops open on Sunday is not a work of necessity or charity, while as to all other kinds of labor they have left that question to be determined as one of fact."

In State v. Powell, 58 Ohio St. 324, 41 L. R. A. 854, 50 N. E. 900, the court, in upholding a Sunday law as against baseball playing, remarked: "Liberty, as understood in this country, is not license, but liberty regulated by law. The personal liberty of every man is subject to such reasonable regulations as in the wisdom of the legislature are regarded as necessary to promote, not only the peace and good order of society, but its well-being."

Likewise, in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, involving the validity of an ordinance of San Francisco prohibiting the carrying on of public laundries and washhouses within certain prescribed limits of that city, Judge Field, for the court, said: "But neither the amendment [14th], broad and comprehensive as it is,—nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity. . . . Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited; but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment."

And in Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730, involving a similar ordinance, the same judge said, in addition to the language quoted in State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 71, sub nom. Holden v. Hardy, 37 L. R. A. 103, 46 Pac. 756: "All sorts of restrictions are imposed upon the actions of men, notwithstanding the liberty which is guaranteed to each. It is liberty regulated by just and impartial laws. . . . How many hours shall constitute a day's work in the absence of contract, at what time shops in our cities shall close at night, are constant subjects of legislation. Laws setting aside Sunday as a day of rest are upheld, not from any right of the government to legislate for the promotion of religious observances, but from its right to protect all persons from the physical and moral debasement which comes from uninterrupted labor."

Many other authorities bearing on the questions raised in the case at bar are cited and reviewed in the decisions herein referred to. In view of the consideration and discussion of similar questions in State v. Holden, 14 Utah, 71, sub nom. Holden v. Hardy, 37 L. R. A. 103, 46 Pac. 756; we do not deem it necessary to more particularly consider the objections of appellant that the law in question is an undue restraint of personal liberty, and deprives a person of liberty, life, or property without due process of law, or that the same is not a proper exercise of the police power of the state. Upon the authority of that opinion, and of the cases therein and herein referred to, we are prepared to hold that said sections of our Code, taken together, are not unconstitutional upon the foregoing grounds, nor for any other reason assigned.

Whether the question be considered one of law or a conclusion of fact, we are of opinion that the act complained of was not an act of necessity. While shaving may be regarded as an act of personal cleanliness, desirable to be performed upon the first day as well as upon other days of the week, still the statute does not prohibit a man from shaving himself or from being shaved by his servant or valet. The statute is directed simply against the keeping open of a shop or place of business for the purpose of transacting business therein upon Sunday.

Neither can the court say that the classification of the statute is arbitrary. The exception permitting baths to be kept open on Sunday approaches nearest to the act here complained of; but the court is unable to say that there is such similarity between keeping open a bathhouse and a barber shop that it was not within the province of the legislature to make a distinction between the two. Upon reflection, many points of difference in the manner in which each is conducted in this community are readily suggested. The court may not rightly assert a wisdom it would deny to the co-ordinate branch of government (the legislature), and interfere with the discretion of that department of government. All presumptions are in favor of the validity of a statute, and, unless the courts can clearly say that the legislature has erred, the act should stand, and the prerogatives of the legislature not be encroached upon. Courts may interpret, construe, declare, and apply the law, but may not usurp the functions of the lawmaking power by assuming to interfere with or control the legislative discretion. We cannot say that the law in question is not adapted in a reasonable degree to promote the health, comfort, safety, or well-being of society.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the lower court be affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Hoge M. BROWN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Va.....)

1. The publication, after due investigation by a railroad company, that the reason for discharging an employee was that he had made statements which had been proved to be untrue, to the effect that one officer of the company had cast reflections upon the female ancestry of another officer, is privileged, and will not sustain an action for libel unless it was inspired by malice.

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to privileged character of statements by employer in regard to discharged employee, see Missouri P. R. Co. v. Richmond (Tex.) 4 L. R. A. 280; Fresh v. Cutter (Md.) 10 L. R. A. 67; 60 L. R. A.

2. The burden of proving the fact is upon one alleging that another availed himself of the opportunity to publish a communication of a privileged class, not to protect his interests, but to gratify ill-will against plaintiff.
3. The presumption that a publication of the reason of the discharge of an employee was made in good faith must prevail, where it was made after investigation, and embodied the result of the inquiry in accordance with the weight of evidence, if clothed in temperate and decorous language, and there is no extrinsic fact or circumstance having a tendency to show malice.

(November 20, 1902.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Pulaski County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wysor & Gardner and D. S. Pollock, for plaintiff in error:

The publication in connection with the facts and circumstances shows actual malice. Proceedings against Brown were all ex parte, and it was absolutely, unqualifiedly, and intentionally false to say what he had said had been proved untrue.

It was error for the circuit court of Pulaski county to hold that the said publication, under the facts and circumstances of this case, was privileged.

Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 116, 1 S. E. 803; Wilson v. Collins, 5 Car. & P. 373; Odgers, Libel & Slander, 225, 245, 280; Sullivan v. Strathan-Hutton-Evans Commission Co. 152 Mo. 268, 47 L. R. A. 859, 53 S. W. 912.

The publication is not protected, though the defendant may have honestly believed that in all he did he was discharging his duty. The occasion is to be judged, not in accordance with what may be the honest notions as to duty of the defendant in the premises, but upon all the surrounding circumstances.

Chaffin v. Lynch, 84 Va. 890, 6 S. E. 474.

The publication, if it had been made by Henretta, in an action brought against him for libel, could have been held to be a privileged publication made in self-defense if made bona fide and without malice, and he would have had the right to have claimed the privilege; but the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, not having been assailed in its good name, and not being the guardian of the good name of its employees, cannot be allowed in law to claim that the publication made by it in this case was privileged.

Brayton v. Cleveland Special Police Co. 63 Ohio St. 83, 52 L. R. A. 525, 57 N. E. 1085.

The question whether the occasion was used in a privileged way,—that is to say, that it was used bona fide and without malice,—was properly left to the consideration of the jury. After the jury had found against the defendant upon this issue, and brought in its verdict in favor of plaintiff, it was error for the court to sustain the demurrer of defendant to the evidence.

Trout v. Virginia & T. R. Co. 23 Gratt. 638; Simons v. Southern R. Co. 96 Va. 152, 31 S. E. 7; 4 Minor, Inst. 1st part, 749.

The occasion, the publication itself, and the surrounding circumstances were all in evidence before the jury, and they could and did determine therefrom that there was express malice, either from the extrinsic circumstances, or from the language of the libel itself, or from both; and it was error to set the verdict so found aside.

Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 351; White v. Nicholls, 3 How. 266, 11 L. ed. 591; Bacon v. Michigan C. R. Co. 66 Mich. 166, 33 N. W. 181; Behee v. Missouri P. R. Co. 71 Tex. 424, 9 S. W. 449; Sullivan v. Strathan-Hutton-Evans Commission Co. 152 Mo. 268, 47 L. R. A. 859, 53 S. W. 912.

A corporation is liable for a libel published by its authority, although the corporation, as distinct from its members, cannot be guilty of malice in the ordinary sense of the word.

13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 448; Bruce v. Reed, 104 Pa. 408, 49 Am. Rep. 586; Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 13 Lea, 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666; Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 265.

A corporation is liable when the publication of libelous matter is caused by an agent within the scope of his authority.

Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 16 L. ed. 73; Van Aernam v. Bleistein, 102 N. Y. 355, 7 N. E. 537; Howe Mach. Co. v. Souder, 58 Ga. 64.

A railroad company may be held liable for a libel of its division agent in reporting causes of discharge of employees to other agents.

Bacon v. Michigan C. R. Co. 66 Mich. 166, 33 N. W. 181; Nance v. Falls City, 16 Neb. 85, 20 N. W. 109; Fogg v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 148 Mass. 513, 20 N. E. 109.

If the defendant, the railway company, can claim that publishing Brown, the plaintiff in this suit, as a proved liar, on account of giving the statement, is a privileged communication, then the defendant railway company would necessarily have to be plaintiff in a suit against Brown for making the statements. It is manifestly impossible for the defendant railway company to have such an interest therein as would or could maintain an action against Brown for such statement.

Brayton v. Cleveland Special Police Co. 63 Ohio St. 83, 52 L. R. A. 525, 57 N. E. 1085.

The publication not being privileged, the question of proof of malice does not enter into the case at bar.

Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 350.

There was proof of actual malice.

Bacon v. Michigan C. R. Co. 55 Mich. 224, 54 Am. Rep. 372, 21 N. W. 324, 66 Mich. 166, 33 N. W. 181; Holt v. Parsons, 23 Tex. 2, 76 Am. Dec. 49; Behee v. Missouri P. R. Co. 71 Tex. 424, 9 S. W. 449.

Messrs. Joseph I. Doran and Archer A. Phlegar, for defendant in error:

The posting of a notice of the discharge of a fireman (without even giving his name), and of the cause thereof, under the direction of an officer of the company in yardmaster's and telegraph offices, which were solely for the business of the company, and not for the public, was an act of privilege, and, if done bona fide, was not libelous, even if the cause of discharge was not truly stated.

Chaffin v. Lynch, 84 Va. 884, 6 S. E. 474; Strode v. Clement, 90 Va. 553, 19 S. E. 177; Reusch v. Roanoke Cold Storage Co. 91 Va. 534, 22 S. E. 358.

Publications by an employer to his employees of the cause of discharge of an employee are privileged, if made without malice.

Tench v. Great Western R. Co. 33 U. C. Q. B. 8.

Malice will not be inferred from the publication; but express malice must be proved.

Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 351; Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 118, 1 S. E. 803, 84 Va. 886, 6 S. E. 474; Reusch v. Roanoke Cold Storage Co. 91 Va. 535, 22 S. E. 358; Misouri P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 73 Tex. 568, 4 L. R. A. 280, 11 S. W. 555; Hunt v. Great Northern R. Co. [1891] 2 Q. B. 189.

If the right to publish the cause of discharge exists, the occasion is privileged, and the question is not whether the language used was true, or whether there was reasonable ground to believe it to be true, but whether, in point of fact, the defendant honestly believed it to be true, and published it without actual malice.

Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803, 84 Va. 886, 6 S. E. 474; Reusch v. Roanoke Cold Storage Co. 91 Va. 535, 22 S. E. 358.

The bulletin was privileged, and the privilege was not exceeded. Neither compensatory nor punitive damages could be recovered.

Hundley v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 105 Ky. 162, 48 S. W. 429; Somerville v. Hawkins, 10 C. B. 581; Harris v. Thompson, 13 C. B. 333; Taylor v. Hawkins, 16 Q. B. 308.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error, Brown, had been a fireman in the employment of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company for several years, and was well esteemed. In July, 1898, he was directed to take an engine from Radford to Bluefield, to be used in drawing an excursion train. This engine had been standing in the roundhouse at Radford without protection, and was in a rusty and filthy condition. Brown endeavored, as he states, to clean it by the use of oil and waste cotton, but was unable to do so. When the engine arrived at Roanoke, its condition was reported to Henretta, the road foreman of engines, who summoned Brown before him. Brown reported to Henretta in obedience to the summons, and stated to him that he had done his best with the means at his disposal, and thereupon, as Brown alleges, Henretta used the following language: "Newman (meaning S. D. Newman, a master mechanic in the employment of the railway company), the damn son of a bitch, is the cause of all this trouble. He ought to have had that engine jacket lyed off,"—meaning that he ought to have had it washed with lye, in order to remove the rust and filth. Brown repeated the remark which Henretta was alleged to have made in the presence of 60 L. R. A.

several other employees of the railway company, and it was finally communicated to Newman. Thereupon Newman called upon Brown with reference to it, and Brown gave him a written statement of the occurrence as above narrated. When Newman, shortly thereafter, met Henretta, he asked him about this statement, and Henretta denied it, and asked him to get a written statement from Brown, and send it to him, which was done. Henretta also got a statement from Dickerson, who was present at the interview between Brown and himself, and then wrote to Pearce, division master mechanic, the following letter:

"The attached papers are self-explaining. I have only to state that Fireman H. M. Brown has told a deliberate lie. Mr. Dickerson was witness to all my remarks when I was investigating Fireman Brown's neglect to properly clean engine 706. His statement is attached. The papers are handed you, that proper discipline may be applied. Yours truly, F. B. Henretta."

Pearce looked into the matter, and reported the result of his inquiry in the following letter to W. H. Lewis, superintendent of motive power:

"Further concerning the case of engine No. 706, which you will remember came out on an excursion train in a very dirty condition, fireman claiming he worked two hours cleaning the engine, and engineman stating that he put ten minutes on it, please note attached, from which it appears that Fireman Brown tried to get even by intimating that Mr. Henretta had cast reflections on the female ancestry of Mr. Newman, and lied about the matter. I think, under circumstances, that Mr. Brown's services should be dispensed with without further consideration. J. S. Pearce, D. M. M."

W. H. Lewis, as a result of his investigation, published the following order:

"A fireman has been dismissed from the service for intimating that an officer of the company had cast reflections upon the ancestry of another officer, which was proved to be untrue."

For the publication of this order the Norfolk & Western Railway Company was sued. The jury rendered a verdict against the defendant for $5,000. Subject to the judgment of the court upon the demurrer to the evidence, the court entered judgment for the defendant, and the case is before us upon a writ of error awarded upon the petition of the plaintiff, Brown.

The contention of the railway company is that the order issued by Lewis discharging Brown from the service of the company and assigning the reason for his action was a privileged communication, for which the defendant in error is not liable in damages, unless the publication was malicious; that the company acted in good faith, after due investigation, and was inspired by no other motive than a desire to promote the efficiency of its service, and to give necessary information to its employees.

In Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803, it was held that, "to justify publication of defamatory matter, the occasion must be privileged, and must be used bona fide, without malice. Whether the occasion be privileged is a question of law for the court. Whether it has been used bona fide is a question of fact for the jury."

We think it plain that the communication which is the subject of controversy here was privileged. Brown had made a statement with reference to what was said by his superior officer, who was inquiring into the manner in which his duty had been discharged. He reported that Henretta had at that interview used language in the highest degree insulting to Newman, a coemployee. Henretta denied the truth of the statement. It was inquired into in a due and orderly course of investigation, and the conclusion reached that Brown's version of the affair was untrue. Assuming, for the moment, that it was untrue, it cannot be doubted that Brown was guilty of a very grave offense tending to produce ill will, discord, and strife among the employees of the company. If such were the case, it was altogether proper to discharge him from the service, and due to him and all concerned that the reason for his discharge should be given, so as to fix the blame where it belonged, and to exonerate those who were innocent.

As was said by Judge Lewis in Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803: "The reported cases on the subject of privileged communications are very numerous, and they show that, while the law as to such communications is well settled, its application to particular cases is often attended with difficulty. They also show that the law in this particular was formerly more restricted than at present, the rule having been gradually extended, on the ground that it is to the interest of society that correct information should be obtained as to the character and standing of persons with whom others have business or social relations; so that it is now settled, as laid down by Baron Parke in the leading case of Too-good v. Spyring, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 181, that a communication honestly made in the performance of a social duty is no less privileged than one made in self-defense, or in the protection of one's own interest. And a communication made under such circumstances, and without malice, is protected, notwithstanding its imputations be false, or founded upon the most erroneous information."

Did the defendant company act in good faith in making the publication complained of, or was its action inspired by malice?

The question is not as to the truth or falsity of the publication. It is solely a question of good faith on the one hand and of malice on the other. In the interview between Henretta and Brown, at which the language with reference to Newman is said to have been used, there was, in addition to these gentlemen, Dickerson and Stauffer. Brown, of course, swears that his account of the interview is the correct one. Henretta denies that it is true, and says that the language which he used was "that it was a damn shame for Newman to let the engine come out in that fix." Stauffer says that he was in the room when Brown was being questioned, not more than 5 or 6 feet distant, and that he did not hear the expression attributed by Brown to Henretta. Dickerson says that he was present at the interview in Henretta's office when Brown was called in; that he was not paying very much attention to what passed; that, although he was within a few feet of them, he did not hear Henretta make use of the expression imputed to him by Brown; that he twice heard him say—once at the office, and just before that when examining the engine—"that it was a damn shame that this engine was allowed to come out of the round-house in such condition."

We are aware that this case is before us upon a demurrer to the evidence, but we repeat that the question here is not as to the truth or falsity of any statement made in the published order, but merely as to the motive and intent by which the railway company was inspired. The communication being privileged, plaintiff in error can only prevail by showing that the defendant availed itself of the occasion, not for the purpose of protecting its interests, but to gratify its ill will. Upon this issue the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in error.

The remarks of Judge Lewis in Strode v. Clement, 90 Va. 553, 19 S. E. 177, are applicable in this case: "There is no extrinsic evidence of malice, such as an antecedent grudge, or previous disputes, or anything of that sort, between the parties; but the contention is that the language used by the defendant is of itself evidence of malice. Undoubtedly, strong or violent language, disproportioned to the occasion, may raise an inference of malice, and thus lose the privilege that otherwise would attach to it. But when the occasion is privileged the tendency of the courts is not to submit the words to a too strict scrutiny, but rather to view them in the light of the facts as they appeared to the defendant; for the question is not whether the imputations are true, but whether the words are such as the defendant might have honestly employed under the circumstances."

In this case there is no extrinsic evidence of malice, nor is the language complained of so violent or disproportioned to the occasion as to raise an inference of malice. In other words, there is no evidence of malice. If the issue before the jury had been as to the truth of Brown's account of what passed between Henretta and himself, the evidence would have required a verdict establishing as true Henretta's version, though a verdict in favor of the truth of Brown's statement could not with propriety have been disturbed by the court (Tyree v. Harrison [Va.] 42 S. E. 295); but the fact that the publication complained of was only made after the controversy between Brown and Henretta had been investigated, and that it embodies the results of that inquiry in accordance with the weight of evidence, clothed in temperate and decorous language in the absence of any extrinsic fact or circumstance having such tendency, leaves the case stripped of any evidence to support the charge of malice, and the presumption that the publication was made in good faith must prevail.

In Tyree v. Harrison (Va.) 42 S. E. 295, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff in an action for libel. The court set aside that verdict, and at a subsequent trial rendered judgment for the defendant. Thereupon the plaintiff obtained a writ of error to this court, which reversed the case, and entered judgment for the plaintiff upon the first verdict. It was there held that it was for the jury to say which account was true,—that given by Tyree, or that given by Harrison: that the jury, in the exercise of their function, had seen fit to accept as true the statement of Tyree; and that, according to his account, the language used was so strong, violent, and abusive as to warrant an inference of malice, and destroy the privilege that would otherwise attach to the communication, or, at the least, that this court was unable to say that the verdict of the jury was so plainly against the weight of evidence as to justify the interference of the court.

In the case under consideration we are not called upon to consider the weight or preponderance of evidence. There is no extrinsic evidence of malice, and the language of the communication of which complaint is made, and the manner of its publication, do not justify the imputation of malice, but rather tend to repel it. It does not name the person at whom it is directed. It states in language as mild as could have been employed the conclusion of the person charged with the duty of making the investigation, and that conclusion was warranted by the preponderance of evidence, which includes the testimony of every disinterested witness present upon the occasion.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the judgment complained of should be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Re Appraisal of Property of George JONES, Deceased, under the Act in Relation to Taxable Transfers.

(172 N. Y. 575.)

1. Shares in a joint-stock association are to be dealt with as personalty in applying the laws providing a transfer or succession tax, although the property of the association is real estate.
2. In determining, for the purposes of taxation, the value of shares in a joint-stock association which are not listed on the stock exchange or sold in the open market, the value of the property they represent, including the real estate, should be ascertained.

(December 9, 1902.)

A PPEAL by the State Comptroller from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, modifying an order of the New York County Surrogate imposing a transfer tax upon the property of George Jones, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John B. Dos Passos and Edmund F. Harding, for appellant:

The shares are personal property. The appraiser to find their value, properly made inquiry into the property owned by the association.

Adams Exp. Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 166 U. S. 185, 41 L. ed. 965, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 604; People ex rel. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Roberts, 4 App. Div. 334, 38 N. Y. Supp. 724; Re Brandreth, 28 Misc. 408, 59 N. Y. Supp. 1092.

The shares are entities and property in themselves. Their qualities alone must determine whether this property is realty or personalty.

Their attributes are exactly the same as the attributes of ordinary corporate stock, which is always regarded as personalty because of those attributes.

Bartlett, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question involved in this appeal is one of law upon undisputed facts. The late George Jones was a member of a joint-stock association known as "The New York Times." The property of this association was represented by the issue of 100 shares of stock, of which the deceased owned 46. This association was formed in January, 1872, its articles being executed by seven associates and provided in detail for the management of the business. The eighth subdivision thereof reads as follows: "All the property, real and personal, and all the goods and chattels, choses and rights in action, and credits of every name and nature, with the evidence thereof, including the good will of its business of the association heretofore existing, known as 'The New York Times Establishment,' are put in by the undersigned, who are the owners thereof, and constitute the value of the shares of the association." The ninth subdivision reads: "The shares of the association shall represent all the rights and property mentioned in the foregoing article, together with all said property, goods and chattels, rights and credits, as shall from time to time be required, and shall always be divided into 100 equal shares." The articles further provided that each of the associates had the power to sell his shares subject to certain conditions not important to be considered at this time; also that the title to the real estate should vest in the president of the association and be held by him for its use and benefit, subject to the control and disposition of the board of directors, who were clothed with ample powers to conduct the business. Mr. Jones died on the 12th of August, 1891, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly proved. Certain provisions of this will were read in evidence, and disclose the fact that the testator, in disposing of his interests in the association known as "The New York Times," divided it among his legatees by giving to each a certain number of shares of the stock held by him. He bequeathed some of these shares absolutely, and created separate trusts as to certain other shares. It thus appears that the associates, constituting this joint-stock association, treated their property, real and personal, as represented by shares of stock; and Mr. Jones in his will saw fit to distribute his interest by adopting the same mode of representation. It was claimed by the comptroller that these shares were personal property, and taxable as shares of stock in an ordinary corporation. The executors contended that, as the joint-stock association owned this realty, the interest therein of the shareholder was realty also, and, as it passed under his will in the direct line, was exempt, the statute taxing transfers of realty only when passing to collaterals or strangers. Laws 1891, chap. 215. The views of the comptroller were adopted by the appraiser, and by both surrogates of New York county, but the appellate division reversed with a divided court.

The history of joint-stock associations both in England and this country is interesting. Mr. Lindley, in his Law of Companies, 5th ed., at page 2, says: "When unincorporated companies, with a joint stock divided into numerous transferable shares, began to assume importance and to force themselves upon the attention of the legislative and judicial departments of the state, the reception they met with was by no means encouraging. Owing to the then established rules relating to parties to actions at law and suits in equity, a joint-stock company could not practically sue its own debtors, nor could disputes between its members be readily, if at all, adjusted. At the same time the doctrine that each member was answerable for the whole of the debts of the company was studiously promulgated and rigorously enforced." The learned author discusses at length the growth of joint-stock associations in England from an early time until the present day. He has, however, summed up the situation in the quotation already made, to the effect that, with all the rights and powers conferred upon them, in the face of vigorous opposition, the doctrine of individual liability has been maintained. In People ex rel. Winchester v. Coleman, 133 N. Y. 279, 16 L. R. A. 183, 31 N. E. 96, Judge Finch pointed out the many respects in which joint-stock associations resemble corporations, but emphasized the fact that the one derives its existence from the contract of individuals, the other from the sovereignty of the state. He said: "The two are alike, but not the same. More or less they crowd upon and overlap each other, but without losing their identity, and so, while we cannot say that the joint-stock company is a corporation, we can say, as we did say in Van Aernam v. Bleistein, 102 N. Y. 360, 7 N. E. 538, that a joint-stock company is a partnership with some of the powers of a corporation." This quotation states in a brief manner the law relating to these associations as it exists in this state. A joint-stock company has never appealed to the sovereignty of the state for the right to exist, but by articles of association, which take the place of the charter of a corporation, the associates have been content to do business subject to the individual liabilities of partners. In 1854 (chap. 245) the legislature made it lawful for such associations to provide by their articles that the death of any stockholder, or the assignment of his stock, should not work a dissolution, but they should continue as before and could only be wound up by the judgment of a court. This law continued in force until the enactment of the "joint stock association law" passed in 1894, when it was repealed. 2 Rev. Stat. Banks's 9th ed. p. 1471. The Code of Civil Procedure has also provided for actions by or against an unincorporated association, preserving in part previous legislation, and adding thereto new and liberal features. Sections 1919 to 1924, both inclusive. Mr. Beach, in his work on Private Corporations (vol. 1, § 167), in speaking of joint-stock associations, says: "The powers conferred upon them by these enactments are such that for many purposes they are held to be corporations, even though they have nowhere been designated as such, and though the statutes relating to joint-stock companies do not so designate them, or have expressly declared that they shall not be so considered. But with respect to the personal liability of members to creditors of the company they are still subject to the common-law rules applicable to partnerships." The principal feature of the joint-stock association is the right of perpetual succession. In this respect it is like a corporation, and enjoys all the advantages flowing from such a privilege. It has frequently been held in this state that, where a tax has been imposed upon all moneyed or stock associations, it could not be collected from a joint-stock association, for the reason that technically it could not be regarded as a corporation. People ex rel. Winchester v. Coleman, 133 N. Y. 279, 16 L. R. A. 183, 31 N. E. 96, reported below 37 N. Y. S. R. 120, 13 N. Y. Supp. 833. In these cases the question was whether a joint-stock association was taxable upon its capital under the provisions of the Revised Statutes (1 Rev. Stat. 414, § 1) subjecting "all moneyed or 60 L. R. A.

stock corporations deriving an income or profit from their capital or otherwise" to such a tax. The opinions of Mr. Justice Barrett at special term, Mr. Justice Van Brunt at general term, and Judge Finch in this court, all considered the question whether a joint-stock association was a corporation, and whether the acts creating for it certain privileges intended to confer a corporate franchise. It was held that, while a joint-stock association possessed certain corporate powers, nevertheless it was not a corporation within the meaning of the statute to which reference has been made. The fact that a joint-stock association is not in legal contemplation a corporation, and not liable to taxation under acts seeking to reach corporations, in no way militates against the position assumed by the comptroller in this case. It is competent for private individuals to create a joint-stock association, issue shares of stock, and in that form dispose of property by last will and testament. The associates by contract have created the same situation as to shares of stock that a corporation secures by charter. In the case at bar the appraiser fixed the value of the interest, of the estate, of the personal property, of "The New York Times" at $15,840, the real estate at $575,000, and the good will of the newspaper, less the existing debts, at $184,000.

It is contended on behalf of the executors that this large amount of real estate, which is of greater value than appraised, is not subject to the tax, for the reason that it would descend to the testator's children, and was not taxable under the transfer tax law in force at the time of testator's death. The fact is that at the time of Mr. Jones's death the title to the real estate of "The New York Times" was vested in its president for the benefit of the association, and this situation was not changed by that event. It is not possible that the real estate of "The New York Times" could, after Mr. Jones's death, remain, as theretofore, the property of the association and used for its business purposes, and still be regarded, so far as testator's interest was concerned, real estate passing to his children. It was neither so in fact nor in law.

The question to be determined at this time is not whether joint-stock associations are corporations in the full meaning of the latter word, but, rather, What is the nature of the shares of stock that joint-stock associations are permitted to issue and sell in the open market? The contention of the respondent and of the prevailing opinion below is that "The New York Times," being a joint-stock association, was a partnership both with reference to its shareholders and in its relations with third parties. At this late day, and having regard to the remarkable development of joint-stock associations both in England and this country, it is not possible to strictly apply the law of partnership to the manner in which they are to hold and dispose of real estate. The fact that the associates rest under the common-law liability of partners does not affect the question we are considering. As to the nature of the shares of stock issued by a joint-stock association, the same general principles of law are to be invoked that apply to a corporation. This court, in Weaver v. Barden, 49 N. Y. 286, held that the capital stock of an incorporated company is personal property. The supreme court of Rhode Island, in Arnold v. Ruggles, 1 R. I. 165, 167, 168, in considering the nature of a share of stock, said: "Is a share, then, thus made up, to be deemed real estate, or as necessarily partaking of the realty? A share must pass one way or the other, as an entire thing. It cannot be resolved into the elements of which the estates of the corporation consist, and a part pass to the heir and a part to the executor, without destroying it, and with it the whole concern. It is an entirety, and must be either real or personal. And which is it? It will not do to make the property of the corporation a criterion, for the property of almost every corporation is more or less mixed. We must make the share itself—those rights which constitute its beneficial interests—the criterion. Its right, then, to receive a dividend of the whole concern, whether real or personal, is the interest by which it is to be judged." This is a clear and satisfactory statement of the attributes of a share of stock.

It would be incongruous and impossible, in conducting the affairs of a joint-stock association, in view of the fact that it is allowed to issue stock, to hold, as the respondent contends, that, notwithstanding the articles of association provide that neither the death nor the transfer of the interests of any shareholder shall work a dissolution of the association, or any interruption of its business, nevertheless, on the death of an associate, his interest in the real estate of the association must be deemed to descend to his heirs at law, and his interest in the personalty to pass under the statute of distribution. The distinction between the property of a corporation represented by its capital stock and the property of the stockholders represented by their shares is discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States in a recent case. Cleveland Trust Co. v. Lander, 184 U. S. 111, 46 L. ed. 456, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 394. The plaintiff in error, the Cleveland Trust Company, had a capital stock of $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of $100 each, all of which were paid up, and the certificates were owned by a large number of persons in Ohio and elsewhere. The plaintiff was the owner of 174 bonds of the United States, of the denomination of $1,000 each, valued at the sum of $213,274.81, and claimed in its return, in a tax proceeding, the right to deduct the bonds from the par value of its stock. The supreme court of the state of Ohio sustained the decision of the court of common pleas overruling this claim of the plaintiff, and an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Justice McKenna, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"The plaintiff concedes the distinction between the property of the corporation, represented by its capital stock, and the property of the shareholders, represented by their shares, and bases an argument upon that distinction, and yet excludes from consideration as immaterial to the questions at issue the laws of Congress governing the taxation of the shares. . . . In other words, the contention is that, the tax on the shares being equivalent to the tax on the property of the trust company, there must be deducted from the value of the shares that portion of the capital of the company invested in the United States bonds. The answer to the contention is obvious, and may be brief. The contention destroys the separate individuality—recognized, as we have seen, by this court—of the trust company and its shareholders, and seeks to nullify one provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States (§ 5219 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3502]) by another (§ 3701 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2480]), between which there is no want of harmony. And what the Constitution of the state of Ohio requires, or what the statutes of the state require, as to taxation, must be left to be decided by the supreme court of the state, and whether that court has decided logically or illogically that a tax authorized by the laws of the United States on the shares of the company satisfies the Constitution of the state as a tax on the corporation is not open to our review or objection. The manner of taxation being legal under the statutes of the United States, its effect cannot be complained of in the Federal tribunals. We do not mean to be understood as implying that the plaintiff's view of the Constitution of the state or of the laws of the state is correct. The inquiry is not necessary. Accepting such view as correct, plaintiff shows no right under the Constitution or laws of the United States which has been violated."

The principle that the stock of a joint-stock association is similar in its nature to that of a corporation has been recognized in a number of cases. Waterbury v. Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 50 Barb. 157, 161; Rice v. Rockefeller, 134 N. Y. 174, 187, 17 L. R. A. 237, 31 N. E. 907; People ex rel. Platt v. Wemple, 117 N. Y. 146, 149, 6 L. R. A. 303, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 735, 22 N. E. 1046. As to the nature of the stock of corporations, it has been frequently held that not only is stock personal property, but that it is so no matter what the character of the corporate property may be. Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 78 N. Y. 179; Weaver v. Barden, 49 N. Y. 286; Jermain v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 492; Bradley v. Holdsworth, 3 Mees. & W. 424; Cook, Corp. § 12. In Re Bronson, 150 N. Y. at page 8, 34 L. R. A. 242, 44 N. E. 709, this court held that shares of stock actually represented undivided interests in a corporate enterprise, the corporation holding the legal title for the benefit of stockholders.

The statutory construction law (Laws 1892, chap. 677, § 4), in defining personal property, says: "The term personal property includes chattels, money, things in action, and all written instruments themselves, as distinguished from the rights or interests to which they relate, by which any right, interest, lien, or encumbrance in, to, or upon property, or any debt or financial obligation, is created, acknowledged, evidenced, transferred, discharged, or defeated, wholly or in part, and everything, except real property, which may be the subject of ownership." This very exhaustive definition covers certificates of stock. The Code of Civil Procedure (§ 647) provides, in substance, that the rights or shares which a defendant has in the stock of an association or corporation, together with the interest and profits thereon, may be levied upon by attachment, thus recognizing that the stock of an association, as well as that of a corporation, is deemed personal property.

The question we are now considering does not seem to have been directly passed upon by this court, but has been in other jurisdictions. In England the case of Myers v. Perigal, 21 L. J. C. P. N. S. 217, holds that the bequest of the proceeds of shares in a joint-stock banking company did not come within the "statute of mortmain" (9 Geo. II. chap. 36). In Pennsylvania we are cited by the appellant to the following cases, the first of which involved the law of joint-stock associations, and the other of limited partnership, which closely resembles joint-stock associations. Oliver's Estate, 136 Pa. 43, 9 L. R. A. 421, 20 Atl. 527; Small's Estate, 151 Pa. 1, 25 Atl. 23, 28.

We are of opinion, on principle and authority, that the shares of a joint-stock association should be treated as personal property, and taxable as such. The difference between a corporation and a joint-stock association, in view of the many corporate powers bestowed upon the latter, is more in degree than kind. The policy of the legislature in creating corporations is to continue to a certain extent the common-law liability of partners or joint debtors under which the stockholders would rest if unincorporated and engaged in a joint venture or partnership. This liability is primary, and not statutory, and rests upon the directors and stockholders alike. The legislature says in effect to all the members of the corporation: "You shall enjoy certain corporate powers, but as to creditors you remain liable as partners at common law, subject to such limitations as we have placed upon that liability." In Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 47, 49 Am. Dec. 287, it was held that, where the charter of an incorporated company provides that the stockholders shall be liable for the debts, and that the creditor may, after judgment obtained against the corporation and execution returned unsatisfied, sue any stockholders and recover his demands, such stockholders are liable in an original and primary sense, like partners or members of an unincorporated association, and their liability is not created by the statute of incorporation. In other words, the directors and stockholders of a corporation rest under a modified common-law liability, while the associates in a joint-stock association rest under the full common-law liability. Assuming that the shares of "The New York Times" are personal property, and taxable as such under the transfer act existing at the time Mr. Jones died, the remaining question is, whether the appraiser was authorized to consider the value of the real estate in ascertaining the value of the shares. It is clear from the figures resulting from the appraisal that the real estate constituted the greater part of the assets of the association. These shares were not listed upon the stock exchange, or sold in the open market, and the only way to get at their value was to ascertain the property they represented. People ex rel. Union Trust Co. v. Coleman, 126 N. Y. 433, 12 L. R. A. 762, 27 N. E. 818.

The order appealed from should be reversed, and the order of the surrogate affirmed, with costs to the appellants in all the courts.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Ohio
v.
Henry SHAW et al.
(.....Ohio.....)

- *1. To acquire a property right in animals feræ naturæ, so that they may be the subject of larceny, the pursuer must bring them into his power and control, so that he may subject them to his own use at his pleasure, and must so maintain his possession and control as to indicate that he does not intend to abandon them again to the world at large; but, in cases where larceny is charged, the law does not require absolute security against the possibility of escape.
2. When fish are inclosed in a net, or in any other inclosed place which is private property, from which they may be taken at any time at the pleasure of the owner of the net or inclosure, the taking of them therefrom with felonious intent will be larceny.

I. Public right of fishery.

Fish, being feræ naturæ, are, while in their natural element, the property of no one, unless they have been brought into an inclosure so that they are completely under the power of the captor, or they can be regarded as the property of the one who owns the water. The consequence is that they may be captured and taken by anyone who can gain access to them, except so far as the water is in private ownership. Following out the contentions of Selden in his attempt to establish the title of the sea in the British sovereign against the claims of the other nations, the subjects of that realm have conceded to their rulers the title to the seas. See note to Goff v. Cogle (Mich.) 42 L. R. A. 161. Such ownership was held to include both bed and water, and consequently whatever was in or upon either. Therefore the right to reduce the fish to possession resided in the King. But this right was one which was of little practical value to him, and he had neither the time nor the inclination to interfere with the taking by his subjects of such fish as they chose. This habit, together with the aggressiveness on the part of the subjects to augment their own rights and limit those of EXCEPTIONS by the State to rulings of the Court of Common Pleas for Lake County made during the trial of an indictment charging defendants with grand larceny, which resulted in a verdict of acquittal. Sustained.

Statement by Davis, J.:

The indictment is as follows: "In the court of common pleas of Lake county, Ohio, of the term of May, in the year of our Lord 1901. The jurors of the grand jury of the state of Ohio, within and for the body of the county of Lake, duly impeaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire of crimes and offenses committed within the said county of Lake, in the name and by the authority of the state of Ohio, upon their oaths do find and present, that Henry Shaw, John Thomas, and James Fostine, late of said county, on the 15th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1901, with force and arms, in said county of Lake and state of Ohio, unlawfully and feloniously did steal, take, and carry away 730 pounds of fish, of the value of $41, the Crown, in the course of time resulted in the formulation of the theory that the Crown held his fishery rights as a sort of trustee, and that the people were the real beneficiaries. Such was not the original idea. It finds no expression at the time of the decision of the case of the Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149. There the fishery right is treated as a part of the King's private property, to be dealt with for his own emolument, at his pleasure. But the doctrine is now firmly established that the ultimate right resides in the people, and that the Crown cannot abridge it. This conclusion has been aided by the necessity of asserting the public rights against the claims of private owners. As long as the Crown regarded the fisheries as his, he used them for his own advantage by making exclusive grants of them to individuals. The King's ownership of the fisheries would seldom inconvenience the rights of his subjects, but a few private grants might exclude the people generally from access to places where fishing might be successfully practised. This necessitated a holding that the King had no title which he could grant, and Magna Charta is referred to as the instrument by which he parted with his title. There is nothing in that instrument which directly works that result. For a discussion of the clauses relied upon, see infra, II. a. However, whether the prohibition is found in Magna Charta or not, the general rule now is that in tidal waters all have an equal right to fish, and that this right cannot be abridged by grants to individuals.

By the Roman law all rivers and ports are public; hence, the right of fishing is common to all in a port and in rivers. Sandars' Justinian, p. 158.

The fishery in every tidal stream is a royal fishery, and belongs to the King by his prerogative, since such river partakes of the nature of the sea, and is said to be a branch of the sea so far as it flows; but where a stream is nontidal the fishery pertains to the tenants. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

The public have prima facie a common right of fishing in tidal rivers. Reg. v. Stimpson, 32 of the personal property of Morris E. Grow and John Hough, partners as Grow & Hough, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Ohio." One of the defendants, John Thomas, was tried separately. On the trial, no evidence was offered by the defendant. The evidence offered by the state disclosed that on the morning of May 15, 1901, about 5 or 6 o'clock, a small sailboat was discovered 2 or 3 miles off Fairport harbor; a tug ran out and overhauled this boat, and discovered they had fish on board. In reply to an inquiry where they had got the fish, they said near Cleveland, out of a trap net. They were asked to come to the harbor with the tug, and refused; two other tugs came to the assistance of the one already there, and brought in the defendants, with their boat, and they were arrested. It is in evidence that, on the way in, the defendant John Thomas said that "they lifted two pound nets west of the pier and got the fish." The testimony further tended to show that the two pound nets belonged to Grow & Hough, the parties named in the indictment, and that the defendants had taken from these two nets somewhere from 100 to 150 pounds of fish each. It also appears that the construction of these pound nets is such that the entrance to the net was about 35 feet deep, 8 rods long, and terminated in an aperture leading into the net, which was 2 feet 10 inches in diameter. This tunnel, as it is called, extended into the net, or pot, some 5 or 6 feet, and the pot was about 28 feet square, reaching, perhaps, 4 feet above the water. The evidence shows that the opening of the tunnel into the pot was the Prima facie the right to fish in a tidal river is common to all, and the burden is upon one claiming an exclusive privilege. 16 Vin. Abr. title Piscary (B); Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68.

Woolrych says that the absence of any impost for taking fish by the public is a strong argument to show that the right to take them in the sea was never vested exclusively in the Crown. Waters, p. 76.

The King seems to have his proprietary dominion of fishing as lord of the soil of the sea. Id. p. 437.

But that, in regard to the right of fishery, the principle of lord and tenant holds. The soil abides in the sovereign, but all rights profitable to the advancement of commerce and the general welfare have accrued, by degrees, to the subject. Ibid.

The general public privilege of fishing may be claimed independently of the prerogative. Id. p. 129.

Schultes says that the privilege of fishing belongs to the subject of common right. Aquatic Rights, 17.

That the right of fishing never was vested in the Crown exclusively. As a public right belonging to the people, it prima facie vests in the Crown; but such legal investment does not diminish the right or counteract its exertion. Id. 15.

The right of the public to fish in the sea or arms thereof, which extends to the taking of shell fish left on the seashore, on the reflux of the tide between high and low water mark, is upon the ground that the taking of fish is a public benefit. Howe v. Stowell, Alcock & N. 848, 358.

Where a channel is cut through a sea wall separating a body of brackish water from the sea, and the tide flows and reflows through it, and sea fish and ships pass through, the public right of fishery in such waters attaches. Naah v. Newton, 30 N. B. 610.

A citizen who takes fish from public waters can stand upon his common right thereto until the claimant of the locus as a private fishery establishes a superior title; and, until a private grant is made, the public right exists. Polhemus v. Bateman, 60 N. J. L. 163, 37 Atl. 1015.

The fishery in tidal waters is prima facie in the public, and can be held vested as a private right only upon a showing of title. Carter v. Murcott, 4 Burr. 2164; Gould v. James, 6 Cow. 60 L. R. A.

All subjects have a right to take bait and fish in any harbor, river, or public water in Upper Canada (not duly set apart by the governor in council for the natural or artificial propagation of fish), so that in so doing they trespass not on the Crown lands or beaches, or, by their place, time, or mode of fishing, contravene any provision of the Canada fisheries act, or regulations thereunder; and this applies, not merely to individuals, but equally to all Her Majesty's subjects. Daragh v. Dunn, 7 U. C. L. J. 273.

While a several fishery in a navigable river cannot be created since the Magna Charta, yet, if it existed previous to that time, it may be subsequently granted. Devonshire v. Hodnett, 1 Hudson & B. 322.

The right to a fishery in a public stream is prima facie in the public. Russell v. Stocking, 8 Conn. 286.

While in a private stream it puts the proof upon those that claim liberam piscariam, "in case of a river that flows and reflows, and is an arm of the sea," prima facie it is common to all, it being a good justification to say that the locus in quo is brachium maris in quo unus quisque subiectus dominus regie habet et habere debet liberam piscariam. Fitzwalter's Case, 1 Mod. 105.

The state is the owner of the beds of all tide-water rivers within its boundaries, unless they have been granted away, and has the right to prescribe the mode in which fish may be taken in such waters. Hughes v. State, 87 Md. 298, 39 Atl. 747.

In Scotland, however, the law is in its original form so far as the salmon fisheries are concerned, and has not been subjected to the modifying influence which has occurred in England.

And the right of the Crown in salmon fisheries in the open sea around the coast of Scotland is to be determined by the law of Scotland. Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. II. L. Cas. 419.

The right of salmon fishing in the sea around the coast of Scotland belongs to the Crown, and is inter regalia, except so far as it has been parted with by grant. McDouall v. Lord Advocate, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 431; Lord Advocate v. Lovat, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 273.

place where the fish entered, and that it was at all times left open. There is no evidence as to the quantity of fish escaping from the nets; it simply appears that it was possible for the fish to go out in the same way they got in. It was also in evidence that these nets were frequently disturbed by wind and storm, and at such times so disordered that fish escaped over the top. When the state had rested its case, the defendant Thomas moved the court to arrest the testimony from the jury and direct a verdict of not guilty. The court overruled this motion, but after argument did direct a verdict of not guilty, which was returned by the jury, and to which the state excepted.

The right belongs to the Crown, not as a trustee for the public, but as a part of its hereditary revenue, and may be granted by it, and may be feudalized. Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 419.

The royal interest in-salmon fishings extended to those in the open sea, as well as in rivers and estuaries. Ibid.

By that law the Crown is presumed to be entitled to all salmon fisheries to which the vassal cannot affirmatively establish his claim. Lord Advocate v. Lovat, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 288.

In Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 419, the lord chancellor, in discussing the right of the Crown to salmon fisheries on the coast of Scotland, says that salmon fishings at an early period in the history of Scotland were regarded as possessing a peculiar value over other fishings, and were distinguishable from them in a remarkable manner. They were only capable of belonging to a subject by an express grant from the Crown, or by a grant of fishings generally, followed by such user of salmon fishing as proved that it was intended to be comprehended within the general terms of the grant.

The United States, upon acquiring the Pribilof Islands from Russia, asserted a jurisdiction over the Behring sea for the protection of the seal fisheries. This jurisdiction was disputed by other nations, and finally became the subject of arbitration in which the questions submitted involved the extent of the Russian claims to the sea prior to the cession of the territory to the United States, and how far its claims have been acquiesced in by Great Britain; and further, whether or not the United States had any right of protection of property in the seals outside the ordinary 3-mile limit. The arbitrators found that Russia had not established any exclusive right to the sea, and that, therefore, the United States had acquired none, and could enforce no regulation against subjects of foreign powers outside the regulation 3-mile limit. 27 Am. Public rights in United States.

The limitation upon the rights of the Crown in England, and upon its power to grant private rights of fishery, did not extend to the people themselves as represented in Parliament, and that body has always had the power to make such grants. When the American colonies acquired their independence, they acquired with it, not only the powers of the British Crown, but also those of Parliament. In the absence of a constitutional limitation, these powers are vested in the lawmaking representatives of the people of the several states, and there is nothing to prevent them from making private grants. In the absence of such grants, however, the right of fishing in all waters the title to which is in the public belongs to all the people in common.

The right to fish in the public waters, in the absence of express prohibitory legislation, is a right common to all of the citizens of the state; and, while the legislature has ample power to regulate the right, or grant it to one to the exclusion of others,—for a limited time, at least,—the statute expressing such intent must have the directness and certainty of a penal statute, or, at least, not be capable of a different construction, before it will be given that effect. Legoe v. Chicago Fishing Co. 24 Wash. 175, 64 Pac. 141; De Mere v. Sandy Spit Fish Co. 24 Wash. 582, 64 Pac. 799.

Every man has an equal right to take for his own use all creatures fit for food (such as fish) that are wild by nature, so long as he does no injury to another's rights. Sterling v. Jackson, 69 Mich. 488, 37 N. W. 843.

To fish is a right accorded by the state, and the question of individual enjoyment is one of public privilege, and not of private right. People v. Collison, 85 Mich. 105, 48 N. W. 292.

In Yensen v. State, 7 Ohio N. P. 18, it is said that the business of fishing is itself a lawful one, in which anyone has the right to engage. The right of public fishery in the waters of the Great Lakes is one of the time-honored, we might say almost sacred, rights of the people.

Open-water fishing is an essentially a maritime business as any other use of the water outside the line prescribed by statute. Anyone has the right to fish with such appliances as 60 L. R. A.

Food fish in the "trap" or "pot" of a pound net set in public waters are not the subject of larceny so long as the aperture through which they entered is left open so that they may escape therefrom at will. The facts being agreed upon, it remained for the court to say whether in such a net the fish could be said to be confined, within the meaning of the law.

In the absence of statutory authority, no exclusive right to any portion of a fishing district on the public waters of a sound can be appropriated; but such right is common to all. Gerhard v. Worrell, 20 Wash. 492, 55 Pac. 625.

Until appropriation is made of a fishery by the state or municipality, any citizen may use it. Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140.

In waters above the tide.

In England the King's title to the water depended upon its character, and, since the right to the fish follows the title to the water, his right, and therefore the right of the public, to the fish went no farther than the flow of the tide. The right did not depend upon the navigable character of the water, nor upon its actual navigation, but solely upon the tide.

In all tidal waters, or flumen regale, the fishery belongs to the King by his prerogative, but in nontidal streams the terre-tenants of either side have an interest in the fishery of common right. Selden, Mare Clausum, lib. 2, chap. 21, 16 Vin. Abr. 576 (B a), (16), (17).

A common fishery cannot be claimed in private waters. Woolrych, Waters, p. 78.

The public have no right of fishery in a tidal stream at a point above the action of the tide, though it be navigable in fact. Blount v. Layard [1891] 2 Ch. 681, note; Ashworth v. Browne, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 421, 7 Ir. Jur. O. S. 315; Reece v. Miller, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 626, 51 L. J. M. C. N. S. 64, 47 J. P. 37; Pearce v. Scotcher, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 162, 46 L. T. N. S. 342, 46 J. The right of catching fish in the navigable and nontidal part of the river belongs exclusively to the riparian owner, who has the same right precisely as to catching fish there as the riparian owners have in the nonnavigable part of the river. It is thus clear that the right to catch fish does not depend in any way on the right of public passage. The public right of navigation and the public right of fishing are entirely separate rights. Leconfield v. Lonsdale, L. R. 5 C. P. 665, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Fish are feræ naturæ; yet, "where the animals or other creatures are not domestic, but are feræ naturæ, larceny may, notwithstanding, be committed of them, if they are fit for food of man, and dead, reclaimed (and known to be so), or confined. Thus . . . fish in a tank or net, or, as it seems, in any other inclosed place which is private property, and where they may be taken at any time at the pleasure of the owner, . . . the taking of them with felonious intent will be larceny." 2 Russell, Crimes, 83: "Fish confined in a tank or net are sufficiently secured." 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 775.

The trial judge seems to have directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty on the theory that the fish must have been confined so that there was absolutely no possibility of escape. We think that this doctrine is both unnecessarily technical and erroneous. For example, bees in a hive may be the subject of larceny, yet it is possible for the bees to leave the hive by the same place at which they entered. To acquire a property right in animals feræ naturæ, the pursuer must bring them into his power and control, and so maintain his control as to show that he does not intend to abandon them again to the world at large. When he has confined them within his own private inclosure, where he may subject them to his own use at his pleasure, and maintains rea-

In point of law, there can be no common right of fishery in a nonnavigable river. Hudson v. MacRae, 4 Best & S. 585, 9 L. T. N. S. 678, 33 L. J. M. C. N. S. 65, 12 Week. Rep. 80; Mussett v. Burch, 35 L. T. N. S. 486.

Where the lands adjoining fresh-water rivers have been granted, the exclusive right of fishing is in the riparian proprietor; and where such lands have not been granted, the right is in the Crown for the benefit of the public. Steadman v. Robertson, 2 Fuglesley & B. (N. B.) 580.

Riparian proprietors have an exclusive right of fishing in nonnavigable lakes, rivers, streams, and waters, the beds of which have been granted them by the Crown. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

There is no connection whatever between a right of passage and a right of fishing. A right of passage is an easement,—that is, a privilege without profit, as in a common highway. A right to catch fish is a profit à prendre, subject, no doubt, to the free use of the river as a highway, and to the private rights of others. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

The Crown, in right of the Provinces, may grant the soil of all land under nontidal waters, and the right to a several fishery thereon passes as an incident unless expressly reserved. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

A navigable river, for the purpose of the common and public right of fishing, must be a tidal river in which the tide ebbs and flows, and the right cannot be extended to a river merely capable of navigation by ships and boats. Murphy v. Ryan, Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 143, 16 Week. Rep. 678.

At common law the public right of fishing in rivers was confined to such portions of the rivers as were covered by the ebb and flow of the tide. Willow River Club v. Wade, 100 Wis. 86, 42 L. R. A. 805, 76 N. W. 273.

A river is not tidal, so as to give a public right of fishery, where it is unaffected by ordinary tides, although upon the occasion of very high tides the rising of salt water in the lower part of the river dams back the fresh water, and causes it, upon those occasions, to rise and fall with the flow and ebb of the tide. In this case Grove, J., says, in order that the river may be tidal at the spot in question, it may not be necessary that the water should be salt, but the spot must be one where the tide in the ordinary and regular course of things flows and refluxes. There is no case which shows that, because at exceptionally high tides, 60 L. R. A.

some portion of the river is dammed up and prevented from flowing down, and so rises and falls with the tide, that that portion of the river can be called tidal. Reece v. Miller, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 626, 51 L. J. M. C. N. S. 64, 47 J. P. 37.

In Smith v. Andrews [1891] 2 Ch. 693, 65 L. T. N. S. 175, North, J., in speaking of the Thames at a point above the action of the tide, and holding that no right of fishery existed there, said: The idea is sometimes entertained that the right to pass along a public navigable river carries with it the right to fish in it; but, so far as regards nontidal rivers, this is not so. Persons using a navigable highway no more acquire thereby a right to fish there, than persons passing along a public highway on land acquire a right to shoot upon it.

Whoever claims the right to fish in private waters has the burden of showing the foundation of such right. Fitzwalter's Case, 1 Mod. 105.

The owner of the soil may have an exclusive right of fishery in water which is so far navigable that he cannot prevent the public from passing over it. Micklethwait v. Vincent, 67 L. T. N. S. 225.

Property rights to a several fishery in non-navigable nontidal waters are not abridged when the waters are made navigable by Parliament by artificial improvements. Hargreaves v. Diddams, 32 L. T. N. S. 600, L. R. 10 Q. B. 582, 44 L. J. M. C. N. S. 178, 23 Week. Rep. 828; Mussett v. Burch, 35 L. T. N. S. 486.

Where a river runs through a manor the legal presumption is that the right of fishing belongs to those owning land on its side, and extends to the center of the stream. Lamb v. Newbiggin, 1 Car. & K. 549. In this case it was argued that where a private river runs through a manor the right to fish along the shore thereof prima facie belongs exclusively to the lord; but the court held that it belonged to those owning the land abutting on the river, and that, if a lord claims a several fishery therein, the burden is upon him to prove it.

An exclusive fishery in a private stream passes as an incident to a grant of adjoining upland. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

There is a statement in Warren v. Matthews, 1 Salk. 357, 6 Mod. 78, that a subject has a right to fish in all navigable rivers the same as in the sea; but this must be regarded as an inaccurate use of the word "navigable" when "tidal" is meant.

But the right of fishery is public in all tidal waters, and all other waters de facto navigable, where or so long as the title to the bed remains sonable precautions to prevent escape, they are so impressed with his proprietorship that a felonious taking of them from his inclosure, whether trap, cage, park, net, or whatever it may be, will be larceny. For such cases, as is clearly shown by the authorities above quoted, the law does not require absolute security against the possibility of escape, and none of the authorities cited for the defendants in error, except Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573, sustain their contention. Young v. Hichens, 6 Q. B. 606, is not applicable to this case. That was an action for the conversion of fish which were never in the plaintiff's net, but had been frightened away from entering into the plaintiff's net by the defendant, and caught in his own net.

In the present case the fish were not at large in Lake Erie. They were confined in nets, from which it was not absolutely impossible for them to escape, yet it was practically so impossible; for it seems that under ordinary circumstances few, if any, of the fish escape. The fish that were taken had not escaped, and it does not appear that they would have escaped, or even that they probably would have escaped. They were so safely secured that the owners of the nets could have taken them out of the water at will as readily as the defendants did. The possession of the owners of the nets was so complete and certain that the defendants went to the nets and raised them with absolute assurance that they could get the fish that were in them. We think, therefore, that the owners of the nets, having captured and confined the fish, had acquired such a property in them that the taking of them was larceny.

Exceptions sustained.

In the Crown. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

The common right to take fish not only extends to navigable waters, but exists as to all waters, the lands underlying which are not in private ownership,—to all lakes, ponds, or streams, navigable or otherwise, upon the public lands of a state or the United States, not protected by reservation. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 39 L. R. A. 581, 48 Pac. 374.

Where the Crown grants the land on both sides of a river above the flow of the tide, and expressly reserves the bed of the river, the public has the same common right of fishery there that it has in tidal rivers. Robertson v. Steadman, 3 Pugsley (N. B.) 621.

The old law of France in regard to the right of fishery in nonnavigable streams flowing through private lands is that it does not depend upon the ownership of land adjacent to the stream, but may be conferred by the sovereign upon individuals from whom permission must be obtained in order to enjoy the right. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

In the United States.

The strict rule of the common law as to the ownership of land under nontidal water, and therefore of the fishery, has not been followed in all of the states of the Union. So far as this change was made by the adoption of the original Constitution, it was undoubtedly proper.

So far as it was done by the legislature without constitutional authority, it deprived the riparian owner of property without due process of law, or took his property for public use without compensation. So far as it was done by the court, it was judicial legislation of the worst kind.

A fishery is property of which the owner cannot be deprived without compensation. Tudor v. Cambridge Waterworks, 1 Allen, 164.

The right of a riparian owner to fish in the water of a private river is not a riparian right in the nature of an easement, but is strictly a right of property. Queen v. Robertson, 8 Can. S. C. 52.

So far as the mere angling with hook and line is concerned, the exercise of the right by the public is subject to no serious objection; but the establishment of the principle involves the use of destructive modes of fishing, as well as the liability to trespass on the adjoining land.

From the earliest times, fisheries were recognized as part of the estate. Maitland's Domesday, 330.

Most of the states have followed the common law without question.

Above the ebbing and flowing of the tide the right of fishery belongs exclusively to the adjoining proprietors. Adams v. Pease, 2 Conn. 481.

The right of fishing in a canal is incident to the soil. Woolrych, Waters, p. 65.

A grant of the exclusive enjoyment of a non-navigable inland stream to a mill owner confers an exclusive fishery, and there is no implied power reserved to the state to regulate it. People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 195, 8 Am. Dec. 382.

The common law limits the exclusive right of fishing in streams not navigable, nor public waters, in the riparian owner of the soil. Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349.

Grant of riparian lands on a private stream confers right to an exclusive fishery. State v. Glen, 52 N. C. (7 Jones L.) 321.

The fishery in a river emptying into one of the Great Lakes, in which there is no ebb and flow of the tide, is not free or common to all, but belongs exclusively to the owners of the adjacent land. Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. 90, 11 Am. Dec. 249.

The riparian proprietor on a nonnavigable stream owns the fishery to the middle of the stream opposite his banks. Ingram v. Threadgill, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 59.

Under the statutes and interstate agreement with New Jersey, the fisheries in the Delaware river are exclusive, and originally belonged to the owner of the upland, but may be leased, sold, or devised to a person not owning the adjoining shore. Hart v. Hill, 1 Whart. 124.

Even in Washington, which has departed as far from the common law of riparian rights as any of the states, it is said that, even in a navigable or public river, the right of fishing remains in the owner of the bank, the public only having an easement over the stream; and the taking of fish therefrom would be a trespass against the riparian proprietor. Griffith v. Holman, 23 Wash. 347, 54 L. R. A. 178, 63 Pac. 239.

In most of the cases dealing with this question the courts have followed the inaccurate use of the word "navigable" as being synonymous with "tidal," which originated with Chancellor Kent (see note to Willow River Club v. Wade [Wis.] 42 L. R. A. 305); so that, when they state that the right of fishery in nonnavigable streams is private, they intend to follow the common-law rule, and hold that the right is private except in tide waters.

There is no question but that the riparian proprietor of land on a nonnavigable, nontidal stream has the fishery to the middle of the stream. Jackson v. Lewis, Cheves L. 259.

If a stream is not navigable for boats or any water craft, the owner of the land can exclude everyone from the right of fishing. Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 383.

Massachusetts at first followed the common-law rule.

Proprietors of land on the Connecticut river, above the flowing of the tide, have an exclusive right of fishing, and of the use of the water generally, to the middle of the river, subject only to the public right of passage, with boats, rafts, etc. White v. Whittier, 2 Dane Abr. 702.

The fishery in nontidal, though navigable, waters is the property of the riparian owner, exclusive so far as the taking of fish is concerned; but as to their passage, that others may enjoy the same privilege, the maxim, Sic utere, etc., applies, and he cannot place a dam across the stream without providing an adequate fishway. Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 199, 16 Am. Dec. 386.

In Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 383, it is said that the legislature, in establishing the right to occupy fresh-water streams not connected with the sea for the use of mills, made no provision in regard to fish. And that the right of fishery in such streams was exclusive in the owner of the banks.

But this rule was changed by statute. How the change could be made, and the right to the fishery be taken from the owner and vested in the public without compensating the owner, in the face of a constitutional provision that "whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor,"—is difficult to understand. It may be that the individual demanded no compensation, for the question of his right to it does not seem to have been presented to the courts.

However, by a long course of legislation in Massachusetts the right of fishery, even in private streams, is paramount in the public, to that extent changing the common law. But, as against all others than the public, the riparian owners of fishing privileges have the rights which belong to private property. Cole v. Eastham, 138 Mass. 65.

The right of fishery in such rivers as the Connecticut and Merrimac has been regarded by the laws and decisions of Massachusetts for upwards of a century and a half as a public right even above the points where navigable. Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 183.

By reason of the form of the early grants in Pennsylvania, it has been held that the title to the beds of its principal rivers did not pass to the riparian owners.

The right of piscary must be a right appurtenant to the soil covered with water; and, since the Susquehanna and similar navigable nontidal streams have been treated as though tidal as regards riparian boundaries, the fishery is vested in the public. Carson v. Blazer, 2 Binn. 475, 4 Am. Dec. 463; also Shrunk v. Schuylkill Nav. Co. 14 Serg. & R. 71.

An exclusive fishery in a navigable stream must be established by grant, actual or prescriptive. Carson v. Blazer, 2 Binn. 475.

The grantee of a riparian owner's right of fishery "as heretofore conducted" in a public stream cannot recover damages from another fishing therein, but is entitled to damages for 60 L. R. A.

a deprivation of an appurtenant easement to draw nets on and pass over the upland to which the fishery was formerly appurtenant, when such acts are used with the fishery "as heretofore conducted." Harvey v. Vandegrift, 1 W. N. C. 629.

In South Carolina it was held first that the right of fishing in a stream which is navigable in fact and actually used by the public for purposes of navigation is common in equal degree to the whole community. Boatwright v. Bookman, Rice L. 447.

But in McCullough v. Wall, 4 Rich. L. 68, 53 Am. Dec. 715, the court held that the common-law rule giving the common right of fishing in waters in which the tide ebbs and flows does not apply to streams not affected by the tide, but which have been rendered navigable or floatable by artificial means,—at least to that part of a stream above a falls which, in their natural state, obstruct the serviceable use of the river.

And Wardlaw, J., stated that neither the common-law rule relating to the right of fishing in waters affected by the ebb and flow of the tide, nor the one relating to the title to the land under such waters, had been applied in South Carolina to streams not affected by the tide, although they may be navigable or floatable. Ibid.

In Wisconsin the legislature has asserted the public right of fishery in every floatable stream, and the court has upheld the legislation.

The public use of a stream navigable in fact for the floatage of logs and small boats includes the right to fish, and such stream is a public water within the meaning of a statute asserting title to the fish in such waters and permitting any individual to take the fish, although the title to the bed of the stream is in the riparian owner; so that one fishing from a boat in the stream is not guilty of trespassing upon such owner's rights. Willow River Club v. Wade, 100 Wis. 86, 42 L. R. A. 305, 76 N. W. 273.

The fishery in public waters may be enjoyed as of common right and without showing right by grant or prescription. Wright v. Mulvaney, 78 Wis. 89, 0 L. R. A. 807, 46 N. W. 1045.

The public right of fishery does not extend to streams which are nonnavigable in their natural condition. Burroughs v. Whitwam, 59 Mich. 279, 26 N. W. 491.

II. Grant of exclusive right to individual.

a. Right to make.

There is no doubt that, under Selden's conception of the rights of the Crown in the seas surrounding the British coast, the right of fishery was a perquisite, to be used or disposed of for the benefit of the Crown. This, also, is the idea found in the case of the Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149. The doctrine of the Crown's trusteeship does not seem to have been advanced until after the deposition of Charles I., and the time and place of its beginning do not clearly appear. Even as late as Carter v. Murcot, 4 Burr. 2162, the court, in speaking of the right of fishery, says: That in navigable rivers the proprietors of the land on each side have not the exclusive right of fishery; that navigable rivers or arms of the sea belong to the Crown; and that the Crown may grant a several fishery in a navigable river where the sea flows and reflows, or in an arm of the sea.

In modern times the limitation upon the power of the Crown is usually ascribed to Magna Charta, but a reference to the provisions of that instrument shows that it contained no specific reference to the right of fishery. The clause mostly relied on for that purpose is known as chapter 23, and is as follows: All weirs from henceforth shall be utterly put down by Thames and Medway, and through all England, but only by the seacoasts. The law has always been that the owner of a fishery on a river could not operate it so as to prevent the fish from passing up to fisheries higher on the stream. The placing of weirs and traps near the mouth of such streams as Thames and Medway might completely destroy the possibility of fish reaching the manors of the barons living along the stream, and be a serious interference with their rights. Looking at the words of the statute, and considering them in the light of the surrounding circumstances, it would seem that the object of that section was to prevent the maintenance, by the King's license, of such infringements upon the barons' rights, and not to prevent the granting of exclusive rights of fishery.

Another chapter of the charter which is sometimes referred to as affecting the Crown's right to grant several fisheries is 16, which reads as follows: "No river banks shall be guarded (placed in defense, — defendantur) from henceforth, but such as were in defense in the time of King Henry, our grandfather, by the same places and the same bounds as they were wont to be in his time."

Some support is given to the contention that that chapter limited the right of the Crown to grant several fisheries by Coke's commentary on it as follows: "That is, that no owner of the banks of rivers shall so appropriate or keep the rivers several to him to defend or barre others, either to have passage or fish there otherwise than they were used in the reign of Henry II." 2 Inst. 30.

There is little reason to doubt that Lord Coke entirely misconceived the purpose of that chapter. He himself states, on the authority of the Mirror, that the statute is out of use, for "many rivers are now appropriated and placed in defense which used to be common for fishing and use in the time of Henry II."

Lord Hale's explanation of this chapter is as follows: "Before the statute of Magna Charta, chap. 16, it was frequent for the King to put as well fresh as salt rivers in defensio for his recreation; that is, to bar fishing and fowling in a river till the King had taken his pleasure or advantage of the writ de defensione riparia." De Jure Maris, chap. II.

Lord Hale further states that the form of the writ was changed so as to require the placing in defense of such rivers only as were in defense in the time of Henry II. He further states that, as the custom created great trouble to the country and little benefit or addition of pleasure to the King, it "hath long been disused."

When it is remembered that Magna Charta was intended to check the encroachment of the Crown upon the rights of the barons, and that, according to Lord Hale's interpretation, chapter 16 was immediately put into operation and given its intended effect, while, according to Lord Coke's, it was not in use, the conclusion is irresistible that Lord Coke misapprehended its scope, and that it did not affect the granting of private fisheries. In all probability Magna Charta was not intended to deal with any claim of power to grant exclusive fisheries. In fact, the strongest authority in support of the Crown's right came into existence several centuries after that instrument was established. The fact is, the courts are by no means agreed as to the scope and effect of chapter 23 of the charter. In Rolle v. Whyte, L. R. 3 Q. B. 286, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 105, 17 L. T. N. S. 560, 16 Week. Rep. 503, 8 Best & S. 118, the court said, while, in Magna Charta, kiddell or weirs generally are mentioned as to be put down, not only in the Thames and Medway, but also per totam Angliam nisi per coeterum maris, in the key to this enactment, to be found in 25 Edw. III. St. 4, chap. 4, after citing that the common passage of ships and boats in the great rivers of England be oftentimes disturbed by the levying of weirs, mills, etc., to the great damage of the people, it is provided that "all such weirs, mills, stanks, stakes, and kiddies, which were levied and set up in the time of King Edward, the King's grandfather, and after till now in such [tidal] rivers, whereby the said ships and boats be disturbed, shall be put out and utterly pulled down without being renewed." Hence, such use is not prohibited in municipal corporations in nonnavigable waters.

And it is further said that the Magna Charta and the succeeding statutes prohibiting the acquisition of a fishing weir in a river, including the act of 12 Edw. IV., relate to navigable rivers only. Ibid.

If such conclusion is correct, then that chapter was leveled, not at interference with fishing rights, but with those of navigation.

In Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 498, Judge Woodworth said that, under the authorities, the Crown may grant an exclusive fishery in tidal waters, and by grant of Chas. II. the Duke of York had and could grant same in New York.

The court examined fully the contention as to chapter 16, and concluded that it did not affect the question.

But in Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Barb. 586, while choosing to decide the case on other grounds, the judge noted that the force of Magna Charta upon royal grants of private fisheries as stated in Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 498, was against the weight of authority, and that Judge Woodworth failed to distinguish between grants by the Crown alone, and with concurrence of the legislature.

However, in Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56, the court said that Magna Charta was only intended to restrain the King from granting exclusive rights of fishery disconnected with any rights of soil, in disregard of the rights of the owner of the soil.

And, following that case, the court, in Robins v. Ackerly, 91 N. Y. 98, held that the King had the right to grant soil under water, and with it exclusive rights of fishery.

It thus appears that there is no agreement as to what weight is to be given to Magna Charta upon this question, and it is very probable that the attempt has been made to compel the charter to do a duty it was never intended to do. A more logical explanation of the curtailment of the power of the Crown is found in Freeman, English Const. 2d ed. p. 139, where it is said that, at the time of their coronation, the English sovereigns are required to cede to the people certain of the rights which were formerly part of the regalia.

Whatever the cause, the course of decision has been that formerly the Crown had a right to make private grants of fishing rights, but that now he cannot do so. And the present disability is to some extent given a retroactive effect, so that a grant must be an ancient one to be upheld.

Contrary to the civil-law rule that all rivers and seas are public and the fisheries therein common to all, as stated in Bracton, lib. 2, chap. 12, by the common law of England a man may have a several fishery. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

Prior to Magna Charta the Crown had the right to create a several fishery in tidal water, which he could grant to a private individual even after the adoption of that statute. Malcolmsom v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. Cas. 593, 9 Jur. N. S. 1185, 9 L. T. N. S. 93, 12 Week. Rep. 178.

Fishings in the open sea were subject to feudal grant. Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 419.

Though the soil of navigable rivers be in the King, and prima facie the fishing is in the subject, yet one may have a fishery in particular, exclusive of others, in a common river. Fitzwalter's Case, 3 Keble, 242, 459, 555.

In O'Neill v. Allen, 9 Ir. C. L. Rep. 155, a question involving the existence of a several fishery in the sea, the court says: It seems to be settled that there may be a several fishery, not only in a navigable river, but in an arm of the sea or on the sea coast, although outside of the river.

An appropriation before Magna Charta, properly evidenced by subsequent user and dominion as of right, establishes a several fishery in tidal waters. Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 81 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169.

Where a several right of fishery has been exercised for a long period of time, it will be presumed that such right to a fishery has existed from time immemorial; and consequently, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that it was created by a valid grant by the Crown anterior to the Magna Charta, under which a subsequent grant of such a fishery would have been void. Northumberland v. Houghton, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 66, L. R. 5 Exch. 127, 22 L. T. N. S. 491, 18 Week. Rep. 495.

The existence of a several fishery in the sea, under a title obtained prior to Magna Charta, may be presumed from proof of modern user carried back as far as living memory, from which an anterior user may be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary. O'Neill v. Allen, 9 Ir. C. L. Rep. 182.

No several fishery in tidal navigable waters can be presumed if commencing in a later reign than Henry II. Edgar v. English Fisheries, 23 L. T. N. S. 732.

A several fishery in tidal waters cannot be presumed. A claim thereto must be established by a title existing anterior to Magna Charta. Carlisle v. Graham, L. R. 4 Exch. 361, 38 L. J. Exch. N. S. 226, 21 L. T. N. S. 133, 18 Week. Rep. 318.

A franchise granting a several right of fishery in a navigable river, where the tide flows and reflows, could not be granted after the Magna Charta. Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 Barn. & C. 886, 1 Dowl. & R. 747.

Every subject of common right may fish with lawful nets, etc., in a navigable river as well as in the sea, and the King's grant cannot bar them thereof; but the Crown only has a right to royal fish, and that the King only may grant Warren v. Matthews, 6 Mod. 73, 1 Salk. 357.

If, however, a tidal river in which there was prima facie a right in the public to fish was appropriated by an individual or by the Crown before Magna Charta, that individual, or the Crown, if the Crown has got it back, can grant it after Magna Charta. Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 31 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169.

In Little v. Wingfield, 11 Ir. C. L. Rep. 63. Affirming 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 279, it was held that where a several fishery in a tidal river granted before Magna Charta had reverted in the Crown, and been regranted in fee simple to one through whom the plaintiffs claimed and in whose chain of title there was a break, the possession of the plaintiff and his privies for sixty or seventy years was sufficient to raise a presumption of a grant from the grantee of the Crown.

Magna Charta, when it again passes to the Crown it does not become extinct, but it is presumed to be "nominally yielded up for the purpose of regnant;" and this is not altered where it was "surrendered." Saltash v. Goodman, L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 431.

The legal origin and existence of an ancient fishery will be presumed from uninterrupted enjoyment under a grant from the Crown, which grant, although since Magna Charta, describes the fishery as having previously existed. Bridges v. Highton, 11 L. T. N. S. 658.

A several salmon fishery in a tidal river, granted by the Crown before Magna Charta, does not, on reverting to the Crown, merge in the prerogative of the Crown, but may be regranted to a subject. Northumberland v. Houghton, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 66, L. R. 5 Exch. 127, 22 L. T. N. S. 491, 18 Week. Rep. 495. This was a mere expression of opinion by the court, as the case was determined upon another point.

The great charter left untouched all fisheries which were made several, to the exclusion of the public, by act of the Crown not later than the reign of Henry II.; so that, where a fishery has been long treated as of right, distinct and separate property to the exclusion of the public, and there is nothing to show that its origin was modern, it must have been created before legal memory. Malcolmsom v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. Cas. 593, 9 Jur. N. S. 1135, 9 L. T. N. S. 93, 12 Week. Rep. 178.

Crown grants in America.

The above discussion has its chief interest in its bearing upon certain Crown grants in this country during the colonial period. At the time these grants were made there seems to be no authority to deny the power of the Crown to grant fisheries. Having the power, the question whether or not the rights passed to his grantees is a matter of construction. If the rights were granted, and the proprietaries of the territory granted them into private ownership before the Revolution, there is no reason why the rights of such grantees should not be upheld. On the other hand, as to all rights not granted by the King, or which he reassumed, or which had not reached the possession of colonists who espoused the cause of the revolutionists before their independence was secured, the Revolution cut them off, and they passed into the possession of the newly formed states for the common good.

In Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57, it is said that the royal grant of Maine to the Georges did not alter the common law, jus publicum, as to fisheries.

In Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. L. 4, 10 Am. Dec. 356, it is said that since Magna Charta the fisheries in tidal waters, not then exclusive, have been held by the Crown in trust for the public, and cannot become the subject of private property.

Also that the provincial proprietor in New Jersey obtained no greater rights to the public fisheries than were held by the Crown. Ibid.

So that, under grants from the King to the Duke of York, thence to Sir George Carteret and Lord Berkley, the proprietors of New Jersey took no such title in the soil of navigable waters below low-water mark as to enable them to grant a several fishery. Ibid.

So, in Gough v. Bell, 21 N. J. L. 156, it is said that the Crown could not grant a several fishery in New Jersey waters, since such rights were a part of the royal regalia held in trust for the public, subject to the laws of England regarding their alienation.

And in Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Barb. 586, the court said that the weight of authority is against the right of the King to grant an exclusive fishery in the sea, although the grant might have been made by Parliament.

And in Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 369, 10 L. ed. 997, 998, it is said that, while there is nothing in the charters to the Duke of York of 1664 and 1674 granting to him lands now included in New Jersey with all the royal prerogatives and interest therein, which appears to have altered in any way the common-law rights of a public fishery for floating or shell fish in tidal waters, if there was, it was included in the surrender of all such prerogatives to the Crown in 1702.

Since an exclusive fishery in navigable waters could not be made after Magna Charta, there can be neither a grant nor presumption thereof in Pennsylvania, the title to the bed being in the state. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

A large part of this struggle to nullify the power of the Crown to make the grants was needless, as it was futile. Where the grants had been lawfully made common justice required that they should be upheld, while the principles stated above were sufficient to dispose of all not so made.

Legislative grants.

Notwithstanding the denial of the power of the Crown, there is no doubt that the people themselves can make valid grants of fisheries to private individuals. If they have not limited the power of their representatives, the latter may make them. Therefore, all argument which has been adduced to overthrow the power of the Crown for the purpose of limiting the power of the legislature is wasted because the legislature possesses, not only the power of the Crown, but of Parliament also.

Although the power of the Crown to grant private fisheries in tidal waters was restrained by Magna Charta, the right of Parliament to do so is undoubted. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

There is no ground for questioning the power of the legislature to authorise a grant to private individuals of a public fishery. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175.

But neither the provinces, except Quebec, nor the Dominion, can, without legislative authority, grant exclusive rights of fishing in tidal waters, except in tidal waters within the limits and jurisdiction of the provinces respectively. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

At the Revolution the Crown's title to the sea shore with the proprietorship of fisheries, shell and floating, thereon or over, passed to the states, and is subject to disposal or regulation as the legislature may determine. Rowe v. Smith, 48 Conn. 444.

When New Jersey acquired sovereignty the state acquired all right and control over public waters and fisheries before pertaining to Parliament or the Crown. Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 369, 10 L. ed. 997, 998; Den es dem. Russell v. Jersey Co. 15 How. 432, 14 L. ed. 760.

The legislative and judicial departments of the government have from an early period recognized a property in the riparian owners in the fisheries adjacent to their lands lying upon the tidewaters of the Delaware, which is exclusive of the common right of fishery which subsists at common law in all public waters. Fitzgerald v. Faunce, 46 N. J. L. 596.

While navigable tide waters for navigation and fishery are common to all the people of the state, these public rights may be abridged or 60 L. R. A.

taken away by the legislature, which became by the Revolution the depository, not alone of the royal prerogatives, but of the powers of Parliament as well. Wooley v. Campbell, 37 N. J. L. 163.

In Den es dem. Blispham v. Rice, cited in Gough v. Bell, 22 N. J. L. 468, private recovery was had for a fishery in public water, without any question, apparently, as to the ownership of the public.

Where the state has reserved the power of regulating fisheries in nonnavigable streams, it may grant a stranger a right of fishery in such a stream to the exclusion of the riparian owner. Lunt v. Hunter, 16 Me. 9.

Title to an exclusive fishing privilege in a navigable river may be obtained by actual or presumptive grant. Carter v. Tinicum Fishing Co. 77 Pa. 310.

The ownership and control of fisheries in navigable waters is in the state; and it may grant individual rights and privileges therein either directly or through a committee; and it may empower the committee to grant privileges outside of the navigable waters of the town of which they are residents. Rowe v. Smith, 48 Conn. 444.

The compact between Pennsylvania and New Jersey of 1783 recognizes a right of several fishery in the riparian owners on the Delaware river above tidal waters. Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 1.

The proprietors of New Jersey acquired, by the compact of 1676, no right of fishery in the Delaware to the common use of which they could grant a right to the inhabitants of New Jersey; but the right to the entire bed of the river remained in the Crown till the Revolution, when it accrued to the state in its sovereign capacity. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

In Shreeves v. Liveson, 2 N. J. L. 247, it is intimated that individuals may have a several fishery in a tidal river.

It is within the competency of the legislature to grant to a person a several fishery in a public stream in a place which he may clear out and occupy as a fishing place. Munson v. Baldwin, 7 Conn. 168.

The power of the legislature to grant an exclusive privilege to fish in certain waters, for a limited time, was decided in Walker v. Stone, 17 Wash. 578, 50 Pac. 488; and Halleck v. Davis, 22 Wash. 398, 60 Pac. 1116.

Fishery in tidal waters is presumptively free, but may become exclusive to the owner of the adjacent land by grant or prescription. Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56.

A fishery in nontidal, navigable waters may be acquired by grant or prescription. Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369.

The King, or the state as his successor, has the right to grant the exclusive right to fisheries except so far as the right conflicts with the grant of the adjacent upland. People v. Thompson, 30 Hun, 457.

A statute giving county supervisors power to legislate for the protection and preservation of fish within their counties does not give them power to confer exclusive rights of fishing in tide waters. Hallock v. Dornay, 7 Hun, 52, Reversed upon other grounds in 69 N. Y. 238.

The right of fishery in tidal waters is prima facie in the public, "which belongs to all inhabitants of the town," unless restricted by acts of the legislature or of the town, inconsistent therewith, or by prescription. Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216.

A common-law right to a common fishery in the Delaware river is not secured to the inhabitants of New Jersey by either the state or Federal Constitution. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

But in Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. L. 4, 10 Am. Dec. 356, it is said that at the Revolution the commonwealth became the depository of all the royal and parliamentary rights over fisheries in tidal waters, and, while it can make regulations for, and grant, private privileges therein to secure their improvement, it cannot consistently, by direct and absolute grant, divest all citizens of their common right.

And in Slingerland v. International Contracting Co. 43 App. Div. 215, 60 N. Y. Supp. 12, it is said that to grant to one person the exclusive right of fishing in any part of the Hudson river would unconstitutionally deprive, without due process of law, every other person of his privilege of fishing there.

How that result can be reached by any process of reasoning is difficult to understand. Individuals have no constitutional rights of that kind as part of the general public. Public rights are subject at all times to the control of the legislature.

The Dominion Parliament has no jurisdiction to enact laws conferring on lessees or licensees of the Dominion a right of fishing in any waters, navigable or nonnavigable, the beds and banks of which are assigned to the provinces by statute. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

Nor to interfere with the right of the owners of beds of nonnavigable waters to fish therein, by authorizing the giving of leases or licenses for the right of fishing in such waters. Ibid.

b. How made.

The determination of what is necessary to effect a grant of a fishery requires an inquiry into what a fishery is, and to what it pertains.

And, first, a fishery is real estate, for it lieth in grant and tenure; by a grant of it the soil passeth; monstraverunt and assize lie of it; it is demandable by præcipe; and it is a freehold in itself. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

So, upon the death of a person placing fish in a pond, they pass to his heirs; otherwise where they have been placed in a trunk or narrow place, to be taken out at pleasure. Greyes's Case, Owen, 20.

A general definition of a fishery, sufficient for present purposes, may be a right to employ within a particular stretch of water lawful means for the taking of the fish which may be found there. It is to be distinguished from a fishing place or the right to use a particular shore or beach as a basis for carrying on the business. The latter is always vested in the shore owner, and is entirely distinct from the right to take fish from the water.

A "place of fishing" in tidal waters is that part of the shore used for employing seines and nets, or other engines, and for bringing the fish to land, and not any part of the tide waters in which they are swimming; so that a grant of a fishing place in such waters will not divest the public of its right to take fish in those waters, unless such intention is clearly expressed. Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140.

The definition of a pool or fishing place, in § 3 of the act of 1808, relating to the Delaware river, to be from the place where seines or nets are usually or may hereafter be thrown into the water to the place where they are taken out, applies only to a place on the shore to which a fishery is annexed, and does not refer to a claim of fishery by common right on such river. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

bounded by a navigable stream, as referred to in statutes, comprise the exclusive privilege of drawing his seines on the shore. Shrunk v. Schuylkill Nav. Co. 14 Serg. & R. 71; Carson v. Blaser, 2 Binn. 475, 4 Am. Dec. 463.

But in Parker v. Thomson, 21 Or. 523, 28 Pac. 502, it is said that the term "fishing grounds" has never been held applicable to the bank of a tide stream or slough, or the beach of the ocean.

A person fishing by claim of common right on a river can be in no sense the owner or possessor of a fishery. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

Furthermore, a fishery, so far as exercised upon another's soil, is a profit à prendre.

Therefore, it cannot be claimed by way of easement. Albright v. Cortright, 64 N. J. L. 330, 48 L. R. A. 618, 45 Atl. 634; Cobb v. Davenport, 83 N. J. L. 223, 97 Am. Dec. 718.

The questions then arise: Is it inclusive or subordinate? Does a grant of fishery carry the other necessary elements, or is a grant of water or soil requisite to pass a fishery?

When the soil over which the water runs, and the water itself, belong to the same person, the owner cannot be correctly said to have a right of fishery, because the land and its profits are so completely identified as his inheritance that they cannot be separated. Woolrych, Waters, p. 110.

Therefore, the fishery is included in land and water; and since, in the absence of express reservation, land includes water, a grant of land will include both water and fishery.

The presumption is that a grant of land on a river above the ebb and flow of the tide passes the right of fishery to the grantee. If the right is expressly reserved, the Crown may grant the right of fishery to another person, and there is no common right of fishery in the public. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

The Crown, in right of the provinces, can grant the beds of navigable lakes and nontidal navigable rivers; in which case the exclusive right of fishing, unless expressly reserved, passes to the grantee as an incident of the ownership of the soil in the bed, and the province can also grant an exclusive right of fishing in the same waters, distinct from and without any grant of the bed. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

The right to fish depends upon the right to the soil upon which it is taken; and the lord of the manor has no greater right in this respect than any other person as owner. Clarke v. Mercer, 1 East. & F. 492.

Prima facie the ownership of the fishery in nontidal, though navigable, waters is in the owner of the bed. Cobb v. Davenport, 82 N. J. L. 369.

The right of fishery in nonnavigable waters prima facie is in the owner of the soil, and the presumption is against title in another. McFarlin v. Essex Co. 10 Cush. 309.

But a royal fishery is a fishery in gross, and will not pass as an appurtenance to the adjoining lands by general words. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

That the fishery is primarily attached to the soil is illustrated by cases in which a river has changed its course.

In Carlisle v. Graham, L. R. 4 Exch. 361, 38 L. J. Exch. N. S. 226, 21 L. T. N. S. 833, 18 Week. Rep. 318, it is said that the locus of a subject's several fishery in a tidal river does not change with that of the river, which has permanently receded from a portion of its course and flows into and through another course, where the soil and the land on both sides of the new channel thus formed belong to another subject; since the Crown could not have granted a several fishery in the new channel, not having title to the soil thereof, no fishery could have been created in the locus in quo, since, before Magna Charta, it was dry land.

Bramwell, B., said that when the owner of a several fishery in a tidal river changes the course of the river onto the land of another he cannot reasonably claim the fishery on such lands. Ibid.

And that a several fishery must be "capable of ascertainment;" it must have been granted or acquired by metes and bounds, or as extending from one definite point to another, and cannot be changed therefrom with the course of the river onto another's lands. Ibid.

But where the channel of a tidal river running through an estuary and being visible when the tide is out, but entirely covered when the tide is in, changes its course, though still flowing through the estuary, by leaving the old channel nearly dry so that salmon can pass up the new channel, a several right of fishery therein, enjoyed by two persons each to the middle of the old channel, passes to the new channel, and each is entitled to the same right of fishery therein as he had in the old one. Miller v. Little, Ir. L. R. 4 C. L. 302, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 304.

And where the river has changed its channel gradually, Carlisle v. Graham, L. R. 4 Exch. 861, 38 L. J. Exch. N. S. 226, 21 L. T. N. S. 333, 18 Week. Rep. 318, does not apply; and the riparian proprietor on such a stream, who has an appurtenant right of fishery therein, either from ownership of the bed or otherwise, is not deprived thereof by the shifting of the stream, his boundaries being ipso facto shifted, under the law of accretions. Foster v. Wright, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 488, 49 L. J. C. P. N. S. 97, 44 J. P. 7.

So that where the lord of a manor, having by grant a several fishery in a nontidal stream running through the manor, enfranchised some of his land which was somewhat distant from the river, the owner of the enfranchised land does not gain a right of fishery in the river by its subsequently encroaching upon his land until part of it forms a portion of the bed of the stream, but the exclusive right of fishery over the entire bed of the river remains in the lord of the manor, notwithstanding its gradual encroachment onto the enfranchised land. Ibid.

The court said that it was immaterial whether the plaintiff's right of fishery existed as an incident to his ownership of the soil or was independent of it, being a mere exclusive right to fish in the river, as, if it depends on his ownership of the soil, the encroachment inures to him as the owner of the soil; if it is a mere right of fishery, it extends over the entire river, even though it continues gradually to change its course. Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., in concurring, doubted whether the soil of the river belonged to the lord of the manor, though, if it did, the encroachment would inure to his benefit; but held that, even though the lord of the manor had a mere right of fishery, the fishery would follow the slow and gradual flow of the river in its encroachment upon adjoining land.

If a new cut, now a recognized part of a certain river, did not exist at the time of a grant of the right of fishery in the river at a part which now includes the new cut, the right to fish in the new cut is not given by the grant. O'Neill v. McErlaine, 16 Ir. Ch. Rep. 280.

There is an exception to the above rule where public rights exist in the water. When such is the case a mere grant of the soil will not 60 L. R. A.

carry the water or fishery, but those will remain in the public, and require special mention to pass them to the grantee.

A grant of soil under tidal waters will not be presumed to include the fishery in such waters. Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 493.

The mere ownership of the soil of public waters will not exclude the public from fishing there. Hall, Sea Shores, 54, 194; Gage v. Bates, 7 U. C. C. P. 116; Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140.

A state grant of a parcel of land covered with tide water, by the name of an island, without any words showing an intention to grant a fishery, will not pass the right of fishery, but that will remain public. Brink v. Richtmyer, 14 Johns. 255.

Grant of land under public waters for reclamation purposes vests no authority therein until the condition is fulfilled; and the right of common fishery exists until the vesting of private ownership. Polhemus v. Bateman, 60 N. J. L. 163, 37 Atl. 1015.

Patentees of land covered by navigable water can only claim in subordination to the rights of the public of fishery and navigation. Such land does not admit of possession and acts of ownership in the ordinary way. Hammond v. Inloes, 4 Md. 138.

Disturbing the thatch of a riparian owner by digging clams below high-water mark is not a trespass, as the public right of fishery is paramount to the private right to cut grass or sedge. Allen v. Allen, 19 R. I. 114, 30 L. R. A. 497, 32 Atl. 166.

The public has the right to take fish below high-water mark, although the soil belongs to a private individual as within the original lines of his land called for in his patent, but not below high-water mark by reason of the gradual encroachments of the sea. Bickel v. Polk, 5 Harr. (Del.) 325.

The public has a right to take shell fish from the shore of a private individual between high and low water mark. Weston v. Sampson, 8 Cush. 347, 54 Am. Dec. 764; Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216.

The public has a right to take shell fish upon the land of a private individual between high and low water mark, although it is necessary to dig the soil in order to obtain them. Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day, 28; Parker v. Cutler Milldam Co. 20 Me. 353, 37 Am. Dec. 56; Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 493, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

The Massachusetts colonial ordinance did not give the owner of the upland the right to exclude the public from taking shell fish upon flats until he had actually appropriated them by filling or placing buildings upon them. Lake-man v. Burnham, 7 Gray, 437.

Since it is now well settled that there is a public right to take shell fish on the shore and flats below high-water mark and within 100 rods of the upland, until the flats are inclosed by the proprietors, a fortiori there is a right to pass over them for fishing in the stricter sense; and there is no trespass chargeable against one who enters upon the said flats from tidal waters, walks along them, and takes trout, in the exercise of his common right. Packard v. Ryder, 144 Mass. 440, 59 Am. Rep. 101, 11 N. E. 578.

But in one case it was held that the right to take mussel on shore between high and low water marks is with the private ownership of the soil. Le Strange v. Rowe, 4 Fost. & F. 1048.

And in Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56, it was held that a grant of land under tidal waters will convey a several fishery thereover.

And the public has no right to take shell fish from flats lying between high and low water mark which have been improved by the owner for more than twenty years. Ipswich v. Herrick, 9 Gray, 529.

Both water and fishery may be separated from the soil.

In the River Severn the soil belongs to the lords on either side, and a special sort of fishing belongs to them, while the common sort of fishing is common to all. The soil of the River Thames is in the King, and it is common to all fishermen; and, therefore, there is no such contradiction between the soil being in one and the river being common to all fishers. Fitzwater's Case, 1 Mod. 105.

A fishery is included in the word "water," so that if one grants his water, the fishery in it will pass. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

If a man grant eam aquam, the soil shall not pass, but the fishery passes. Co. Litt. 4b.

It is clear, upon the authorities, that a right of fishery may exist independently of the ownership of the adjoining shore or banks. Marshall v. Ulleswater Steam Nav. Co. 3 Beat & S. 782, 82 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 139, 9 Jur. N. S. 988, 8 L. T. N. S. 416, 11 Week. Rep. 489.

Whenever the ownership of water is in one person, and the ownership of soil under the water is in another person, the right of fishing in the water belongs to the former. Turner v. Hebron, 61 Conn. 175, 14 L. R. A. 386, 22 Atl. 951.

Though the soil be not included, the fishery therein will be included, in a grant of water and other rights of the kind. Saltash v. Goodman, L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 431.

The grant of a well-defined pool or pond by the absolute owner thereof, without reservation, gives to the grantee the exclusive right to the fishery; but a grant, not only of the pond, but of all adjoining lands, gives title, not only to the water in the pond, but to the land which it covered. Gibbs v. Sweet, 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 275.

North Carolina does not adhere to the rule that the fishery may be separated from the soil, holding that there can be no several fishery in navigable, though nontidal, streams, as such a right is an incident to the ownership of the soil, a locus that cannot be granted in North Carolina. Collins v. Benbury, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 277, 38 Am. Dec. 722; Collins v. Benbury, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 118, 43 Am. Dec. 155; Fagan v. Armistead, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 433.

A several fishery in the ocean, or in a navigable stream, is not, and never has been, the subject of private ownership in North Carolina, because land covered by a navigable water course has always been expressly excluded from entry, and a grant of it by one individual to another would therefore exhibit on its face its own nullity. Den ex dem. Gilliam v. Bird, 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 280, 284, 49 Am. Dec. 379.

At common law there cannot be a several fishery in a navigable stream, because it must be predicated on a right to the underlying soil, and such a right cannot be granted under the Magna Charta, and consequently cannot arise from presumption. Collins v. Benbury, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 118, 43 Am. Dec. 155.

Although a several fishery can be acquired by a grant thereof from the owner of the soil. Collins v. Benbury, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 277, 38 Am. Dec. 722.

Grant of fishery.

The right or liberty of several fishery is not necessarily inseparable from ownership of soil. Schultes, Aquatic Rights, 85.

A fishery is separatum tenementum, which may be held apart from the ownership of adjacent land. Warrant v. Mackintosh, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 52; Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68; Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 31 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming, Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169; Beckman v. Kreamer, 43 Ill. 447, 92 Am. Dec. 146; Woolrych, Waters, p. 112.

The fact that real writs were held to lie for the recovery of a fishery is not conclusive that a several fishery must also be united with the soil, since such might have been the case in the particular instance, while in other cases quod permittat, which is not a real writ, should be used. Woolrych, Waters, p. 118.

The owner of soil beneath water may convey his fishing privileges separate from the upland. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

A fishing place may be granted separate from the soil. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

One may have several fishery in another's land. 7 Hen. VII., 13, pl. 3.

The principal controversy has been as to whether or not the grant of the fishery included the title to the soil.

A grant of a free fishery by the owner of the soil of the bed of a lake is an exclusive fishery, and does not pass title to the soil. Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68, 91. In this case the court discussed at length the question whether there was any distinction between a grant of libera piscaria and separata piscaria, and held that they were not the same, and that a grant of libera piscaria does not amount to an exclusive fishery or pass title to the soil.

If one who, being seised of a river, grants separatam piscariam in the same, and maketh livery of seisin secundum formam chartae the soil doth not pass, nor the water. Co. Litt. 4b.

There may be free fishery in another's land. 18 Edw. IV. 4, pl. 24.

But the owner of a several fishery is presumed to be the owner of the soil, whether the river be navigable or one neither navigable nor public, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Hanbury v. Jenkins [1901] 1 Ch. 401; Partheriche v. Mason, 2 Chitty, 658; Anonymous, Loft, 364.

In Hindson v. Ashby [1896] 2 Ch. 1, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 515, 74 L. T. N. S. 327, where the owner of land adjoining a nontidal river in which another had a several fishery claimed title to lands forming to his land as an accretion, the court, in speaking of the presumption of ownership of the soil arising from a several fishery, says: The presumption of ownership in the defendant's predecessors as owners of the several fisheries displaces the presumption that would otherwise arise in favor of the riparian proprietors being the owners of the bed of the river to the center of the stream.

If a man have a fishery in another's soil, he may justify the fixing of poles in the soil, or any other thing done. 2 Rolle Abr. 564, pl. 3.

The title to the bed of a river passes under a grant from the Crown of several fishery, together with the weirs in and upon the waters and rivers mentioned; and where the grant was an ancient one, it passed, not only the soil on which the weirs were constructed, but the soil over which the river runs, and upon which there is a right to construct weirs for the purpose of taking fish, as in ancient times weirs were the means of taking fish by means of putting an obstruction across the stream and intercepting them as they went up. Hanbury v. Jenkins [1901] 1 Ch. 401.

Blackstone (2 Com. 39) intimates that a several fishery comprehends the soil, but Butler's note, 181, to Co. Litt. 122a, favors Coke's statement that a granting of a right of fishery does not pass title to the soil. Also Co. Litt. 4b.

A plea of freehold to an action of trespass on a several fishery is good. 10 Hen. VII., 24, pl. 1.

Since the right of fishery is so intimately connected with the soil, it is not strange that it should be contended that a grant of a fishery includes the soil. From the authorities it seems that it may or may not do so, and that the question whether it will or not depends upon the intention of the parties.

The presumption that the owner of a several fishery is the owner of the soil will be indulged in only where the terms of the grant under which he claims are unknown; but when they appear and are such as convey an incorporeal hereditament only, the presumption is destroyed. Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 Barn. & C. 375, 1 Dowl. & R. 747.

A grant by the Crown of a several fishery in a navigable stream conveys no property in the soil, and is not a territorial, but is an incorporeal, franchise. Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 Barn. & C. 386, 8 Dowl. & R. 756.

A grant of a separatis piscariis passes nothing but a right to take the fish and to use such means as are necessary for that purpose, "which is in truth nothing more than a liberty to fish." Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 Barn. & C. 384, 8 Dowl. & R. 756.

But in King v. Old Arlesford, 1 T. R. 358, in determining whether a pauper had a settlement, the court held that where he rented "the fishery of a pond with the spear, sedge, flags, and rushes growing in and about the same," the soil passed with it.

A fishery must have been a several fishery, and presumably includes the soil thereof, when in a feoffment the description of fishery is left uncertain, but is made with livery of seisin duly indorsed, conveyed subject to a free rent to the lord of the manor; the livery not being appropriate in case of an incorporeal hereditament, and a free rent being incapable of being reserved from such an estate by a common person. Marshall v. Ulleswater Steam Nav. Co. 3 Best & S. 732, 32 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 139, 9 Jur. N. S. 988, 8 L. T. N. S. 416, 11 Week. Rep. 489.

Riparian rights.

It has been said in a New Brunswick case that the right of fishery does not depend upon the ownership of the bed of a river, but of the bank; it depends upon the lateral, and not the vertical, contact of the water of the river. Steadman v. Robertson, 2 Pugsley & B. (N. B.) 580.

But that is not the general rule. A right of fishery is not one of the riparian rights.

Independently of statutory authorization, there is no exclusive right of fishing by the riparian proprietor opposite to his shore in any navigable stream. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

A riparian proprietor has no more title or right to fish in tidal navigable waters adjoining his land than other members of the public. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. L. 4, 10 Am. Dec. 356.

The owners of land on the banks of the Susquehanna and other principal rivers have not an exclusive right to fish in the river immediately in front of their lands, as the right to fisheries in these rivers is vested in the state and open to all. Shrunk v. Schuykill Nav. Co. 14 Serg. & R. 71.

While an adjoining proprietor on a navigable river has the exclusive right to draw a seine on his own land, the right of fishery in the river is a common right. Lay v. King, 5 Day, 72.

Riparian proprietorship confers no exclusive fishery in the public waters. Skinner v. Hettrick, 73 N. C. 53.

A plain distinction between a fishery annexed to the shore and a fishery by common right in a river is made by the Pennsylvania-New Jersey compact of 1783 authorizing the guarding of fisheries on the rivers annexed to the respective shores against interruptions by persons fishing under claim of common right on the River Delaware. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

A several fishery does not arise as an incident to riparian ownership along navigable waters, for in such waters the right of fishing is "prima facie in the King, and is public." Collins v. Benbury, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 277, 38 Am. Dec. 722.

The Crown may grant an exclusive right of fishery between high and low water lines, though the upland had previously been granted to another. Wilson v. Codyre, 27 N. B. 320.

The fishing privilege on flats may be separated from the title to the adjoining upland, and the occupant of the privilege may maintain trespass against the owner of the upland if he places a weir on said flats. Wyman v. Oliver, 75 Me. 421.

But a baronial title, even though it contains no express words as to fishing, constitutes a sufficient foundation for a claim to salmon fishing, if the requisite enjoyment and usage are established. McDonall v. Lord Advocate, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 431.

Riparian owners on the Delaware have an exclusive fishery in the fisheries established by them opposite their shores. Re Delaware Fisheries, 4 Am. L. Reg. 582.

And there the owner of upland has a right of fishery adjacent to his shore, which is capable of alienation. Fitzgerald v. Faunce, 46 N. J. L. 536.

A several fishery cannot be appurtenant to a several pasture by reason of incongruity,—and especially a fishery for taking all the fish for commercial purposes in distant parts. Edgar v. English Fisheries, 23 L. T. N. S. 732.

Construction of grants.

The grant of an exclusive fishery in tidal waters is in derogation of common right, and cannot be created by implication. Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Barb. 586.

A grant of "white fishings" in certain waters excludes all others, such as salmon. Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 419.

A royal grant of salmon fishings described by precise and definite limits constitutes a bounding charter; and the grantee cannot by usage extend his right beyond these limits. Warrant v. Mackintosh, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 52.

Half of the salmon fishing ex adverso of lands on one side of a river may mean one of two things: (1) A pro indiviso right to a moiety of the fishings all along the frontage; or (2) the whole fishing along such part of the frontage as will, having regard to the suitability of the water for fishing purposes, fairly represent a moiety. Ibid.

A grant from the Crown of a fishery passes a several fishery, although the word "several" is not used, where the grant also includes weirs, as the grant of weirs passes title to the soil, and thereby creates a several fishery. Hanbury v. Jenkins [1901] 1 Ch. 401.

A right of fishery expressly conferred by the sovereign will not be presumed to exclude the public right of fishery notwithstanding the title to the soil may be in the grantee. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

A grant from the sovereign of flats, together with a right of fishery in the waters covering them, will not be held to confer on the grantee an exclusive right of fishery. Ibid.

A royal grant of territory adjoining a river, and all fisheries within this territory except three parts of a fishery in a tidal river, will not pass the fourth part, for the King's grant passes nothing by implication. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

A special act of the legislature conferring upon a particular person, his heirs and assigns, a certain right of fishing below low-water mark is not repealed by a subsequent general enactment which does not do so in terms, or by inconsistency or repugnancy. State v. Cleland, 68 Me. 258.

An exclusive fishery cannot be predicated upon a grant from the state of liberty and license to a riparian proprietor, his heirs and assigns, to use and occupy an ancient fishing place in certain public waters, unrestricted by an act establishing a close season thereon. Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 610.

A grant of land with the fishings pertaining thereto prima facie means the fishings ex adverso of them, ad medium flum aquæ. Warland v. Mackintosh, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 52.

Because the words of a grant are sufficient to pass the fishery in the whole river if it had been then vested in the Crown, it is not ineffectual to pass the moiety of those parts of the river in which the Crown had that, and no more, to give. Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 185, 31 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169.

When it is intended to grant an exclusive right of fishery to inhabitants of a city, to the exclusion of the general public and the owner of the previously granted upland, such intention must be clearly expressed, and not left to implication. This rule affords a fair and reasonable construction, and not a strict one which must be relinquished when the grant provides that it shall be interpreted most in favor of the grantee, full effect being given to the grant. Wilson v. Codyre, 27 N. B. 320.

Land adjoining a river conveyed "subject to the right of all parties in respect of the Glen river" will not include a several fishery in the river belonging to a third party. Hamilton v. Munro, Ir. Rep. 6 C. L. 129, 19 Week. Rep. 443.

c. Private grants.

If one having a several fishery grant liberam piscariam the grantee shall have free fishing with the grantor; but if he grant piscariam suam without more, the entire fishery passes. Alderman v. Hasting, 2 Sid. 8.

As the right of fishery in a navigable river is an incorporeal hereditament, the owner cannot grant a term for years in it except by deed. Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 Barn. & C. 886, 8 Dowl. & B. 756.

The right to take fish from the private waters of another, which is merely personal to the one exercising or owning such right, and not appendant to any estate, is not capable of alienation, either by conveyance or devise. Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349.

A grant of a several fishery in navigable waters by a riparian owner who could not acquire such a right from the state is merely void, and cannot estop. Collins v. Benbury, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 277, 38 Am. Dec. 722.

The right of fishing, being an incorporeal hereditament, cannot be the subject of an exception in a lease of the adjoining land to the 60 L. R. A. center of the stream. Corker v. Payne, 18 Week. Rep. 436, Ir. Rep. 4 C. L. 380.

In the case of an ordinary lease of land on the banks of a stream, the right of fishing in the stream opposite the land passes to the lessee, unless it is specially reserved. Davies v. Jones, 18 Times L. R. 367.

The attempted reservation, by a grantor of land upon Lake Erie and Sandusky bay, of the exclusive right of fishing in the bay or lake, being a right which he never had, is inoperative; but the reservation to the grantor of the exclusive right to land on either shore to take fish, or to carry to and from the shore seines and fishing tackle, is good, since, being a right which he could grant, it is a right which he could reserve. Sloan v. Blemler, 84 Ohio St. 492.

An easement, and not a fee, is granted by an instrument conveying "one half the privilege of the fishing place," where the grantees are given the privilege of fishing only in a specified manner, the implements to be furnished by the grantor, and he to have one half of the catch. Butrick v. Tilton, 155 Mass. 461, 29 N. E. 1088.

A grant of a several fishery may be made by deed, and confers a right to enter and kill and carry away fish, and to bring actions against persons who interfere with such rights. Ecroyd v. Coulthard, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 751 [1897] 2 Ch. 554, 77 L. T. N. S. 357, 46 Week. Rep. 119, 61 J. P. 791.

A liberty to fish, granted to one, his heirs and assigns, is an interest or profit à prendre, and may be exercised by servants in the absence of the master; and the addition of "with servants or otherwise" does not limit the privilege, and exclude the exercise of it by servants. Wickham v. Hawker, 7 Mees. & W. 63.

A grant by the lord of the manor of the exclusive right of fishing in a defined part of a river is not a mere license to fish, but a right to carry away the fish caught, and constitutes an incorporeal hereditament. Fitzgerald v. Firbank [1897] 2 Ch. 96, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 529, 76 L. T. N. S. 564.

A grant of one undivided moiety of a certain lot, "and including the salmon fishery contiguous to said land," conveys a half interest in the fishery as well as of the land. Duncan v. Sylvester, 24 Me. 482, 41 Am. Dec. 400.

A grant of land beginning on the bank of a river and extending from it by various courses until the boundary comes back to the river with all the ponds, pools, water courses, and streams of water and fishing within the limits and bounds aforesaid, does not convey any exclusive right of fishery in the river to the grantee. Slingerland v. International Contracting Co. 48 App. Div. 215, 60 N. Y. Supp. 12.

A grant of a several fishery is not invalidated by a reservation to the lord of the manor of the right of taking fish for the supply of his own table, or by a reservation of oyster beds, as a partial independent right in another, or a limited liberty, does not derogate from the right of the several fishery, and one may have a several fishery, although another has the right to a particular species of fishing or a limited liberty of fishing. Seymour v. Courtenay, 5 Burr. 2816.

An exclusive right of catching the particular kinds of fish by permanent fixtures attached to the flats is acquired by the grantee of all the right of taking salmon, shad, and alewives, together with all the privileges necessary for carrying on the said fishing. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

Part of the proprietors of a pond cannot give an exclusive lease of the right of fishing therein. Com. v. Perley, 180 Mass. 460.

The rule of caveat emptor applies to the purchaser of a fishing location with full liberty and opportunity to investigate, regarding its boundary. Fall & S. Fish Co. v. Point Roberts Fishing & Canning Co. 24 Wash. 630, 64 Pac. 792.

When a riparian proprietor, in dividing his property between two grantees, conveys in the deed of one the fishery "as it has heretofore been conducted," the other has no notice thereby that the fishery extends further than grantee's shore line, as the grant referred to the manner of conducting the fishing, rather than its extent. Harvey v. Vandegrift, 89 Pa. 346.

A license to fish in the ponds of the grantor, contained in a demise of a house, in writing but not under seal, is void, as it amounts to a demise of an incorporeal hereditament which lies in grant only, and cannot pass by parol. Bird v. Higginson, 4 Nev. & M. 505, 2 Ad. & El. 698, 1 H. & W. 61.

A license to use a rod and line will not include the right to use a night line. Williams v. Long, 57 J. P. 217.

When a several fishery is appurtenant to a manor, the mere granting of land in such manor will give grantee no right in the fishery. Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 31 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169.

A conveyance of land which falls by reason of want of title in the grantor does not operate as a conveyance of a right to maintain a fishing stand on a piece of such land acquired by the grantor by prescription, as such a right is an incorporeal hereditament, not incident to the particular estate conveyed. Jackson v. Lewis, Cheves L. 259.

III. Prescriptive rights.

a. In general.

Under the doctrine that the Crown could grant an exclusive fishery in public water, title may be shown by long enjoyment under the doctrine of presumed grant. Whether or not a prescriptive title can be acquired will depend on the attitude of the courts as to the running of time against the state.

Prescriptive rights against the public have been very generally upheld. Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 5, found in Hargrave, Law Tracts, p. 18; also in note to Mather v. Chapman (Conn.) 16 Am. Rep. 56; Orford v. Richardson, 4 T. R. 437; Carter v. Murcot, 4 Burr. 2162; Gould v. James, 6 Cow. 369; Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 58; Jackson v. Lewis, Cheves L. 259; Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 382, 6 Am. Dec. 250; Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 259, 19 Am. Dec. 493.

A person may have by prescription a separate fishery in a navigable river. Reg. v. Downing, 23 L. T. N. S. 398, 11 Cox C. C. 580.

But a several fishery cannot be established in an arm of the sea, or in a navigable river, unless it is by immemorial usage. Schultes, Aquatic Rights, 85.

In Connecticut a several fishery in public waters may be presumed from fifteen years' sole occupation; but such a claimant must prove his right. Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 382, 6 Am. Dec. 250.

To acquire an exclusive right of fishery in a navigable river by prescription, the use and enjoyment must not only be uninterrupted, but exclusive. Ibid.

Where fishing was exercised by one as a right which, prima facie, belonged to him in common with all other citizens, his fishing is referable to that right, and cannot of itself be a ground for presuming an exclusive right. Collins v. Hienbury, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 118, 48 Am. Dec. 60 L. R. A.

155; Fagan v. Armistead, 38 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 438.

A person may prescribe for an exclusive right of fishing in a navigable river where the tide ebbs and flows, but it cannot be presumed, it must be proved. Carter v. Murcot, 4 Burr. 2162.

The above case was an action for trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close in the River Severn. Defendant pleaded that it was a navigable river, also that it was an arm of the sea wherein every subject had a right to fish. Plaintiff replied prescribing for a several fishery there, which was found in his favor. Defendant claimed that, although it was so found, yet, on the authority of Warren v. Mathews, 6 Mod. 73, prescription was not good because everyone has a right to fish in a navigable river, or in an arm of the sea. The court follows the language of Warren v. Mathews to the effect that in navigable rivers the fishery is common, but that, since prescription was found to exist in this case, the plaintiff's right was good, Yates, J., saying the Crown may grant a several fishery in a navigable river where the sea flows and reflows, or in an arm of the sea.

No presumption can be raised of a grant of a several fishery in a public navigable river from the fact that an individual uses the same in common with others. Delaware & M. R. Co. v. Stump, 8 Gill. & J. 479, 29 Am. Dec. 561.

There can be no exclusive fishing privilege established by prescription where no grant could have been made to support it. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

An adverse and exclusive use is indispensable to the acquisition of several right of fishery in navigable waters, if such right may be acquired by prescription in the absence of legislation to that effect. Day v. Day, 4 Md. 262.

The prima facie right of the public is not rebutted by proof of mere uninterrupted enjoyment of the privilege of fishing for a period requisite to acquire title by prescription, since the mere lawful exercise of a common right for that period has never been considered as conferring an exclusive right. Sloan v. Blemiller, 34 Ohio St. 492.

That one for over fifty years has claimed the exclusive right of fishing in navigable waters, and that in the main his neighbors respected the claim, do not constitute adverse possession as against the state, or give rise to a prescriptive right, where the state is not authorized to grant such privilege; nor can it be charged with notice of the necessity of protecting its title, since the right of fishing is common to all. Slingerland v. International Contracting Co. 43 App. Div. 215, 60 N. Y. Supp. 12.

Under the "old law," a fishery easement would have been presumed from sixty years' user. Rolle v. Whyte, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 286, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 105, 17 L. T. N. S. 360, 16 Week. Rep. 593, 8 Best & S. 116.

The possessor of a habile title to a barony may prescribe a right of fishery in a tidal river adjoining it as against the Crown. Lord Advocate v. Lovat, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 288.

A claim to a fishery by an owner of the soil cannot be proved by the fact that his initials were engraved in a rock in the stream near his boundary line, without any proof when, or by whom, or for what purpose, they were so engraved. Melvin v. Whiting, 13 Pick. 184.

But in Massachusetts it is held that no prescriptive title to a private fishery belonging to the state can be allowed. Nickerson v. Brackett, 10 Mass. 212.

A right of fishery in gross cannot be acquired by a family, but only by them as individuals. Bevins v. Bird, 12 L. T. N. S. 308.

The acquisition of a several fishery in gross by a common-law prescription (immemorial user) is not shown where the acts of user relied upon were done under a misconception as to the effect of a certain deed which, it was thought, passed the freehold of the soil of the bed of the river, and with that soil the exclusive right of fishing. Under such circumstances, the principle prevails that, if the origin of the use is not lost in obscurity, but is explained, and appears to be subsequent to the reign of Richard I., the head of the prescription is cut off, and the prescription at common law cannot be maintained. Warwick v. Gonville & Caius College, 6 Times L. R. 447, Affirming 5 Times L. R. 461.

Occasional angling will not be sufficient to establish a prescriptive right of fishery; nor will the use of the rod be of any avail, when practised in certain waters in competition with net and cable fishing. The latter is by far the more destructive method, and, furthermore, seriously interferes with angling. Warrand v. Mackintosh, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 52.

Where a river constitutes a unum quid, the whole fishery is prescribed for or occupied by the suitable and natural mode of using it according to the course of conduct which the proprietor might reasonably be expected to follow with a due regard to his own interests,—a guide which varies according to circumstances. Lord Advocate v. Lovat, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 273.

A river is a unum quid, as relates to the fishery therein, when the whole fishery is included in one possession and title. Ibid.

If the fishery of the whole river (so far as it belonged to the plaintiff or his predecessors in title) was what has been sometimes called a unum quid, there can be no doubt that evidence of acts of ownership and enjoyment in any part of it would be applicable to the whole. Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 31 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169.

If the right has been once acquired by prescription to a several fishery in navigable water, it may pass as appurtenant to the owner's estate. Rogers v. Allen, 1 Campb. 309.

Against individual.

A man may prescribe to have a several fishery in such a water, and the owner of the soil shall not fish there. Co. Litt. 122a.

A man may prescribe to have separalem piscariam in such water, and exclude by this the owner of the soil. But a man may not prescribe to have a common of fishery or free fishery in such water, and to exclude the owner of the soil, for this is against the nature of a common or free fishery. Chimney v. Fishen, 2 Rolle, Abr. 267; White v. Shirland, 2 Rolle, Abr. 267.

There appears to be no doubt of the right of an individual to acquire by prescription rights of fishery in private waters. Melvin v. Whiting, 10 Pick. 295, 20 Am. Dec. 524, 18 Pick. 188.

An exclusive right to fish in the estate of another may be acquired by adverse, uninterrupted, and exclusive use. Turner v. Hebron, 61 Conn. 175, 14 L. R. A. 386, 22 Atl. 951.

The exclusive right of fishery is prima facie in the owner of the soil, but may be acquired separate from the ownership of the soil by grant or prescription. Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369.

Title to an exclusive fishing privilege, given by statute to the owner of land fronting on a river, cannot be acquired by adverse user thereof, where the statute declares such a violation of the owner's rights a trespass punishable by 60 L. R. A.

fine or imprisonment, or both, as a misdemeanor. Heckman v. Swett, 99 Cal. 303, 33 Pac. 1099.

A prescriptive right to fish in a pond is not gained by a person who does not own land adjoining the pond, by reason of one's having fished therein every summer for over twenty years, where it does not appear that he did so under claim of right, and nothing in the evidence shows that the use was not a mere indulgence allowed by the owner. Gibbs v. Sweet, 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 275, Affirming 7 Lack. Legal News, 18.

A title by prescription to an exclusive fishing privilege, given by statute to the owners of land fronting on a river, can be acquired only by adverse possession of the land to which such right attaches as an appurtenance under the statute, and not by mere user of the right to the exclusion of such owner. Heckman v. Swett, 99 Cal. 303, 33 Pac. 1099.

One prescribing for a fishery in navigable waters, i. e., for the right of drawing his nets on another's shore, must for twenty-one years have enjoyed such an exclusive user as to be adverse and exclusive, and not a mere enjoyment such as was accorded the public generally. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

An adverse right to an easement to take fish cannot grow out of a mere permissive enjoyment continued for any length of time. Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349.

A prescriptive right to fish in another's several fishery must be based on an exercise of that privilege under claim of right, and not as a trespasser. Paley v. Birch, 8 Best & S. 336, 16 L. T. N. S. 410.

The evident fact that one has fished in another's several fishery for twenty years will justify the conclusion that he had got the right. Ibid.

A prescriptive right of an adjoining proprietor to fish in another's private fishery will not authorise him to admit the public to the enjoyment of his privilege. Lembeck v. Nye, 47 Ohio St. 336, 8 L. R. A. 578, 24 N. E. 686.

An enjoyment for sixty years and as far back as living memory extends, of maintaining a coop weir in nonnavigable waters, is presumptive of a grant thereof. Leconfield v. Lonsdale, L. R. 5 C. P. 657, 23 L. T. N. S. 155, 18 Week. Rep. 1165, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S. 305.

The annual temporary occupation of a fishery cannot amount to a disseisin of the private owner. Nickerson v. Brackett, 10 Mass. 212.

The claimant must prove satisfactorily an actual, exclusive possession of the fishery adverse to the right of the riparian owner, against his interest, uninterrupted and continuous for at least twenty years. McFarlin v. Essex Co. 10 Cush. 310.

Using a rock in a river for fishing purposes during two months in each year is not such a continuous possession as will give a title under the statute of limitations. McCullough v. Wall, 4 Rich. L. 68, 53 Am. Dec. 715; Turner v. Hebron, 61 Conn. 175, 14 L. R. A. 386, 22 Atl. 951.

Long enjoyment of a fishery by leave of the several owners thereof, granted from time to time, cannot become a right to have such license granted. Mills v. Colchester, L. R. 2 C. P. 476, 36 L. J. C. P. N. S. 210, 16 L. T. N. S. 626, 15 Week. Rep. 955, Affirmed in L. R. 3 C. P. 575.

The public cannot have a right by prescription to fish in a nontidal stream. Smith v. Andrews [1891] 2 Ch. 678, 65 L. T. N. S. 175; Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 382, 6 Am. Dec. 250.

The public cannot prescribe for profit &

prendre in a several fishery. Neill v. Devonshire, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 135, 31 Week. Rep. 622, Affirming Ir. L. R. 2 C. L. 169; Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369.

The practice of the public of fishing in a nontidal stream will not raise the presumption of a lost grant, as there can be no presumption of a lost grant with respect to matter which cannot be the subject of prescription. Smith v. Andrews [1801] 2 Ch. 678, 65 L. T. N. S. 175.

No private right to participate in a fishery can be acquired by an exercise of a public right, though for fifty-five years. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175.

An individual, merely as one of the public, cannot prescribe for the right to fish in another's pond. Albright v. Cortright, 64 N. J. L. 330, 48 L. R. A. 616, 45 Atl. 634.

A prescriptive right cannot be presumed in an indefinite number of persons to enjoy another's private fishery, when its origin must have been within living memory. Tilbury v. Silva, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 98, 63 L. T. N. S. 141.

An exclusive fishery cannot be predicated by prescription upon the exercise of the public right of fishing or the continued violation of a public statute in relation thereto. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

When the owner of soil around a 108-acre pond artificially raises the height of the water, although the title to the bed is in another, when he has been in the actual, exclusive, and uninterrupted possession and occupation of the entire fishery therein for more than twenty years, claiming it as his own and keeping others away, he has obtained right to an exclusive fishery. Turner v. Hebron, 61 Conn. 175, 187, 14 L. R. A. 386, 22 Atl. 951.

b. By custom.

A right to take fish from private waters cannot be set up, either by way of lawful custom, or as a profit à prendre. Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349.

A custom for the public to go upon private land and fish in a stream is in the nature of a profit à prendre in the soil, and void, although no right is claimed to carry away the fish, as the catching of the fish would destroy the fishery. Bland v. Lipscombe, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 155, note, 4 El. & Bl. 713, note.

"The public cannot have a right to fish in a non-tidal stream founded upon custom however long the practice has continued. Smith v. Andrews [1801] 2 Ch. 678, 65 L. T. N. S. 175.

A right to fish in another's pond cannot be acquired by custom. Albright v. Cortright, 64 N. J. L. 330, 48 L. R. A. 616, 45 Atl. 634.

But the right to several fisheries in the Delaware river is established by custom variant from the common law. Wilson v. Hill, 46 N. J. Eq. 367, 19 Atl. 1097.

The inhabitants of a town cannot have a custom to go on to the land of another to fish, as such a custom is in effect to have profit à prendre in the soil of another. Lloyd v. Jones, 6 C. B. 81, 17 L. J. C. P. N. S. 206, 12 Jur. 657; Murphy v. Ryan, Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 143, 16 Week. Rep. 678.

A custom for all the dwellers in a parish to have common of fishery over the lord's waters in the waste of the manor is unreasonable and void as including too many persons, thereby ruining the property over which it is exercised. Allgood v. Gibson, 34 L. T. N. S. 883, 25 Week. Rep. 60.

Also because such a custom amounts to a profit à prendre in the soil of another. Ibid.

A license to fish in a private stream cannot be inferred from a common usage for anyone to enter and do so. Winder v. Blake, 49 N. C. (4 Jones L.) 332, 60 L. R. A.

A custom to take fish from a private stream is for a profit à prendre, and cannot be sustained in law, unless shown to be prescribed for as belonging to some estate, and to be pleaded with a que estate. Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 338.

A right of fishery in private waters cannot be claimed by custom, but must be prescribed for in que estate; and a right claimed by prescription is not established by proof of customary right. Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369.

An alleged custom in other persons than the owners of the shore, to take mussel between high and low water marks, is unreasonable. Le Strange v. Rowe, 4 Fost. & F. 1048.

The inhabitants of a town acquire no right to the continuance of a public fishery by an enjoyment of sixty years. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175.

"The public cannot acquire by immemorial usage any right of fishing in a river in which, though it be navigable, the tide does not ebb and flow," since the fishery is dependent upon ownership of the soil, and a public right of fishery can only exist in tidal waters the soil of which belongs to the Crown. Mussett v. Burch, 35 L. T. N. S. 486.

A custom is not created by the conduct of the owner of a fishery in issuing licenses to all persons of a particular class to fish in the fishery on payment of a fee, as to create a custom the long enjoyment must have been as of right, and not by license or leave. Mills v. Colchester, L. R. 2 C. P. 476, 36 L. J. C. P. N. S. 210, 16 L. T. N. S. 626, 15 Week. Rep. 955.

One accused of unlawful fishing in a nontidal river cannot justify on the ground that for many years the public at large fished there, as the public cannot acquire a right of fishing in a nontidal stream. Hudson v. MacRae, 4 Best & S. 585, 33 L. J. M. C. N. S. 65, 9 L. T. N. S. 678, 12 Week. Rep. 80.

"A prescriptive right to fish in respect of an ancient tenement is not established by proof of user, when the only evidence is that the right was exercised in respect of the inhabitants of the parish generally," ancient tenements being shown, and such a general custom being bad in law. Saltash v. Goodman, L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 446.

Where a borough corporation was shown to have a prescriptive right to a several fishery in a navigable, tidal river which, as exercised from time immemorial, had been subject to a qualification that the free inhabitants of ancient tenements in the borough had, without interruption, exercised, under claim of right, the privilege of dredging for oysters from Canledmas to Easter eve in each year, the court held that a lawful origin for the usage of such inhabitants ought to be presumed if reasonably possible, and that it must be presumed that the original grant to the corporation of its several fishery was subject to a trust or condition in favor of such free inhabitants to dredge for oysters in accordance with the usage. Goodman v. Saltash, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 633, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 193, 48 L. T. N. S. 239, 31 Week. Rep. 293, 47 J. P. 276, Reversing L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 106, 50 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 508, 45 L. T. N. S. 120, 29 Week. Rep. 639, 45 J. P. 844, and L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 450, where the court said: No doubt the courts will go very far in presuming lawful origin of a custom for all inhabitants of a parish to fish in a several fishery, where there has been immemorial user; but where the nature of the thing claimed is itself destructive of the subject-matter, an oyster fishery; and where it is antagonistic to other dominant claims with which it comes in conflict; or where there are other reasons which interfere and show that the immemorial user cannot possibly point to that which alone makes it good in law,—the courts will not presume an alleged lost grant.

IV. Kinds of fishery.

Much discussion has occurred as to the kinds of fishery which may exist, most of which is merely curious learning at the present. The principal kinds which have been mentioned are four (1) several, (2) free, (3) common fishery, (4) common of fishery. Attempt has been made to distinguish between the last three kinds, but not with marked success.

In Benett v. Costar, 8 Taunt. 183, 2 J. B. Moore, 88, an action for interfering with plaintiff's fishery when the plaintiff declared on the right to a common fishery whereas he should have alleged a common of fishery, the court, in discussing the difference between the two rights, said a common of fishery is a right in common with certain other persons in a particular stream. Though text writers have used the terms common piscarium and communium piscaria, a common fishery extends to all mankind.

Holt, Ch. J., divided fisheries into three classes (1) separatis, (2) libera, (3) communis. Smith v. Kemp, Holt, 322, 2 Salk. 637.

Schultes, after a careful consideration of the question, concluded that there are in fact only two sorts of fishery, free or common of fishery and several fishery, or fishery in gross, though fisheries may acquire various provincial denominations, and be subject to peculiar and different restraints according to the locality of their situation and the usage of the neighborhood. Aquatic Rights, 60.

And in Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68, Fitzgerald, B., said that "the most important distinction in fisheries lies in their being exclusive or otherwise. Still, the exclusive right of fishing may be either in the soil of the owner or not."

The distinction between free and several fishery goes back to the year books, for in 17 Edw. IV., 6, pl. 5, the majority of the judges recognized a difference between several fishery and free fishery.

A free fishery is to be distinguished from a several fishery in that the latter is exclusive, while the former may be in common with others. Hall, Sea Shores, 68.

A free fishery is the same as an unlimited common of fisheries. Woolrych, Waters, p. 123.

Blackstone thought that a free fishery was an exclusive right of fishing through franchise in a public river, and differs from a several fishery in that the latter must be connected with, or derived from, ownership of the soil, while the latter need not be. 2 Bl. Com. 39.

Libera piscaria is a common of fishery. Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68; Yard v. Carman, 3 N. J. L. 987.

It is not an exclusive fishery. Melvin v. Whiting, 7 Pick. 79.

A man may have a free fishery both in a public and private stream; but with this distinction, that in the latter his right must arise by grant, prescription, or usage, and may be transferred from one person to another, whereas in the former it is vested in him of common right whether he exercises it or not, and it is not transferable. Schultes, Aquatic Rights, 61.

The grant by a riparian proprietor of a "free fishery" in a non-navigable stream passes nothing more than the same right of fishery as is claimed by everyone who has land in the manor along the bank of the river. Lamb v. Newbiggin, 1 Car. & K. 549. 60 L. R. A.

Libera piscaria cannot be held to refer to an exclusive fishery in case of a large inland sea and without warrant by subsequent usages or the act of the parties. Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68.

"A man may have a free fishery on his own soil, as, for instance, he may have a river in his own manor, and another may have a right of fishing there with him." Gibbs v. Woollicott, 3 Salk. 291, Comb. 433, 464. This case was decided on the point that plaintiff brought trespass, but did not allege ownership of the fish.

See also 16 Vin. Abr. title, Piscary, (B).

A riparian proprietor has no such property in libera piscaria as to be able to call the fish his own and maintain trespass for their taking by another. Upton v. Dawkin, 3 Mod. 97.

"In order to constitute a several fishery, it is requisite that the party claiming it should so far have the right of fishing, independent of all others, as that no person should have a co-extensive right with him in the subject claimed;" although a lesser or "partial independent" right in another does not derogate from the general owner. Seymour v. Courtenay, 5 Burr. 2814.

A several fishery is an exclusive one. No other person can lawfully fish within its bounds. Preble v. Brown, 47 Me. 284.

A several fishery may exist either apart from or as incident to the ownership of the soil over which the river flows. Hanbury v. Jenkins [1901] 1 Ch. 401.

Common of fishery may be appendant to an estate. 4 Edw. IV. 29, pl. 7.

"Several" fishery is not a word of art, and means "an exclusive right to fish in a given place, either with or without the property in the soil,"—an "always valuable property." Malcolmson v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. Cas. 593, 9 Jur. N. S. 1135, 9 L. T. N. S. 93, 12 Week. Rep. 178.

So, equivalent expressions may be used, and after verdict "a sole and exclusive fishery" is held equivalent to "a several fishery." Holford v. Bailey, 13 Q. B. 426, 18 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 109, 13 Jur. 278, Reversing 8 Q. B. 1000, where it was held that a declaration in trespass for entering and disturbing a several fishery does not properly describe the fishery by referring to it as a sole and exclusive fishery, as the word "several" has acquired a technical meaning, and is the only word having the same and no other meaning than the word separatis, found in the old entries.

The only practical distinction at the present time is between a several or exclusive fishery and a common fishery, the former being one in which the owner may exclude all others from enjoying it, and the latter being one which is shared in common by a greater or less number of persons, usually by the public in general.

V. Public regulation.

The fisheries are of such importance to the public that they are a matter of public regulation. See note to People v. Truckee Lumber Co. (Cal.) 30 L. R. A. 581. Although a man has an exclusive fishery on his own land, he does not own the fish until he has reduced them to his possession; so that his fishery right amounts to no more than the right to use lawful means upon his land for the capture of the fish. As long as they remain free in the water they are the property of the public of common right, and the public may make regulations for the preservation of its property. The individual has no right to exercise wasteful or destructive methods of fishing, or destroy the fish at a time when they are not fit for food or their preservation is necessary to the multiplication of the species. Of a regulation of any of these matters by the public, he has no ground of complaint. See infra, VI.

Royal fish.

One of the earliest regulations of the right of fishery was the assertion of a claim on the part of the Crown to certain kinds of fish which were regarded as of such a character as properly to be rendered to it in recognition of its prerogative.

It is probable that at one time in the English history no claims were made with reference to fishery rights. Burke says (Works, Vol. 7, p. 242), on the authority of Bede, that because of Druidical superstition which forbade this class of food, the people, although maritime, did not know how to use fish, and that early in the seventh century, because of a drought, a famine came upon the people, and they were preparing to cast themselves over a precipice into the sea when Bishop Wilfred collected nets and with attendants plunged into the sea and gathered food from that source.

The fishing industry soon became established, however, for Maitland says it is by no means impossible that in the seventh and eighth centuries the King has some claim to the nobler kinds of fish. Domesday, 239.

Whenever the custom originated, by Lord Hale's time it was well established, and the royal fish were sturgeon, porpoise, and whale. Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 7.

Sturgeons taken within the King's dominions shall belong to him. And of whales the head shall belong to him, and the tail to his consort. Kelham's Britton, 97.

Royal fish, if taken within the portion of the seas which belongs to the Crown, belong to him, but, if taken outside, belong to the one who takes them. Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 7.

Royal fish (whale and sturgeon) are inherently the property of the Crown. Royal fish "found and taken within the precincts, liberties, limits, or jurisdiction of the Cinque Ports, or their members" belong to the lord warden, under royal grant. Cinque Ports v. King, 2 Hagg. Adm. 439.

The King had the right to royal fish, and no subject can have them without the King's special grant. Royal Fishery of the Banne's Case, Davies, Rep. 149, Angell, Tide Waters, p. 35, Appx. 1.

There can be little doubt that salmon fishings at an early period of the history of Scotland were regarded as possessing a peculiar value over other fishings, and were distinguished from them in a remarkable manner. They were classed inter regalia. They were only capable of belonging to a subject by an express grant from the Crown, or by a grant of fishings generally, followed by such a user of salmon fishing as proved that it was intended to be comprehended within the general terms of the grant. Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 419.

Onslow, in arguing in the case of Mines, 1 Plowd. 315, that the title to ores of gold and silver were in the King, said that the common law appropriates everything to the persons whom it best suits, excellent things to the person who is the most excellent, the King. And so does it likewise in regard to the water as well as the earth. For the things of value which the sea or water yields are the fishes therein, and, of the fishes which are in the sea in England, two are more excellent than the others, viz., sturgeons and whales, and the common law has appropriated them to the King, as appears by Treatise de Prerogative de Regis, 60 L. R. A.

chap. 11, which says the King shall have whales and sturgeon taken in the sea, which is not a new law but a declaration of the common law.

The subject may have the right to royal fish by grant or by prescription. Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 7.

Regulation generally.

The regulation of fisheries began at an early period.

Magna Charta, chap. 23, provided that all weirs should be put down throughout all England, except on the sea coast.

And Hale says the fishing which the public has in any public or private river or creek, fresh or salt, is subject to the laws for the conservation of fish and fry, which are many. De Jure Maris, 23.

A state may regulate the privilege of fishing in waters belonging to the state. Morgan v. Com. 98 Va. 812, 35 S. E. 448.

A common-law right to a common fishery in a river is to be enjoyed in subordination to the laws which regulate its use. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

The fish in the waters of the state are the property of the people in their collective sovereign capacity, and they may permit or prohibit the taking of them at their pleasure. State v. Snowman, 94 Me. 99, 50 L. R. A. 544, 46 Atl. 815.

In Ex parte Marsh, 57 Fed. 719, the court says: "We think it may be laid down as a proposition of natural law that, inasmuch as oysters are becoming more and more valuable and necessary every year, with the growth of populations, as human food, and state possessing great and productive oyster deposits owes it as a duty to humanity, no less than to her own citizens engaged in the oyster culture, to protect these deposits from such depredations as destroy their valuable product."

The power of the legislature to make laws for the protection of fish follows from the great importance of fish as an article of human food, and therefore their protection and preservation have been regarded as a matter of public concern. A different result might follow if it rested on some public easement like navigation. People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 16 L. R. A. 684, 31 N. E. 115.

The owner of a several fishery must exercise his right by means not prohibited by law. Devonshire v. Smith, 1 Alcock & N. 442.

The right of the public to the passage of fish in rivers, and the private rights of riparian proprietors incident to and dependent on the public right, are subject to the regulation of the legislature. Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 239.

The power of a state legislature over public rights of fishing in any waters within its boundaries is unrestricted. In those waters within or beyond the ebb and flow of the tide which are not navigable from the sea for any useful purpose there can be no restriction upon the authority of the legislature to regulate the public rights of fishing, or to make any grants of exclusive rights which do not impair any private rights already vested. Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441.

Fisheries in navigable, and therefore public waters, may be appropriated and regulated by the state. Fuller v. Spear, 14 Me. 417.

A state may retain a right paramount to all or any riparian proprietors, to subject all fisheries of salmon, shad, and alewives to its control. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222.

The legislature has absolute control of public fisheries unless specifically restrained by the Constitution. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

In Massachusetts the legislature has power, in the public interest, to determine the mode of using fisheries, even to the granting of exclusive rights of fishing to individuals. Com. v. Hilton, 174 Mass. 29, 45 L. R. A. 475, 54 N. E. 362.

Because of the public's common right to the fish passing up or down a stream the bed of which is private property, the legislature may regulate and control such private ownership. This is a rule from necessity. Parker v. People, 111 Ill. 588, 53 Am. Rep. 643.

The state has an undoubted right to regulate the manner in which fish shall be caught, and to protect their migrations, even into private waters, when the ownership of such fish is in the public by reason of their migratory habits, and no individual has any property right in them until he has subjected them to his control. People v. Collison, 85 Mich. 105, 48 N. W. 292.

The state has a right to protect fish in all streams through which they have freedom of passage to and from the public fishing grounds, although they flow over lands entirely subject to private ownership. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 39 L. R. A. 581, 48 Pac. 374.

The legislature may prohibit the taking of fish during certain seasons of the year or with certain implements, even on the part of a private individual from waters in which, as riparian owners, he has the exclusive right of fishing, if such waters connect with the public waters of the state. People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 16 L. R. A. 684, 81 N. E. 115.

Whether or not the fisheries are of sufficient importance to warrant legislative interference with and regulation thereof, is a legislative question: Gentile v. State, 29 Ind. 409, Affirmed in State v. Boone, 30 Ind. 225.

The manner in which, the time when, and the amount of fish a riparian proprietor can take from a stream endowed with a public use, are a legislative and governmental function. Parker v. People, 111 Ill. 588, 53 Am. Rep. 643.

The right of the legislature to regulate fisheries is not inconsistent with an individual's claim to an exclusive fishery or soil under the water. Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 493.

In its regulation of fisheries, the state may interfere to some extent with the natural right of its citizens to fish in navigable waters. State v. Woodard, 123 N. C. 710, 31 S. E. 219.

A mere permissive right of fishery is not so solemn as to be incapable of restraint or regulation by the sovereign authority of the state. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldw. 60 Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

A power in the legislature to regulate fisheries includes power to prohibit certain kinds of fishing deemed distinctive both to the supply of fish and to the equal chance and right of all the inhabitants to engage in fishing, since the public fishery ordained by the Constitution is to be preserved, not destroyed. Drew v. Hilliker, 56 Vt. 641.

A common public right to regulate the passage of fish through a stream cannot be prescribed against by a riparian proprietor. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222.

A license is necessary to use night lines reasonably calculated to catch trout, although none are caught, and the lines are set to catch eels. Hill v. George, 44 J. P. 424.

Since the colonial ordinances, the right of fishing, both in the tide waters and in the great ponds, belongs to the public, unless otherwise appropriated by the legislature, or by the towns 60 L. R. A.

acting under its authority. Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441.

Notwithstanding the individual may have a right to fish in streams passing over his land, the state may, for the common good, regulate the times and manner of taking fish so that the general interests may not be diminished. Laws for the regulation of the time and appliances for catching fish may prohibit a landowner from fishing in a small stream running through his own land in which the state has at great expense planted California mountain trout. Com. v. Bender, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 624.

Upon the separation of the colonies from England, the fishery rights in tide water remained in the several states, to be exercised for the common good. But the rights of the states in the management and regulation of these fisheries are not limited, like that of the Crown in England. The states hold them in trust for the public; but they exercise, not only the rights of sovereignty, but also the rights of property as to everything which remains in common for all the people. Com. v. Hilton, 174 Mass. 29, 45 L. R. A. 475, 54 N. E. 362.

While at common law the fishery on nonnavigable streams pertains to the riparian proprietor, the constant course of legislation upon this subject from the first settlement of the country has qualified this right, so far as to subject it to the legislature in the manner and to the extent it has been immemorably exercised. Vinton v. Welsh, 9 Pick. 87.

The legislature has power over the whole subject of fishery so far as public and common rights are concerned, and may by statute impose penalties upon the taking of fish by anyone except under certain restrictions, even in the waters contiguous to his own land; and it cannot be doubted that it can also abridge the common right in favor of the proprietor when it is satisfied that the interests of the public will be best served by an ampler recognition of the right of private property. Barrows v. McDermott, 73 Me. 441.

The state, by virtue of its sovereignty, has authority to regulate fisheries within its borders, and may prescribe the places as well as the times in which fish may be taken, and may make exclusive grants of fisheries in designated waters, so far as the same do not impair private rights already vested. Heckman v. Swett, 107 Cal. 276, 40 Pac. 420.

A right of fishery in Massachusetts is held subject to the control of the legislature, unless by particular grant or prescription it has been held free of that control. Ingraham v. Wilkinson, 4 Pick. 268, 16 Am. Dec. 342.

A public privilege of taking clams along a sea shore and of fishing in the waters is enjoyed in subordination to the paramount authority of the legislature to regulate and modify and, to some extent at least, to extinguish. Clarke v. Providence, 16 R. I. 337, 1 L. R. A. 725, 15 Atl. 763.

The legislature has the right to regulate the taking of fish in private rivers. Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. 90, 11 Am. Dec. 240.

Rivers, though not navigable even for boats or rafts, and even smaller streams of water, may be, and often are, regarded as public rights subject to legislative control as the means of creating power for operating mills and machinery, or as a source for furnishing a valuable supply of fish suitable for food and sustenance. Such water power is everywhere regarded as a public right, and fisheries of the kind, even in waters not navigable, are also so far public rights that the legislature of the state may ordain and establish regulations to prevent obstructions to the passage of fish, and to promote the usual and uninterrupted enjoyment of the right by the riparian owners. Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

Statutes may be passed, in the discretion of the legislature, placing the public fisheries under the care and superintendence of certain persons to make them as valuable or useful as possible, as well as for their preservation. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

The fact that a private individual has the sole and exclusive right to take fish from a certain pond or lake by reason of his ownership of the land under and surrounding the same does not deprive the legislature of the power to control and regulate the exercise of that right; and a statute which has that effect is not void because it is an undue and unwarrantable interference with the property rights of such owner of the land upon which the lake is situated. The right of a riparian owner to take fish does not inhere in the individual, but is a boon or privilege granted by the sovereignty. People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 16 L. R. A. 684, 31 N. E. 115.

In Massachusetts and Maryland from the earliest times the English common law as to fisheries was changed by common consent in that in all conveyances by individuals of lands upon streams through which salmon, shad, and alewives passed, to cast their spawn, it was understood that fishing for such fish should remain in the public, and therefore is always subject to legislative regulation. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222.

Legislation restricting the sale for food of trout propagated artificially by private owners during the closed season, is constitutional, and not a violation of private rights. Com. v. Penn. Forest Brook Trout Co. 26 Pa. Co. Ct. 163.

Public fisheries may be leased and disposed of by the legislature in any manner so that it does not interfere with or impair the public right of navigation, or the power of the general government to regulate commerce and navigation in bays and harbors. Gough v. Bell, 21 N. J. L. 156.

The legislature may declare the forfeiture of any vessel employed in violating the fishery laws of the state without regard to the guilt or innocence of the owner. Boggs v. Com. 76 Va. 989.

The attorney general may proceed, without the intervention of a private relator, to enjoin the unlawful destruction of fish. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 39 L. R. A. 581, 48 Pac. 374.

Specific regulations.

The exclusion of residents of the state who are not taxpayers, but who are willing to pay the license tax, from fishing in the public waters of the state as taxpayers are allowed to do, is in violation of Const. art. 1, § 3, which guarantees equal rights, and prohibits exclusive, separate public emoluments or privileges, except in consideration of public services. Gustafson v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 67, 43 L. R. A. 615, 45 S. W. 717, 48 S. W. 518.

Under the Massachusetts statutes it is illegal to fish in a great pond leased by the commonwealth for the cultivation of useful fishes, though the fishing be for other fish than the useful fish alleged to be cultivated in the pond. Com. v. Richardson, 142 Mass. 71, 7 N. E. 26.

Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 91, § 53, imposing a penalty for selling trout, extends to the sale of trout artificially propagated and maintained, and is valid. Com. v. Gilbert, 160 Mass. 157, 22 L. R. A. 439, 35 N. E. 454. The court says such laws are not to be held unreasonable because owners of property may thereby to some extent be restricted in its use. All property is acquired and held under the tacit condition that it shall not be so used as to destroy or greatly impair the public rights and interests of the community.

Under the New York game laws providing that any person who shall violate the provision against throwing refuse into any stream, or any member of any corporation, association, or company who shall authorize its violation, shall be subject to a penalty, the word "person" will include a corporation, so that the penalty may be exacted from it in its corporate capacity. Cartwright v. Canandaigua Gaslight Co. 32 Hun. 403.

To violate a game law prohibiting the casting of refuse or deleterious substance into streams, the refuse must be such in quantity as to have the effect of destroying the lives of fish or of disturbing in some degree their habits. 1744.

The provisions of a statute giving the state fish commission a purely arbitrary discretion to grant permission to fish for certain fish within prohibited waters are unconstitutional as in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. French v. Shirley, 7 Ohio N. P. 26.

A fish law providing for the seizure and confiscation of nets used in violation thereof, and the placing of the proceeds of their sale in the public treasury, but which fails to provide any legal proceedings by which the confiscation may be adjudged, is unconstitutional as an attempt to take and sell private property and place the proceeds in the public treasury without any process of law, in violation of art. 1, § 16, Ohio Const., providing that the courts shall be open, and every person for any injury done him shall have remedy by due process of law. Edson v. Crangle, 62 Ohio St. 49, 56 N. E. 647.

A statute providing that a vessel used by those violating fishing laws shall be forfeited to the state is void so far as it fails to provide for a proceeding in rem whereby the property rights of innocent owners may be determined. Boggs v. Com. 76 Va. 989.

Under the Arkansas fish laws, it is a misdemeanor to erect or maintain a dam in any waters for the purpose of catching fish, unless the waters are wholly on the premises of the person using the dam. Lynch v. State, 69 Ark. 555, 64 S. W. 950.

A statute providing that it shall not be lawful for "any person" to fish in certain public rivers within certain points "with seines or nets, except from the shore in the usual and customary manner," makes no discrimination in favor of the owners of shores so as to be unconstitutional, but prohibits all persons from fishing except in the mode prescribed, and is a valid exercise of the police power of the state to regulate fisheries. Hughes v. State, 87 Md. 298, 39 Atl. 747.

It is no defense to a complaint against the occupier of a fishing milldam for not lifting or removing the sliding doors of his fishery, that the doing so would in some way affect, but not ruin, his milling power. Hodgson v. Little, 16 C. B. N. S. 198, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 229, 10 Jur. N. S. 953, 11 L. T. N. S. 136, 12 Week. Rep. 1103.

The United States, after taking land without compensation for lighthouse purposes, may make extensions and erect structures to protect it from freshets and ice, but cannot maintain them for the use of the fish commission; and the owner of the premises is entitled to make such use of the extension as is consistent with the maintenance and protection of the lighthouse. Edmondson Island Case, 42 Fed. 15.

A reservoir constructed for mercantile purposes by a water company is not a tributary of a river within the meaning of the salmon fishery acts under which a fishery district is formed consisting of the river and its tributaries, although the reservoir is formed by water taken from a former tributary of the river, and its surplus water is cast into the river, and the young of salmon pass from the river up the tributary from which the water is taken for supplying the reservoir and thence into the reservoir. Harbottle v. Terry, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 131, 137, 52 L. J. M. C. N. S. 31, 48 L. T. N. S. 219, 31 Week. Rep. 289, 47 J. P. 186.

A river may be a tributary of another river so as to be within a fishery district consisting of such other river and its tributaries, although its waters do not flow directly into the main river, but flow into it by first discharging into another river, and thence from that river into the main one. Hall v. Reid, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 134, note, 48 L. T. N. S. 221, note.

Interstate rights.

Under the provisions of the Federal Constitution giving the citizens of each state all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states, it has been contended that no state could exclude the citizens of other states from the privilege of fishing in its waters on the same terms with its own citizens; but this contention has not prevailed.

Mr. Angell states that from the language of the charters to the colonies in this country, the effect of the Revolution was to give all the inhabitants of the United States the right to fish on the sea coasts of New England. But in Maryland the right may be limited to the inhabitants of that state. Angell, Tide Waters, pp. 53 et seq.

But, so far as the waters can be said to be within the jurisdiction of a particular state, it may exclude the citizens of other states at its pleasure.

As against the general government, the state may make regulations for the protection of fisheries within bays upon its coast which are not more than 6 miles wide at the mouth; and such regulations may be enforced against vessels licensed under the laws of the general government. Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S. 240, 35 L. ed. 159, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 559, Affirming Com. v. Manchester, 152 Mass. 230, 9 L. R. A. 236, 25 N. E. 113.

The states have control of their public fisheries, and may forbid all such acts as would render the public right less valuable, or destroy it altogether. Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 269.

It is within the legislative power of a state to interrupt the voyage and inflict the forfeiture of a vessel enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States for a disobedience by those on board of the commands of a state fish law. Ibid.

A public fishery is a property right, not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship; and a state possessing lands under water adapted to the propagation and improvement of oysters may reserve their use to the citizens of that state exclusively. McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. ed. 248.

Subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which as respects foreign and interstate commerce has been granted to the United States, public fisheries remain under the exclusive control of the states. Ibid.

A state law regulating its sea fisheries discriminates in no wise between citizens of different states, must be observed by all persons using the fisheries, and it is immaterial that the ships used are enrolled and licensed as fishing vessels under the United States laws. Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray, 268, 60 L. R. A.

A state bordering on the "great lakes" may regulate the fisheries in adjoining waters out to the United States boundary line in the absence of any act of the Federal legislature abridging it. Dunlap v. Com. 108 Pa. 607.

A constitutional provision conferring upon the citizens of each state all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states does not entitle the citizens of the several states to enjoy equal rights to take oysters in beds belonging to the citizens of a state in common, and which have never been ceded by that state to the United States. Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230.

A statute for the preservation of clams and oysters, which prohibits the raking or gathering of these bivalves in any waters of the state, by anyone not a resident of six months' standing, extends to planted, as well as natural-grown, oysters; and, inasmuch as it merely prohibits foreigners from subverting the soil of the state and carrying away her property, while leaving vessels free to pass over the waters wherever they choose, is not in conflict with the United States Constitution as a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce; nor does it deny to citizens of other states any privilege or immunity of citizens of the state, the state having the right to grant its property to whomsoever it chooses; nor are the provisions relative to seizure of vessels engaged in violation of the statute, and condemning them after regular judicial proceedings in a tribunal organized for the purpose, subject to review as in other cases, open to the objection that the owner is deprived of his property without due process of law; nor is the act repugnant to the state Constitution as an invasion of the security against unreasonable searches and seizures in the homes, persons, and effects of the people, or a violation of the right of trial by jury. Haney v. Compton, 36 N. J. L. 507.

The state has the exclusive jurisdiction to regulate and control the fisheries in its waters, both tidal and fresh; and the right to fish is not given to citizens of other states by the Amendments to the Federal Constitution, nor is the state prohibited from discriminating against them. State v. Tower, 84 Me. 444, 24 Atl. 898.

The legislature may prohibit the taking of oysters and shell fish in the public waters of the state, by citizens of other states, without infringing on the privileges and immunities of citizens of other states. State v. Medbury, 3 R. I. 138.

The right to the fisheries and to regulate the use of the fisheries on the coasts and in the tide waters of the state are left to the states, subject to the powers of Congress over commerce. Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray, 268.

The right of regulating fisheries in the states extends to the preservation of fish not used as food for human beings, but as food for other fish so used. Com. v. Manchester, 152 Mass. 230, 9 L. R. A. 236, 25 N. E. 113.

Each state owns the beds of all tide waters within its jurisdiction, and may grant to its own citizens the exclusive use of lands covered by water for raising oysters. State v. Corson, 67 N. J. L. 178, 50 Atl. 780.

The right of regulation and control of the fisheries by the several states in the interest of the public permits in every state legislation to secure the benefits of their public right in property to its own inhabitants. The rights, immunities, and privileges which are secured by the Constitution of the United States to the inhabitants of the several states do not include, in favor of the inhabitants of any state, rights in the common property of the inhabitants of the other states. Com. v. Hilton, 174 Mass. 29, 45 L. R. A. 475, 54 N. E. 362.

A body of water having well-defined shores and no current, lying entirely in the state of Iowa a quarter of a mile from the main channel of the Mississippi river and forming no part of that river for the purpose of navigation, is within the jurisdiction of Iowa, and within the provisions of a statute against the use of seines in the waters of that state, and not within an exception of boundary waters. State v. Haug, 95 Iowa, 413, 29 L. R. A. 390, 64 N. W. 398.

The state, by virtue of its sovereignty, has authority to regulate fisheries within its boundaries, and may prescribe the places as well as the times in which fish may be taken, and may make exclusive grants of fisheries in designated waters as far as the same do not impair private rights already vested. Heckman v. Swett, 107 Cal. 276, 40 Pac. 420.

The assumption by a state of control over the fisheries within the bays leading from the ocean upon its frontier is not in contravention of the authority possessed by the United States. State v. Thompson, 85 Me. 189, 27 Atl. 97.

A state statute regulating the use of the fisheries and oyster beds which are the common property of its citizens, and imposing penalties and forfeitures in relation thereto, does not interfere with the power granted to Congress to regulate commerce. Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230.

In the control of fisheries within a state, the state government is supreme. United States v. Alaska Packers' Assn. 79 Fed. 152.

The state of Maryland has jurisdiction over the waters of Chesapeake bay, which are within the state to such an extent that it may prohibit the taking of oysters therein in certain ways; and its law will apply to vessels from other states duly enrolled under the laws of the United States; and such vessels may be subjected to forfeiture for violating the law. Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 269.

An act regulating the time and manner of taking fish in the sea within the territorial limits of a state is binding on citizens of other states, and upon vessels licensed as fishing vessels under the laws of the United States. Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray, 268.

The legislature may discriminate between residents and nonresidents in the right to use the water of the state for planting and fishing for oysters. People v. Lowndes, 130 N. Y. 455, 29 N. E. 751, Reversing 55 Hun, 469, 8 N. Y. Supp. 908.

In one case it was held that the provision of Va. act. 1874, chap. 214, § 22, prohibiting any person not a citizen of the state from planting or taking oysters within the waters of the commonwealth, denies to the citizens of other states the equal privileges and immunities secured to them by the United States Constitution, art. 4, and is unconstitutional. Ex parte McCready, 1 Hughes, 598, Fed. Cas. No. 8,732.

But that ruling was overruled in McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. ed. 248.

Regulation of commerce.

A state law does not conflict with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution which is intended to prevent the destruction of oysters within the waters of that state, by the use of particular instruments in taking them. Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 269.

A state law abridging the right of citizens of other states to take oysters within its limits except in particular vessels is not a regulation of the external commerce of the state in conflict with the power conferred upon Congress. Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230.

The states, by surrendering to the Federal 60 L. R. A.

government the right to regulate commerce, did not part with the ownership of the fish in the tidal waters within their borders, or with the right to regulate and control their taking. State v. Corson, 87 N. J. L. 178, 50 Atl. 780.

Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

The power vested in the several states, before the adoption of the Constitution, to regulate the fisheries belonging to them, and to punish those who should transgress their regulations, was not surrendered to the United States by the mere grant of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction to the judicial branch of the government. Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230.

Other provisions.

The provision of the California act of April 23, 1880, making it a misdemeanor for aliens incapable of becoming electors to take fish from the waters of the state for purposes of sale, is a denial of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed to any person within the jurisdiction of a state, under the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, and is also in violation of arts. 5 and 6 of the treaty with China. Re Ah Chong, 6 Sawy. 451, 2 Fed. 733.

A state tax nominally upon a license to engage in the oyster industry is void if calculated according to the tonnage of the vessel. Johnson v. Drummond, 20 Gratt. 419.

But it was held that the act for better enforcement in Maurice cove and Delaware river of the act for the preservation of oysters and clams, which levies a fee on the boats in proportion to their tonnage, and requires them to be licensed, is not repugnant to the United States Constitution as a regulation of interstate commerce. State, Johnson, Prosecutor, v. Loper, 46 N. J. L. 321.

So, the provision of the Maryland act of 1880, chap. 296, that boats used in dredging for oysters shall pay to the state at the rate of $3 per ton of the boat's measurement for such privilege, is not invalid as a tonnage tax within the prohibition of the Federal Constitution. Dize v. Lloyd, 36 Fed. 651.

A state's fish laws cannot be held to diminish the rights of Indians under a treaty with the Federal government to fish on their reservation. Re Blackbird, 109 Fed. 189.

Construction of statutes.

The statute of Rhode Island prohibiting the taking of oysters and other shell fish within the waters or on the shores of the state by any but persons who are citizens of the state is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, art. 4, § 2, which provides "that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." State v. Medbury, 3 R. I. 138.

Rhode Island Gen. Stat. chap. 132, § 10, which provides that "no person not a citizen of the state shall be allowed to fish for oysters or other shell fish within the waters of this state," applies only to the free and common oyster fisheries of Rhode Island, and does not apply to the taking of oysters from private beds on which oysters have been planted and propagated. New England Oyster Co. v. McGarvey, 12 R. I. 385.

The effect of a provision that "no person not a citizen of this state shall be allowed to fish for oysters or other shell fish within the waters of this state," prescribing a penalty for its violation, and a statute which relates to private and several oyster fisheries, and authorizes the shell fish commissioners to lease, in the name of the state, to any person, being an inhabitant of the state, any piece of land within the state, covered by the tide waters at low tide, and not within any harbor line, to be used as a private and several oyster fishery,—is to secure the benefit of fisheries primarily to the people; but citizens of other states are not prohibited from acquiring and holding a derivative benefit and emolument from the fisheries. Hence, where an inhabitant of Rhode Island agreed with a citizen of Massachusetts that the former should lease oyster grounds in Narragansett bay, plant them with oysters, and ship them to the resident of Massachusetts, the latter furnishing the required capital, and directing the business, and paying the resident of Rhode Island a stated salary; and where it appeared that large investments were made, and the contract was executed for several years,—it was held that equity would require the Rhode Island resident to account where he failed to account for the property of the complainant, and that a demurrer to the bill on the ground of the illegality of the contract would be overruled. Ibid.

The statute of Rhode Island, prohibiting the taking of oysters and other shell fish within the waters or on the shores of the state by any but persons who are citizens of the state, is not repugnant to the charter of Charles II. to the colony of Rhode Island, which provided that the charter shall not in any manner hinder the trade of fishing on the coast of New England, and that all the subjects in the colony should have the right to continue to fish upon the said coast, and to build upon the waste land such wharves, stages, and workhouses as should be necessary for the salting, drying, and keeping of fish, as such charter did not give the right to fish upon the shores of the colony; but it was intended that it should not trench upon the right of fishery previously enjoyed, and as, by the terms of the charter, it is evident that the rights of fishing stated in the charter related to the cod fishery, and not to the oyster fishery. Neither is such act repugnant to R. I. Const. art. 1, § 17, by which it is declared that the people shall continue to enjoy all rights of fishery which have heretofore existed under the charter and usages of the state, and that no new right is intended to be granted, nor any existing right impaired. State v. Medbury, 3 R. I. 138.

The statute of Virginia which forbids non-residents to catch fish in the waters of the state for the manufacture of manure and oil, and to manufacture manure and oil from fish caught within the waters of the state, or to build or erect any machinery within the limits of the state for the purpose of manufacturing such oil or manure, does not violate the United States Constitution, art. 4, § 2. Chambers Bros. v. Church, 14 R. I. 398, 51 Am. Rep. 410.

The compact made in April, 1783, between the states of New Jersey and Pennsylvania authorizes the guarding of fisheries on the Delaware river annexed to the respective shores against interruption by persons fishing under claim of common right on the river. Bennett v. Boggs, Baldwin, 60, Fed. Cas. No. 1,319.

A condition providing that every vessel used by persons upon whom the state has conferred the privilege of engaging in catching, planting, and growing oysters upon lands of the state lying under its waters shall be licensed, the fee for which shall be graduated according to the tonnage of the vessel, is not a violation of the Federal Constitution, art. 1, § 8, which prohibits states from levying a duty of tonnage on ships for being allowed to enter or depart from a port; the license fee imposed not being laid upon the vessel as an instrument of commerce, but as a regulation of the business. State v. Corson, 67 N. J. L. 178, 50 Atl. 780. 60 L. R. A.

A Virginia statute restricting the use of oyster fisheries in the Potomac river to citizens of Virginia is valid as against all offenders including depredators from Maryland, though it has not the consent and approval of that state; the compact of 1785 not applying to the case. Ex parte Marsh, 57 Fed. 719.

A provision that leases of tide lands owned by the state shall be granted only to citizens of the state who have been such for a period of twelve months preceding is not open to objection as granting exclusive privileges to individuals. State v. Corson, 67 N. J. L. 178, 50 Atl. 780.

The license to use submerged land for the planting of oysters is, in Maryland, expressly restricted by statute to residents of the state. Hess v. Muir, 85 Md. 586, 5 Atl. 540, 6 Atl. 673.

By the 1785 compact between Maryland and Virginia, Virginia has the right to make such regulations, with the consent of Maryland, as may be necessary to protect its fisheries; and when the regulations are properly made and consented to, they may be enforced in Virginia against citizens of Maryland. Hendricks v. Com. 73 Va. 934.

But a statute of the state of Maryland prohibiting fishing with gill nets in the Potomac river is inoperative unless shown to have been assented to by the state of Virginia, in view of the compact between those states that all laws and regulations which may be necessary for the preservation of fish in the River Potomac shall be made with the mutual consent and approbation of both states. State v. Hoofman, 9 Md. 28.

Canadian regulations.

The Dominion Parliament in Canada has the right to legislate on the subject of fishery regulations. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

But the Dominion has no authority over the question of the right to take fish from particular waters. And it therefore has no right to lease private rights of fishery in the waters. This right belongs to the province. Ibid.

The Dominion Parliament has the right to control in such manner as, in its discretion, shall seem expedient all deep-sea fishing, the right to take all fish ordinarily caught either on the sea coast or in the great lakes or in the rivers of the Dominion, and such as are valuable for food within the Dominion, or for exportation for that purpose, or for any other purpose of trade and commerce; and must include as well the right to catch fish as the designation and control of the places where the fish may be caught and the times and manner of catching them. Ibid.

In the British North America act organizing the Canadian federation the Dominion was invested with the control of "inland and sea fisheries," while the provinces were given charge of "property and civil right." Since a right of fishery in a nontidal stream is a right of property incident to ownership of soil, the Dominion cannot grant rights of fishery in such waters. Ibid.

The fact that by the British North American act legislative jurisdiction over certain waters was reposed in the Dominion of Canada affords no evidence that the proprietary rights thereto were also transferred; and, while the Dominion has legislative supervision of the fisheries, it has or can create no proprietary interest therein. Atty. Gen. v. Atty. Gen. [1898] A. C. 700, 78 L. T. N. S. 697, 67 L. J. P. C. N. S. 90, Reversing Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

Licenses.

Some of the states have assumed such control of the fisheries in public waters that they forbid any one to exercise it except under the state's license, and they provide, not only for the granting of licenses, but for the manner in which they may be enjoyed.

The legislature has the power to license fishing within the waters of the state, and to give exclusive control of the waters within a reasonable distance for the period of one year for the operation of fixed appliances therefor; and such license does not come within the inhibition of a grant by the state of an exclusive privilege to such waters. Walker v. Stone, 17 Wash. 578, 50 Pac. 488.

In the regulation and preservation of a fishery on inland waters, the legislature may, if it so please, quicken and reward the diligence of persons appointed by the neighboring towns to effect those results by granting them exclusive rights; and those rights will not change their lawful acts in requiring a passage through another's dam into a taking of private property for private use. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222.

Under a Washington statute regulating the catching of salmon, and authorizing the issuing of licenses to fish anywhere in the waters of the Columbia river and Puget sound over which the state has jurisdiction, such licenses cannot be confined to any particular place designated in the application, but apply anywhere within the waters embraced within the statute, provided the limitation therein is observed as to keeping a certain distance from other fishing appliances. State ex rel. Curry v. Crawford, 14 Wash. 373, 44 Pac. 876.

No person will be permitted to obtain the sole benefit of fishing in any particular locality in navigable waters to the practical exclusion of others therefrom by the construction and maintenance of a trap or pound net; and a "roving" license granted by the state to fish anywhere within the waters embraced within the statute cannot be construed as authorizing the maintenance of such a trap at any designated point. Morris v. Graham, 18 Wash. 343, 47 Pac. 752.

Under a statute providing that if the location (i. e. the person who has indicated his location by driving piles and posting his license number thereon as specified in the law) of a fishing location fails to construct his appliance during the fishing season covered by his license, such location shall be deemed abandoned; the end of the actual fishing season, instead of the date of the expiration of the license, is the limit of time for which an indicated location could be held without the construction of a fishing appliance. Legoe v. Chicago Fishing Co. 24 Wash. 175, 64 Pac. 141; DeMiers v. Sandy Spit Fish Co. 24 Wash. 582, 64 Pac. 799.

A license to fish in the waters of the state, authorized to be issued by the fish commission, is a roving license which can never become an interest in real property; therefore, the issuance of such a license to a corporation, a majority of the capital stock of which is held by aliens is not a violation of the constitutional provision against alien ownership of lands. Hastings v. Anacortes Packing Co. (Wash.) 69 Pac. 776.

A party who first entered upon waters in controversy for the purpose of establishing a location for fish traps, and who gave notice to another of his intention so to locate, by word of mouth and by erecting piles and posting licenses which, although not strictly in accordance with the requirements of Laws 1899, p. 203, § 9, he afterwards, at his first opportunity, changed to conform to statutory requirements, is entitled to the location in preference to the other, although the latter was the first to conform to statutory requirements, on the ground that the acts of the former were notice to the other, and that such acts were followed up with due diligence. Elwood v. Dickinson, 26 Wash. 631, 67 Pac. 370.

While subsequent markings of a fishing location in deep waters may reasonably vary some 10 or 15 feet, a lateral encroachment of 60 to 200 feet is unwarranted. Fall & S. Fish Co. v. Point Roberts Fishing & Canning Co. 24 Wash. 630, 64 Pac. 792.

An attempted transfer of a fishing license and of the location and appliances in use thereunder without complying with the statute requiring notice thereof to be given the state fishing commissioners, a noncompliance with which requirement is made a misdemeanor, amounts to an abandonment of the location, and confers no rights thereto upon the assignee. Gerhard v. Worrell, 20 Wash. 492, 55 Pac. 625.

Under a statute providing for the manner of determining the location of fish nets, the legislature intended that a passageway of 600 feet should be left between the ends of all nets, whether located beyond previously located nets or inshore from them. Fidaigo Island Canning Co. v. Womer (Wash.) 89 Pac. 1121.

Under provisions for an end passageway between pound nets of at least 600 feet, and that a pound net may extend 2,500 feet, two nets may not be constructed with a passageway of less than 600 feet, on the ground that their combined length would be less than 2,500 feet. Ibid.

A statute providing that there shall be an end passageway of at least 600 feet, and a lateral passageway of at least 2,400 feet, between all pound nets constructed in the waters of Puget sound, and specifying the manner of determining such distances, is complied with where a locator, after ascertaining the general course the trap would point, ascertained where a line would intersect the shore if projected along that course from the trap to the shore; then, after ascertaining the general direction of the shore for half a mile on each side of the point of intersection, drew a line parallel with the general direction of the shore, causing such line to intersect the outer end of the next adjoining trap; and next, measured at a right angle from the last-mentioned line to the nearest point of the trap location and found the distance to be 610 feet. Point Roberts Fishing Co. v. George & B. Co. 28 Wash. 200, 68 Pac. 438.

An invalid fishing location, because made upon ground covered by a prior valid fishing location, does not become valid by the expiration of the prior license. White Crest Canning Co. v. Sims (Wash.) 70 Pac. 1003.

A valid fishing location cannot be made upon the same ground where one already exists. Ibid.

But when a fishing location is abandoned, the territory is open to location by others for fishing. Ibid.

Under the British North American act, the Dominion can only lease a fishery where a private several fishery does not already exist by law. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

A lessee from a town of the right of fishing in a brook cannot deny the right of the town to make the lease to avoid payment of the rent unless he is evicted. Eastham v. Anderson, 119 Mass. 526.

Under the Massachusetts law of 1869 the commissioners of inland fisheries may lease great ponds above 20 acres in area to the riparian proprietor for the "cultivation of useful fishes." Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441.

The state license to fish within certain waters for a specified period is a franchise which entitles the holder to maintain an action for injunction for any infringement of the rights thereby secured him. Walker v. Stone, 17 Wash. 378, 50 Pac. 488.

VI. How exercised.

Conflict with other rights.

The right of fishery is one of the least important of all the rights connected with water. It may be exercised anywhere, not being confined to any particular place. Therefore, when it conflicts with rights the exercise of which is dependent on a particular place, the fishery right must give way.

A right of fishery must give way to the right of navigation. Woolrych, Waters, p. 165.

Since the right of navigation is paramount to the right of fishing in a public river, a license by commissioners appointed by the state to determine where weirs may be erected without injury to the rights of navigation will confer no estate which did not previously exist, but only determine where and by whom the previously existing right may be used consistently with public interest. Van Auken v. Decker, 2 N. J. L. 108.

The right of fishery in navigable waters is subordinate to the right of navigation, and a boat there may "take her course" and go to the bank when and where it is necessary to do so, doing no unnecessary damage, and acting without wantonness or malice, and need not stop or go out of her way or wait upon those managing a seine, which they are permitted to use by sufferance of the sovereign, and not as a right conferred by grant. Lewis v. Keeling, 46 N. C. (1 Jones L.) 299.

In the River Delaware there is a right of fishing which, though subordinate to the right of navigation, cannot be unnecessarily impeded by it. Cobb v. Bennett, 75 Pa. 326, 15 Am. Rep. 752.

A right of common fishery is always enjoyed in subordination to the right of navigation, and any erection of wharves or other structures which can be admitted by the latter right will not be prevented by the former. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

The public right to fish always yields to any permanent improvement by the owner of the land on which the water rests. Hogg v. Bearman, 41 Ohio St. 81, 52 Am. Rep. 71.

The owners of shore or fishery rights in the Delaware river took and hold subject to the necessary transcendental power of the state to erect structures for the improvement of navigation, and any such loss is damnum sine injuria. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

The owner of a several fishery cannot restrain the owner of the adjoining shore from completing a landing place all the piles for which were driven before the issue of the preliminary injunction, where it appears that his rights or claim to relief will not be prejudicial on final hearing. Hugg v. Fath, 37 N. J. Eq. 46.

The owner of a right of fishery has no claim against one who, acting without license from the state, erects a wharf in the stream so as to interfere with the fishery, since that right is held subject to the paramount right of the public. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 29, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

The owner of a fishery cannot recover for an invasion thereof by the erection of a pier if it could no longer be fished to advantage or profit. The fact that a few stray shad could be caught there occasionally amounts to nothing. Id. 90 Pa. 85, 35 Am. Rep. 632.

The owner of a fishery in a navigable river with the privilege of drawing his seine on the shore cannot recover for any injury he may suffer from the erection of a stone wall along the shore by a meadows company chartered thereto by the state without liability for such damages, or after the statute of limitations has run, if erected by a private person. Ibid.

The right to fish in a river must give way to the owner of the right to erect mills. Vattel, Book 1, chap. 22.

But one exercising the public right to take ice from public waters, occupying a part thereof for increasing the thickness of the ice by artificial means, has no complaint against one who enters thereon for the lawful purpose of fishing, and fishes in a reasonable manner through the ice, at a time when the actual operation of gathering the ice has been suspended for a day and two nights. Rowell v. Doyle, 181 Mass. 474.

Interference with other fishery rights.

From the very nature of a public fishery, everyone has an equal right in it; and yet, to be available to anyone, he must for a time have exclusive rights. In the absence of custom or statutory regulation, it is difficult to determine just how far the rights of an individual must be respected.

With respect to fisheries on a river, some principles are established.

As long ago as 46 Ass. 306, pl. 9, there is a writ on behalf of the Abbott of Bukfast against Robert, Dean of the Church of the Blessed Peter, for erecting a weir which prevented fish from coming to the Abbott's weir. And there never seems to have been a doubt that a lower proprietor had no right to interfere with the passage of fish to an upper one from that time to the present.

The owner of a sole and separate fishery has the right to a free passage of fish from the sea into his fishery, and the lower owner of a similar right of fishery is liable if, by the construction of fish traps and weirs, he prevents the passage of fish into the upper fishery. Hamilton v. Donegall, 3 Ridgeway, 267, 324.

Neither a right of several fishery nor to erect a milldam in a stream confers any right to erect constructions in a river to prevent the free passage of the fish up and down the stream at their accustomed seasons, as such obstructions would impair and ultimately destroy all such rights owned by other riparian proprietors on the stream. Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

In Barker v. Faulkner, 79 L. T. N. S. 24, which was an action to restrain a lower owner from maintaining weirs in a trout stream so as to prevent the passage of trout up the stream, the court held that the rule of law which made the construction of the weir in a salmon river so as to prevent the passage of salmon up the river an injury to upper owners for which they had an action might extend to other kinds of fish if damage were shown; and the court refused to hold against the plaintiff on the issue of law raised by the pleadings, and sent the action to trial that all the facts might be ascertained.

The construction and maintenance of a brushwood weir across a stream for a long period of time, through which it was possible for fish to escape into the upper part of the river, will not justify the construction of a stone weir entirely stopping the passage of fish up the stream except in flood times, when the fish might overleap it. Weid v. Hornby, 7 East, 199, 3 Smith, 244.

One having a license to fish in the upper waters of a tidal river may maintain an action against a person who, by unlawfully fishing in the lower waters of the river, caused damage to the plaintiff in the exercise of his right to fish, by intercepting and taking large quantities of fish that would otherwise have gone into the upper waters. Whelan v. Hewson, Ir. Rep. 6 C. L. 283.

In a river not navigable the riparian owner has the exclusive right of fishing to the thread of the stream, except so far as this right has been qualified by legislative regulations. But this right does not include the right to prevent the passage of fish to the lakes and ponds for the multiplication of their species. Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 199, 16 Am. Dec. 386.

The owner of a sole and separate fishery has a right of action against the owner of a lower fishery for building structures which prevent the passage of fish up the stream. Hamilton v. Donegall, 3 Ridgeway, 207.

When fish pass up or down streams for breeding purposes, not even the riparian proprietor of the bed of the stream owns the fish therein, or has the legal right to obstruct their passage up or down. Parker v. People, 111 Ill. 588, 53 Am. Rep. 643.

In Murphy v. Ryan, Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 143, 16 Week. Rep. 678, it is said that the law precludes the riparian proprietors from preventing the passage of fish through the river.

But the owner of a weir has at common law no right of action against one who merely erects another weir in such a position as to prevent him from securing as many fish as he might have done. Cheney v. Guptill, 2 Hannay (N. B.) 379.

Any unlawful interruption of the passage of fish up a stream to an upper fishery is a violation of the common-law rights of the owner of the upper fishery entitling him to an action at law, and it is immaterial that the particular mode of interrupting the passage of the fish was made unlawful by an act of Parliament which provided a remedy for such unlawful interruption. Maasy v. Cassidy, Ir. L. R. 18 Eq. 97.

A riparian owner's right to take fish from the waters by or on his land is to be enjoyed subject to the rights of other proprietors above and below to have such waters remain a passageway for the fish, and of the state to regulate the seasons and the modes in which they may be taken. State v. Theriault, 70 Vt. 617, 43 L. R. A. 290, 41 Atl. 1030.

The riparian proprietor's right of exclusive fishery in his nonnavigable stream must be so exercised as not to injure others in the enjoyment of a similar right upon their lands upon the stream above and below. Griffith v. Holman, 23 Wash. 347, 54 L. R. A. 178, 63 Pac. 239.

A grant of a right to maintain a weir across a river for the purposes of a fishery does not include the right to exclude all fish from passing above the weir so as to exempt the owner from the operation of a legislative resolution requiring fishways in dams. Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 522, 3 Am. Dec. 236.

A riparian owner on a private stream cannot, by virtue of such proprietorship, obstruct the passage of fish up the stream under the maxim, Sic utere, etc. State v. Glen, 52 N. C. (7 Jones L.) 321.

No prescriptive right to maintain a fish dam to the injury of an upper proprietor can be established by an enjoyment of less than twenty years. Weld v. Hornby, 7 East, 195, 3 Smith, 244.

A private individual who with others was engaged in fishing in a river by means of trap or gill nets can maintain an action in behalf of himself and others similarly situated to enjoin the construction and maintenance of a permanent fish trap in such river creating a public nuisance which would render it impossible to drift nets through the channel on either side of 60 L. R. A.

the trap, as such individuals suffer special injury in which the general public do not share, and the fact that others would suffer in the same way if similarly engaged constitutes no bar to the maintenance of the action. Morris v. Graham, 16 Wash. 343, 47 Pac. 752.

A net stretched partially across a river by the proprietor of a lower fishery is not a nuisance to the upper fishery, where a space of 10 or 12 yards is left between it and the shore of sufficient depth to allow fish to pass up the river without obstruction. Wilson v. Moy Fishery Co. Ir. L. R. 19 Eq. 270.

A riparian owner's exclusive right to fish in the water upon his own land does not include the right to destroy the fish he does not take. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 297, 39 L. R. A. 531, 48 Pac. 374.

Where injury to a fishery in one county is caused by an obstruction erected in the stream of another county, the owners of the fishery may bring their action in either county. Barden v. Crocker, 10 Pick. 383.

The owner of a sole and separate fishery may maintain an action in one of the counties through which his fishery extends against a lower owner who obstructs the passage of fish up the stream. Hamilton v. Donegall, 3 Ridgeway, 207, 324.

Wilkes, J., raised the point in Edgar v. English Fisheries, 23 L. T. N. S. 732, which he was inclined to deny, whether one having a several fishery as appurtenant to a house or parcel of land could use it for taking all the fish in the river, for purposes of barter in distant parts.

The question whether or not the erection of a weir in a stream is a public nuisance which would prevent the acquisition of a prescriptive right to maintain it has been much debated.

In Weld v. Hornby, 7 East, 199, 3 Smith, 244, an action by the owner of a fishery against a lower proprietor for constructing a stone weir so as to prevent the passage of fish up the stream, Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., said the erection of weirs across rivers was prohibited in the earliest periods of our law. They were considered as public nuisances. The words of Magna Charta, chap. 23, are that "all weirs from henceforth shall be utterly pulled down on the Thames and Medway, and through all England." And this was followed by subsequent acts, treating them as public nuisances, forbidding the erection of new ones, and the enhancing, strengthening, or enlarging of those which had aforetime existed.

And the fish commissioners in the opinion rendered in the case of Leconfield v. Lonsdale, L. R. 5 C. P. 663, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S. 305, 23 L. T. N. S. 155, 18 Week. Rep. 1165, after a most thorough examination of the statutes, hold that such erection is forbidden by Magna Charta. But the court does not agree with them, and holds that the provisions of Magna Charta and the statutes prohibiting the construction of weirs apply only to tidal rivers.

So that a coop weir which entirely prevents fish from passing it is not a public nuisance when not in a tidal river. Ibid., Affirming Rolle v. Whyte, L. R. 3 Q. B. 286, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 105, 17 L. T. N. S. 560, 16 Week. Rep. 593, 8 Best & S. 116.

How far the passage of fish may be interfered with by the erection of a dam is a question not free from doubt. In most states provision is made for the maintenance of fish ways through the dams, so that the question is not a vital one. See note to People v. Truckee Lumber Co. (Cal.) 39 L. R. A. 581.

As shown by the commissioners in Leconfield v. Lonsdale, L. R. 5 C. P. 663, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S. 305, 23 L. T. N. S. 155, 18 Week. Rep. 1165, there is no necessity of erecting a dam without a fish way, and therefore, although Vattel states, as shown above, that fishery rights must give way to mill rights, yet, since both can exist so far as the passage of fish is concerned, it would seem that there is no right to prevent it, and such is the weight of authority.

The obstruction of the public right of fishery is a nuisance at common law, and extends to the construction of dams without fish ways in a stream which is the outlet of a large inland lake. State v. Franklin Falls Co. 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 513.

Judge Green, in Crenshaw v. Slate River Co. 6 Rand (Va.) 245, in discussing the power of the legislature to yield the public right of navigation to individuals for the sake of securing the public convenience of mills, remarks that they could not justly sacrifice to this object the individual rights in respect to the natural run of fish, and therefore have properly guarded against such obstruction to the passage of fish by imposing it as a condition upon the leave to build a dam that the owner should give free passage to them, and seem always to have considered it as a condition implied, even when it was not expressed. Immediately preceding this he says that the right of fishing in fresh-water streams, or within the bounds of any patent, is not public and common to all, but confined to the riparian owners; each of whom is entitled to the natural run of fish of passage upward, as he is to the natural flow of water downward.

The court, in Woolever v. Stewart, 36 Ohio St. 146, 38 Am. Rep. 569, while declining to determine whether there is an implied limitation upon the right of a riparian owner on non-navigable streams to the center of which he owns to construct a dam, that he shall keep open a sufficient passageway for fish to the waters above, says that, if there was such an implied obligation, it was for the benefit of the upper owners and for them only, which right could be lost by adverse use for a sufficient period to ripen into an adverse right.

The owner of a riparian fishery cannot sue in tort against one erecting a dam within tidal waters under legislative authority (whether or not he could at common law), the statute having duly safe-guarded his property rights. Bristol v. Ousatonick Water Co. 42 Conn. 403.

Where a dam is so constructed as to be a public nuisance by obstructing the migrations of fish, such adverse user, when known to have originated within living memory, will not alone legitimate its maintenance. State v. Franklin Falls Co. 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 513.

But in Dunn v. Stone, 4 N. C. (2 Car. Law Repos.) 261, it is held that the owner of a fishery cannot maintain an action for damage against a lower riparian proprietor for constructing a milldam the effect of which is to obstruct the passage of fish up the stream, as such use of the stream by the mill owner is a proper one.

And in Shrunk v. Schuykill Nav. Co. 14 Serg. & R. 71, it is held that a riparian owner cannot recover for damages to his land resulting from the erection of a dam whereby the ascent of fish from the sea is stopped, as he had no property in either the fish or the river, and all emoluments from such a fishery are precarious. No property has been taken from him.

The assertion that no property is taken by the prevention of the passage of fish up the stream is against the whole weight of authority from 46 Ass. 306, to the present time. The action given for the interference with the passage of fish is founded on a property right; so much so that the right to have fish pass up a 60 L. R. A.

stream may be taken by eminent domain for the purpose of establishing a dam for manufacturing purposes. Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 239.

Property rights of a riparian owner in a fishery in navigable waters under a license from the state must be compensated for so far as disturbed by a corporation taking the land under powers of eminent domain, as the license is not revoked ipso facto by the granting of the franchise. Alexandria & F. R. Co. v. Faunce, 31 Gratt. 761.

The only authorities upholding the assertion of the Pennsylvania court are those which have involved a mere regulation. It has been held that a law regulating the use of a "private" property in a fishery in tidal waters is not a "taking," nor does it impair the obligation of contracts. Com. v. Bailey, 13 Allen, 542.

So, a state does not take private property for public use by forbidding a landowner to take fish from a body of water partly upon his land by certain designated means of destruction. State v. Blount, 85 Mo. 543.

So, a statute for the preservation and protection of fish deprives no one of property, as they are not private property till caught. Peters v. State, 96 Tenn. 682, 33 L. R. A. 114, 36 S. W. 399. See also infra, XI.

Exercise of public right.

A fishery in a public water must be so used as not to injure other persons. Woolrych, Waters, p. 165.

A public right of fishery can be exercised only by such ordinary methods as will not interfere with private rights of the riparian proprietor, and will not include the use of the shore as a place to fasten weirs. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

The public right of fishery does not include the right to stand on the soil or rocks belonging to a riparian proprietor, although one may pass and fish over such place when covered with water. Com. v. Shaw, 14 Serg. & R. 9.

There is no common-law right in the public to use the beach above high-water mark for purposes of fishing when the beach (to high-water mark) has been conveyed by the Crown to a subject. Parker v. Elliott, 1 U. C. C. P. 470.

A public right of fishery does not include the right to place weirs or other permanent erections upon another's land, or to fasten them by grappings to the shore. That is an advantage peculiar to the owner of the shore, and of which he may avail himself if without any unreasonable exercise or unreasonable interference with the rights of others. Duncan v. Sylvester, 24 Me. 482, 41 Am. Dec. 400.

Where the user consisted in taking fish on a certain beach by drawing in a seine by hand it will not authorize the erection of a capstan and reel on such beach. Hart v. Chalker, 5 Conn. 311.

A landowner may, after notice to one who has placed a seine reel on his land to remove it, cut it down and shove it into the water, although the result is that it floats away and is lost. Almy v. Grinnell, 12 Met. 53, 45 Am. Dec. 238.

The public convenience of drawing nets from a public fishery over the adjoining lands of a private owner will not give a right to do so. Brink v. Richtmyer, 14 Johns. 255; Sloan v. Biemiller, 34 Ohio St. 492.

But while a riparian proprietor has the exclusive right of drawing a seine onto his shore, he cannot exclude the public from fishing in the navigable waters in front of his shore. Skinner v. Hettrick, 73 N. C. 53.

In a grant of flats with the fishery rights thereon, a reservation to the public of the liberty of fishing and drying the nets and fish on the shore will not be held to be restricted to the taking of such fish as may be and are usually dried on the shore. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

The owner of an exclusive fishing privilege on flats cannot recover for damages sustained because of another's weir erected below low-water line. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

Individual use of public right.

Every individual has a right to enjoy the public right. But, since no two individuals can enjoy precisely the same right at the same time, some rule must be observed as to the order of time in which the rights shall be exercised. In some instances this is regulated by custom.

No person can acquire a right of fishing in a public fishery superior to any other, unless he has gone into the common waters, and set up and established his pounds and stakes, and taken possession of the line which those pounds and stakes included, with which a stranger cannot directly interfere. Dwelle v. Wilson, 14 Ohio C. C. 551. The court was of opinion that no damages could be recovered in case such stranger established his lines clear around that first established, and thereby impaired its usefulness.

The use of the waters of the navigable rivers for fishing purposes is public to all the people of the state, so that in case one has cleared a fishing place in the bed, he is entitled to protection in its enjoyment so long as he continues in possession and occupation. Pitkin v. Olmstead, 1 Root, 217.

Where one by labor and expense makes a fishing place in navigable waters, without obstructing and infringing on previous existing rights, he should be protected in its enjoyment. Lay v. King, 5 Day, 72.

A custom on the part of inhabitants on the shores of a navigable river that any one of them who clears a place for seine fishing shall hold it against everybody during the fishing season, is void for uncertainty and unreasonableness. Freary v. Cooke, 14 Mass. 488.

A common understanding among fishermen to refrain from interference with one's use of a fishery established by clearing out the shores for the more convenient use of seines by the owner of the shore cannot impair the rights of the public in all navigable waters, although not exercised by upland owners because shut off from convenient access to the shore by distance. Collins v. Benbury, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 118, 43 Am. Dec. 155.

And it has been held that the owner of riparian land can acquire no right to an exclusive fishery in adjoining navigable waters by merely cleaning out the bottom for the more speedy and secure fishing by a seine to be hauled up on his own beach. Ibid.; Fagan v. Armistead, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 438.

Clearing out a fishing place in a river does not give an exclusive right of fishery there if the one doing so does not own the shore. Westfall v. VanAuker, 12 Johns. 425.

Under the Massachusetts ordinances of 1641 and 1647, a riparian proprietor may plant stakes in his flats for his own convenience in fishery, although the use of the public fishery in a particular manner is thereby interfered with, as the public right of free fishing is subordinate to the right of property in the soil belonging to an individual. Locke v. Motley, 2 Gray, 265.

The owner of soil between high and low water mark has the exclusive right to catch fish thereon by means of fixtures attached to the soil. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

Fishing with stake nets on the seacoast, near the mouth of a river, is not prohibited either by statute or the common law of Scotland. Kintore v. Forbes, 4 Bligh N. R. 485.

Stakes driven for the purpose of trap-net fishing in deep water cannot be wantonly removed by the owner of a neighboring island situated more than a mile from shore, within which distance the riparian owner's right is preserved by statute, where the stakes did not hinder navigation, and the owner does not suffer special damage on account of them. Lincoln v. Davis, 53 Mich. 375, 51 Am. Rep. 116, 19 N. W. 103.

Under a statute providing that when any person shall have been at the expense of clearing a fishing place in a river, and has used the right to take fish there in the season thereof, he shall have the right of enjoyment of the fishing place, the right cannot be assigned to another person. Munson v. Baldwin, 7 Conn. 168.

A flat within a river, cove, or harbor is a place covered with water too shallow for navigation with vessels ordinarily used for commercial purposes within the meaning of a statute securing to any persons who shall first make a weir for catching fish in any flat within a river, cove, or harbor the uninterrupted enjoyment of it. Stannard v. Hubbard, 34 Conn. 370.

A fishing trap which interferes with the common right of fishery as regulated by the laws is a public nuisance, and a private nuisance to one whose lawful location is injured and damaged thereby. Cherry Point Fish Co. v. Nelson, 25 Wash. 558, 66 Pac. 55.

But where immemorial custom and legislative regulation recognize the erection of fish traps in navigable waters as a reasonable use, so long as they do not obstruct navigation, they are not indictable as a public nuisance. Boatwright v. Bookman, Rice L. 447.

Conflict between private rights.

The grantee of a riparian owner's several fishery has the right to use the adjoining shore above low-water mark only so far as necessary and as it has been used in the fishery; and the grantor may make any use thereof which does not injure or impede the use of the fishery. Hart v. Hill, 1 Whart. 124.

A right to take fish is a profit à prendre in alieno solo. It requires for its use and enjoyment exclusive occupancy during the period of fishing. It implies the right to fix stakes as capstans for the purpose of drawing the seine and the occupancy of the bank at high tide as well as the space between high and low water mark as far as may be necessary and usual. The grantee in the nature of things must have exclusive possession for the time he is fishing and for that purpose; the grantor for all other times and for all other purposes. Tincum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 587.

The grant to the copy holder of the fee to his riparian lands with the appurtenant fishery extinguishes the right of the lord of the manor to exercise and grant the privilege of the said fishery, and is the enjoyment thereof to go along the bank of said stream. Tilbury v. Silva, L. R. 45 Ch. Div. 98, 63 L. T. N. S. 141.

When the owner of manor and fishery grants the former without an express reservation of the right of drawing his nets on the shore, the notorious, continued exercise of that privilege for more than twenty years will raise a presumption of such reservation grant. Gray v. Bond, 2 Brod. & B. 667, 5 J. B. Moore, 537.

The grant of a salmon fishery in Maine waters refers to the privilege of making grapplings for the weir or the permanent structures fast to the shore. Duncan v. Sylvester, 24 Me. 482, 41 Am. Dec. 400.

Salmon fishings being inter regalia of the Crown (Scottish), a prior grant of the shore does not preclude a grant of the said fishery in favor of one having no interest in any adjoining shore; and such subsequent grantee may draw his nets on the banks of the prior grantee's grounds without his consent, that being a pertinent right to the fishery. Gammell v. Wood & Forest Comrs. 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 419.

Whales.

The effect of custom is well illustrated in the whale fishery.

A usage that whales shot in Massachusetts bay with bomb lances, and which when killed sink to the bottom and float in from one to three days thereafter, belong to the person killing them, is reasonable and valid, and entitles such person to recover the value of a whale so killed by him and appropriated by another. Ghen v. Rich, 5 Fed. 159.

The captors of a whale who anchor the body and attach to it a piddle and sail in token of ownership may maintain a libel for conversion against the owners of a vessel which found the whale adrift with the cable and anchor attached, and appropriated it. Bartlett v. Budd, 1 Low. Dec. 223, Fed. Cas. No. 1,075.

A whale killed and left anchored with marks of appropriation is the property of the captors, and their right is not lost, although it may have dragged the anchor. Taber v. Jenny, 1 Sprague, 315, Fed. Cas. No. 13,720.

A usage that a whale belongs to the vessel whose iron first remained in it, provided claim is made before any crew has taken possession of and cut in the animal, will be upheld in favor of a vessel which made fast to a whale, which escaped dragging the iron and line and was captured by the crew of another vessel, who did not know of the first attack and pursuit, but yielded the whale in conformity to such usage to the first pursuers who came up before cutting in. Swift v. Gifford, 2 Low. Dec. 110, Fed. Cas. No. 13,696.

By custom a whale belongs to the ship whose crew places the first iron in it. Bourne v. Ashley, Fed. Cas. No. 1,698.

In Littledale v. Scalth, 1 Taunt. 243, note, an action of trover for a whale, the counsel on both sides agreed the law to be, both by the custom of Greenland and as settled by former determinations at Guildhall, as follows: While the harpoon remains in the fish, and the line continues attached to it, and also continues in the power or management of the striker, the whale is a fast fish; and though during that time struck by a harpooner of another ship, and though she afterwards breaks from the first harpoon, but continues fast to the second, the second harpoon is called a friendly harpoon, and the fish is the property of the first striker. But if the first harpoon is not in the power of the striker the fish is a loose fish, and will become the property of any other person who strikes and obtains it. Approved in Fennings v. Grenville, 1 Taunt. 241.

In Hogarth v. Jackson, Moody & M. 58, 2 Car. & P. 595, the plaintiff gave evidence of the custom of the Greenland fishery varying from that stated in Littledale v. Scalth, 1 Taunt. 243, note, and contended that the custom was that the whale continued the property of the first striker, not merely while the harpoon continued in the fish, and the line attached to it, but although it came out of the fish, or had been detached from the line, if the fish were entangled in the line, and the line continued in the power or management of the striker. This custom was to a certain extent proved in evidence and admitted on the part of the defendants.

In Skinner v. Chapman, Moody & M. 58, note, tried at York at the Lent assizes 1827, which was an action of trover for a whale, it appeared that while the fish was unquestionably fast the boat of the defendants came and the crew struck the fish with a lance, then afterwards struck it with a harpoon, and finally secured it. The blow with the lance was of no service towards securing the fish, but made it struggle violently, and in the struggle the harpoon of the plaintiffs was disengaged, but it did not clearly appear whether this took place before or after the harpoon was struck by the crew of the defendants. Bayley, J., left it to the jury to say whether the harpoon of the plaintiffs was fast when the harpoon of the defendants was struck; and, if they thought it was not, whether the plaintiffs could have secured the fish if the lance of the defendants had not been struck; saying that he was clearly of opinion that when one party has struck an animal, if another comes unsolicited, does an act which prevents the first striker from killing it, and then kills it himself, he does so, not for his own benefit, but for that of the first striker.

In a later case it is said: "There has prevailed in the northern whale fishery for a considerable period of time—probably ever since the time when these fisheries came into the possession of this country—the rule that the person who first harpoons a fish and retains his hold of that fish until it is finally captured is to be regarded as the proprietor of the fish, although the actual capture and killing of the whale may be accomplished by the assistance of other persons." This is technically known as the "fast and loose" rule, prima facie applicable in all that fishery, and was held to apply to a case where the harpooner fastened an inflated seal-skin as a "drag" to the line when the whale had sunk so deep as to involve either the cutting of the line or the sinking of the boat, the whale being held to be still in his possession. Aberdeen Arctic Co. v. Sutter, 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. 355, 6 L. T. N. S. 229, 10 Week. Rep. 516.

Interference with captured fish.

STATE V. SHAW has carried the doctrine with reference to captured fish a little further than it has before been carried. In it the fish had not been secured beyond a possibility of escape, which point has been emphasized in most of the other cases. But in it also was an element which does not appear in the other cases. That element consisted in the fact that a private net or trap which already contained the fish was made use of by defendants to secure them. So far as defendants were concerned, therefore, the means of escape were in fact cut off, and defendants were justly held liable for taking the fish from the trap.

Fish are fera natura before being caught, but if found in a weir constructed for no other purpose than to catch those named in a grant, they will be the taker's property, even though not included among the fish named. Treat v. Parsons, 84 Me. 520, 24 Atl. 946.

There is, however, no liability for merely disturbing a person in the exercise of his right to take fish from the open water.

A riparian proprietor has an exclusive right to stand upon his own soil and cast his lines or nets into the river; but he has no right in the fish until he captures them, and has no cause of action against one who frightens them away. Slingerland v. International Contracting Co. 48 App. Div. 215, 60 N. Y. Supp. 12.

In Stevens v. Jeacocke, 11 Q. B. 731, 17 L.

J. Q. B. N. S. 163, 12 Jur. 477, the court said: "In an ordinary case of fishing at sea, we are not aware of any [common law] action by one fisherman against another for anticipating him in the capture of fish which had not been appropriated," and where the subject has been regulated by statute, which imposes penalty for infringement, the penalty is confined to that.

Plaintiff was not in possession of a shoal of fish so as to entitle him to maintain trespass against another for taking them, where at the time of the taking he had cast a seine nearly around them, but had left a small space which the seine did not fill up, although he placed his fishermen around the opening and splashed and disturbed the water so that the fish could not escape, and through which opening the defendant's boats were rowed, they casting another seine and taking the fish. Young v. Hichens, Davison & M. 592, 6 Q. B. 606.

In a common fishery there can be no property in the fish before they are caught. Yard v. Carman, 3 N. J. L. 937.

The fish swimming in the water above as well as below low-water mark are the property of the first taker whether he has or has not an interest in the soil under the water where they are taken. This right, vesting in the public, can be conveyed only by the public or the sovereign power which represents the public, and can be exercised only by such ordinary methods as will not interfere with private rights. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

The holder of the title in fee of the land under the waters of a lake does not own the fish therein until they are taken and within his power, where they are able to pass out of the lake by both its inlet and outlet. People v. Dextater, 75 Hun, 472, 27 N. Y. Supp. 481.

The construction of a wire fence across the mouth of a cove does not give one such a possession of fish caught and placed in the water therein that he can retain title to them after they are thus restored to their natural elements. Sollers v. Sollers, 77 Md. 148, 20 L. R. A. 94, 26 Atl. 188.

In several fishery.

Even in a several or private fishery which is connected with other water, it would seem that there was no title to the fish, and that the remedy for illegal fishing was trespass, and not trover or other possessory action for the fish.

The occupant of a fishery has no property right to the fish therein until reduced to possession. Bracton, De Legibus, Lib. II., F. 9.

The owner of the land covered by and surrounding a pond or small lake has the exclusive right of taking fish therefrom, but his title to the fish is no different or greater because such pond has no regular outlet but connects with a stream only during periods of high water, at which times the fish are at liberty to pass from or into such pond from the stream, but his title is the same as if the pond or lake was a bayou having uninterrupted connection with the stream. People v. Bridges, 142 Ill. 30, 16 L. R. A. 684, 31 N. E. 115.

Although in Smith v. Kemp, 2 Salk. 637, Holt, 322, it is held that the owner of a free fishery hath a property in the fish, and may bring a possessory action for them without making any title.

Under statutory provisions for fish culture ponds are frequently constructed and stocked with fish which are prevented from escaping by netting across the outlet and inlet. As long as the fish are in such ponds the title is in the owner of the pond.

The public does not acquire a license to fish in private waters or unnavigable streams on 60 L. R. A. private land through the stocking of such streams by a fish commissioner with trout raised at the expense of the state. Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349; Albright v. Cortright, 64 N. J. L. 380, 48 L. R. A. 616, 45 Atl. 634.

One may construct a fishpond without a privilege. Anonymous, 6 Mod. 183.

Stocking a great pond with a new species of fish, and closing the outlet with a wire screen establish an occupation of a pond for the purpose of artificially cultivating and maintaining fish. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175.

The absolute ownership created by a statute to encourage the cultivation of useful fishes necessarily exists only where and so long as the propagator or cultivator keeps them within waters over which he has absolute control. Com. v. Perley, 130 Mass. 469.

In Moyle v. Mayle, Owen, 66, an action against a lessee for waste, the court expressed the opinion that the breaking of a weir or the bank of a fish pond, so that the water and fish ran out, is waste.

A statute for the protection of fish in a private stream, spring, or pond can refer only to such waters as are so far private property as to confine the fish with which it is stocked to waters on land belonging to the person establishing the fishery. Reynolds v. Com. 93 Pa. 458; Benscoter v. Long, 157 Pa. 208, 27 Atl. 674.

The act of 1871 gives the proprietor of an unnavigable tidal stream where it emptied into salt water, who encloses it for the purpose of cultivating fishes, control of the stream within his own premises and around the mouth of the stream. Eastham v. Anderson, 119 Mass. 526.

The lessee of a great pond has an exclusive fishery therein as provided by statute when the pond is "occupied" effectively, although not in the manner or by the appliances expected by the legislature. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175.

A notice adjacent to a private pond or stream forbidding trespassers of every kind in the waters and upon the shores of said pond or stream is not sufficient to give notice that the waters are private and used for the propagation of fish, and which will bring him within a statute punishing a trespasser in such private preserves. Com. ex rel. Glenburn Fish & Game Protective Asso. v. Singer, 3 Lack. Legal News, 230.

VII. Rights in lakes and ponds.

In public lakes.

Since the right to fish follows the title to the soil, there is no public fishery in inland lakes where the title is not in the public.

The Crown has no de jure right to soil or fisheries in an inland lake like Lough Neagh in Ireland ("the longest inland lake in the United Kingdom and one of the largest in Europe"), and can grant no several fishery therein unless its right to the soil or fisheries is established. Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641.

The soil of an inland sea, together with the water and right of fishing therein, may be specially appropriated to an individual whether or not he has land adjacent thereto. Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68.

The public has not, as of common right, a fishery in large inland lakes in which the tide does not flow or reflow, although they are public navigable waters. Ibid.

The public has no right of fishery in the

Riparian owners have a right of fishery in the waters of a nontidal, inland lake. Ibid. This lake was 8 miles long and 1 to 4 miles wide.

But where the public has title to the bed of the lake, it also has the right of fishery.

Any citizen of the state has a lawful right, in common with all other citizens, to fish in the waters of Lake Michigan. Such waters are a common fishery, and the right is common to the whole public. Kuehn v. Milwaukee, 83 Wis. 583, 18 L. R. A. 553, 53 N. W. 912.

In Dwelle v. Wilson, 14 Ohio C. C. 551, it is said that the right of fishing in Lake Erie is public and common to all, in which no man can acquire a right superior to another, except that bounds and stakes once set in such common water cannot be interfered with by another.

And in Sloan v. Blemliller, 84 Ohio St. 492, 8 Rep. 566, it is decided that riparian owners do not own the soil or control the fisheries to the center of Lake Erie or Sandusky bay, but that the right of fishery is a public one as much as if those waters were subject to the ebb and flow of tide. The court said that it is obviously just that the fishery in such waters as Lake Erie and its bays should be as free and common as upon tide waters, and alike subject to control by public authority. The reason for regarding the right as public is as great there as in the seas, and we have no hesitation in saying that the right of fishing in these waters is as open to the public as if they were subject to the ebb and flow of the tide.

And that case was followed and approved in Bodi v. Winous Point Shooting Club, 57 Ohio St. 226, 48 N. E. 944.

It is common law in Maine that the fish in great ponds may lawfully be taken by anyone who can and does obtain access to the pond in the manner recognized as lawful in the colonial ordinance of 1641, such "great ponds" being natural ponds exceeding 10 acres in extent, and which have not been devoted by the proprietor to the artificial cultivation or maintenance of useful fishes as provided by statute. Barrows v. McDermott, 73 Me. 441.

Fishing is lawful and free upon every great pond to all persons who own land adjoining it, or can obtain access thereto without trespass, so far as they do not interfere with the reasonable use of the ponds by others, or with the public right, unless in cases where the legislature have otherwise directed. West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158.

An owner of a governmental grant of land surrounding a large pond cannot obtain an injunction to restrain an individual from fishing therein. Percy Summer Club v. Welch, 66 N. H. 180, 28 Atl. 22.

No notice to the city or town within which the pond lies of an intention to lease the pond, lying wholly within said township, need be given where the application is made by the town and the lease is made to it. Com. v. Elliot, 146 Mass. 5, 15 N. E. 81.

The right of hunting and fishing upon a small inland lake, the title to the bed of which is in the state, is in the public, and riparian owners have no greater rights therein than other members of the public. Ne-pee-nauk Club v. Wilson, 96 Wis. 290, 71 N. W. 661.

But where waters are private property, although superficially larger than great ponds, the fishery therein is private, and the owner may maintain trespass against one who enters and takes fish therein which the owner propagates. New England Trout & Salmon Club v. Mather, 68 Vt. 336, 33 L. R. A. 569, 35 Atl. 323. 60 L. R. A.

The right of fishing in the fresh-water lakes of the state is prima facie a private right resting exclusively in the owner of the soil covered by the water, but it is a right subject to a taking by eminent domain for a public use. State, Albright, Prosecutor, v. Sussex County Lake & Park Commission (N. J. L.) 53 Atl. 612.

The owner of land entirely surrounding a small lake, including the land covered thereby, is also the owner of the fish in such lake, and has the exclusive right of fishing therein. Beckman v. Kreamer, 43 Ill. 447, 92 Am. Dec. 146.

In all the Canadian provinces except Quebec, riparian proprietors have the common-law right of an exclusive fishery in (in fact) nonnavigable lakes, rivers, streams, and waters, the beds of which have been granted to them by the Crown. Re Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

Where the bed of a lake or pond is private property the public is presumed to have no right to fish in, and boat upon, the waters. Lembeck v. Nye, 47 Ohio St. 336, 8 L. R. A. 578, 24 N. E. 686.

A private lake or pond or waters within the Michigan statute relating to fishing rights of owners of such waters are those which are not navigable, and where the soil under and on their borders is owned exclusively by persons who claim the waters as their private property, and which have no connection with other streams of waters which are public and through which fish may pass. Re Water Rights, 5 Det. L. N. No. 14.

Ownership of a part of the shore of a pond will give no right to fish therein, or to license others so to do, if it is the property of another. Baylor v. Decker, 133 Pa. 168, 19 Atl. 351.

A pond the bed of which is held in trust for the public use, situated wholly within land conveyed by a governmental grant of township lots, is not "wholly within the control" of the littoral proprietor within the terms of the statute forbidding the taking of fish from waters "wholly within the control of the owner of the land around it." State v. Welch, 66 N. H. 178, 28 Atl. 21.

Where it has always been a public custom to take fish from a pond, trespass will not lie against one who, in the absence of any notification to the contrary, may understand that he is licensed thereto, although the pond is in fact private. Marsh v. Colby, 39 Mich. 628, 23 Am. Rep. 439.

Each of the owners of adjoining tracts of land over which a reservoir was constructed has only a several right of fishery in the water over his land, and upon the drawing off of the water they do not become tenants in common in the fish, under a statute authorizing them to take the water out of the reservoir once in seven years for the purpose of taking the fish therein, but each is entitled to the fish left on his soil. Snape v. Dobbs, 8 J. B. Moore, 23, 1 Bing. 202.

Mill ponds.

A grant of totam partem meam piscaria, saving to me and my heirs stagno molendini mei, is good. Rivaux v. Fauch, 34 Ass. pl. 11.

The owner of a milldam acquires no further right over the lands of an upper proprietor flowed thereby than to maintain the flowage for his water power. Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160.

A release and discharge by the owner of a part of the land covered by an artificial pond created by the owner of the remaining land of all claims, easements, privileges, and rights except the use of the water for milling purposes, releases his right to fish in the water over his own land as well as that of the other owner, secured by a former agreement between them conferring upon the person executing the release the use of the water for fishing and boating purposes. Sidwell v. Greig, 17 Misc. 165, 40 N. Y. Supp. 968.

A mill owner, being possessed of a mill and having a sole fishery in the waters of the mill, granted the mill with all water necessary for working the same, "except and always reserving the right and privilege of fishing in the waters of the said mill." It was held that this was an exception of the sole fishery, and not a reservation of a new easement. Paget v. Milles, 3 Dougl. 43.

The owner of the soil under an unnavigable stream does not create a public fishery by ponding the water. Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 333.

An exclusive fishery in nonnavigable waters has its source in ownership of the soil, and is not devested by a legislative act condemning the land to the use of another for mill purposes. Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

But in one case it was held that a lease conveying all the land which might be flowed from a certain dam passes the water and the fish therein as incidents to the principal grant. Smith v. Miller, 5 Mason, 191, Fed. Cas. No. 13,080.

Under fish culture acts.

The Massachusetts statute of 1869 for encouraging the cultivation of useful fishes, entirely prohibits fishing for any fish, migratory or not, in a great pond lawfully appropriated, without the riparian proprietor having the right thereto. Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441.

When a statute to encourage the cultivation of useful fish has vested in a lessee all the right of fishery in a public pond subject to the provision that his structure must not debar ingress and egress "at proper times" for the enjoyment of other consistent public rights, the statute affirms what would otherwise have been implied, for the statute could not be construed to secure a right of ingress and egress at unreasonable times. Ibid.

The mere fact that one who cultivates fish in a pond does not own the whole pond, and there is nothing to prevent the fish from going over land of another person, will not give strangers a right to fish over the land of the one cultivating the fish, without his permission. Com. v. Skatt, 162 Mass. 219, 38 N. E. 409.

A statute to protect private waters "used or improved by the owners or lessees for the propagation of fish or game fish" does not apply to waters into which a few fish have been put without further effort made to effect an increase by artificial and natural means. Benscoter v. Long, 157 Pa. 208, 27 Atl. 674.

A stream of water is not within inclosed lands within the meaning of a statute prescribing a penalty for fishing in inclosed grounds where the stream passes between parcels of land owned by different persons, although they are inclosed on every side except on that towards the river. Lisle v. Brown, 1 Marsh. 127, 5 Taunt. 440.

One who owns the land surrounding a pond is not entitled to take trout therefrom during the prohibited season, unless the water is so inclosed as to be absolutely within his control, and the free passage of fish to and from it is entirely and rightfully obstructed. State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 484.

der the Massachusetts law of 1869 for the cultivation of fish, until abandoned, are "a place in which fishes are lawfully artificially cultivated or maintained" within the statute, the question whether any particular means should be taken to carry out that purpose being for the commissioners to determine in framing the lease. Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441.

Under § 9, Mass. act 1869, to encourage the cultivation of useful fishes, the whole of a great pond may be leased subject to the restrictions that the appliances and inclosures for the purpose shall not occupy more than one tenth of the pond, and shall be so placed as not to debar reasonable ingress to and egress from it, and that any public right in the pond, other than the right of fishing, shall not be affected. Ibid.

The owner of premises used for fish culture, having stood by and seen large expenditures made in the construction of a meadow stream on adjoining premises for the purpose of fish culture, is not entitled to an injunction restraining diversion on premises of water from a natural water course into a meadow stream, where the water is restored to its natural channel on such adjoining premises in substantially the same condition as to quantity and quality as before such diversion. Castalia Trout Club Co. v. Castalia Sporting Club, 8 Ohio C. C. 194.

In the statute providing that "the fish and game warden of the state may take from any of the public waters of the state at any time and in any manner any fish for the purpose of propagating or restocking other waters," other waters means public waters, and not private ponds. State v. Sears, 115 Iowa, 28, 87 N. W. 735.

A provision that the lessee of a privilege of cultivating fish in a part of a public pond may occupy the whole of the part so assigned with appliances and inclosures "for the taking" as well as the cultivation of the fish, is valid under a provision of the law authorizing the taking from such waters when and where said lessee pleases. Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 441.

VIII. Other rights.

Of municipal corporation.

By the common law of Massachusetts a municipal corporation may appropriate the fish in tidal waters within its limits if they have not been appropriated by the legislature. Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140.

A legislative grant to a town of soil under tidal waters does not convey by implication the right of fishery to the town as its own property, since the fishery is not an incident to the right of property in the soil, but a public right to take the fish. Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216.

The statute of 1855, chap. 401, regulating fisheries in Taunton great river and dividing the whole fishery into shares that belong to the towns so far as they were valuable to sell at auction, was not affected by the statute of 1856, chap. 50, giving the proper authorities of a city lying on tide water the right to license weirs in the water within its limits so far as they would not encroach upon the rights of others, since the taking of fish by weirs would, of necessity, encroach upon the rights of proprietors under the prior act. Hathaway v. Thomas, 16 Gray, 290.

Where a town holds fisheries in trust for the use of its inhabitants, the legislature, upon dividing the territory, may provide that the original town shall continue to hold the fishery in trust for the inhabitants of both towns. North Yarmouth v. Skillings, 45 Me. 133, 71 Am. Dec. 530.

A provision in a statute separating certain territory from a town and creating it into a separate township, that it shall pay its proportion of the debts of the former town and be entitled to its share of the property of said town, does not give it a right to share in the profits of a fishery in the former town. This is upon the ground that the right of fishery is not property. Randolph v. Braintree, 4 Mass. 315.

The exercise, by a municipal corporation, for sixty years, of the right of exclusively controlling and regulating fisheries in tidal waters in front of said municipality, establishes a presumption in favor of a grant thereof. Mannall v. Fisher, 5 Jur. N. S. 389, 5 C. B. N. S. 856.

A town owning land covered by tide water may regulate the fisheries therein, although the state has also made regulations applicable to the place. Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 493.

Because public fisheries are regulated by statute, this will not prevent the adoption of additional regulations by a town authorized thereto, under its general powers. Ibid.

A law authorizing a municipal corporation to direct the use and management, and the times and manner of using, its common lands and meadows and the other commons will support an ordinance restricting the fishery to the inhabitants of the town, and then only during a certain open season. Ibid.

A statute giving a town the right to regulate the times and manner of taking fish within its limits, and to sell the right of taking them, applies only to shore used for that purpose, and not to the tidal water adjacent to the shore, although it may be within the limits of the town. Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140.

A municipal corporation can only assume to regulate a fishery in tidal waters when it can show a right of property to the lands below low-water mark, and such a title can only be supported by grant or long possession to support a presumption of grant; but the fact that such waters are included within its bounds for the purpose of jurisdiction will afford no such presumption. Palmer v. Hicks, 6 Johns. 133.

The exclusive right of fishing within its boundaries was granted to the inhabitants of the city of St. John by its charter. Wilson v. Codyre, 27 N. B. 820.

Under the Connecticut statute, towns having clams and oysters within their respective limits, or in the waters and flats to them adjoining and belonging, have powers to make by-laws to regulate the fishing of said clams and oysters, and to preserve the same. Hayden v. Noyes, 5 Conn. 391.

But the power of a town to regulate fisheries within its limits does not authorize it to prohibit all persons, except its inhabitants, from taking shell fish in a navigable river. Ibid.

A town having title to the land under a tidal bay may lease the land for the purpose of cultivation of oysters, and the fact that natural oysters are growing there is immaterial. Hand v. Newton, 92 N. Y. 88.

A vote of a township authorizing the staking out of oyster grounds in a designated river includes a cove that is mainly formed by the tide waters of the river. Gallup v. Tracy, 25 Conn. 10.

Under the New York act of 1871 the board of audit of the respective towns upon Hempstead and Jamaica bays are vested with the power to award licenses for oyster grants in such bays, and the exercise of their discretion will not be interfered with by the courts. Abraham v. Hempstead, 45 Hun. 272.

A town in its corporate capacity has no authority to transfer the right of taking oysters within its limits. Pill v. Wareham, 7 Met. 438.

A grant by the sovereign to the inhabitants of a town of a tract of land including the waters of a tidal bay, "together with all rivers, waters, beaches, creeks, harbors, fishing, and all other franchises to said tract appertaining," will give such inhabitants the exclusive right to the oyster fisheries within the limits of the grant. Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56.

A by-law of a borough prohibiting the taking of oysters from waters within the borough during a certain period of the year is abrogated by a general statute prohibiting the same acts during a period covered by that designated in the by-law, whether passed before or after the making of the by-law. Southport v. Ogden, 23 Conn. 123.

A state may grant to a town bordering on tide water the power to grant exclusive privileges to individuals to plant and remove oysters from the waters. People v. Thompson, 30 Hun. 457.

The inhabitants of Oyster bay have, under the decisions and statutes of the state of New York, an exclusive right to take oysters in that bay; and the town may enact or enforce ordinances or by-laws for the protection of that right. The Martha Anne, Olcott, 18, Fed. Cas. No. 9,146.

Of opposite proprietors.

In a nontidal river flowing between two manors one moiety of the river and fishery belongeth to one lord, and the other moiety to the other. Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149.

A riparian proprietor ad medium flum of a private stream has a several fishery in the waters over his own land, and not a common fishery in the stream. Snape v. Dobbs, 1 Bing. 202, 8 J. B. Moore, 23.

The common-law presumption is that, where land is possessed by different parties on either side of a river, the right of fishing in the river belongs to each ad medium flum aquæ, and, if the lord of the manor has that right, it must be shown. Lamb v. Newbiggin, 1 Car. & K. 549.

The opposite proprietors on the banks of a river have a right of salmon fishery in it; the fishery right of each extends to the middle of the stream. Zetland v. Glover Incorporation of Perth, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 70.

The possessor of a prima facie right to fish for salmon on one side of a river has the right of challenging a claim to fish from the opposite side of the river. Stuart v. McBarnet, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 387.

Where a sand bank has formed in a tidal river, in which the opposite proprietors have a salmon fishery extending to the center of the river, and such sand bank divides the river at low water into two equal streams, a line drawn down the middle of the river at low water, taking the two channels together, is to be regarded as the limit or dividing line between the respective fisheries. Wadderburn v. Paterson, 2 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 902.

The right of fishery possessed by opposite owners on a fresh-water stream, being in the nature of a tenancy in common, the act of either in spreading his nets across the river and using the whole fishery, coupled with non-user of the opposite tenant, is not sufficient to raise a presumption of a grant from the non-using tenant to the other, as such acts are consistent with the nature of the tenancy in the absence of an actual ouster. Bauman v. Kin- sella, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 299, Affirmed in 11 Ir. C. L. Rep. 249, as far as this point was involved; but the judgment was reversed on the ground that the court, in setting aside the verdict found for the plaintiff at the trial, and directing a verdict to be entered for the defendant, erred in so directing the verdict, and should have granted a new trial, which was accordingly done.

When, in disposing of its eminent domain, the state grants a private fishery as appurtenant to property on one side of a stream, those who subsequently accept deeds of land on the other side can claim no interest therein. Nickerson v. Brackett, 10 Mass. 212.

Contract rights.

An heir who contracts with a widow for her dower right in a fishery which has been set off without specifying the days upon which she can fish is estopped to deny her right to the fishery to avoid compliance with his contract. Russell v. Russell, 15 Gray, 159.

A riparian owner who has granted a license to a third person to fish in the water in front of his property is not thereby precluded from acting upon the license of the state to erect a wharf. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 29, 100 Am. Dec. 597.

If a town sells a right of fishing to one upon condition that it will sell no other rights, the buyer cannot be compelled to pay the consideration if a sale is afterwards made to a third person. Taunton v. Caswell, 4 Pick. 275.

A condition that the vendors of a fishing plant will not become interested in a similar business "upon, along, or off the Atlantic seaboard" refers to all the waters adjacent to the eastern coast of the United States, including all the indentations along the coast. American Fisheries Co. v. Lennen, 118 Fed. 869.

A lessee of oyster ground from a town cannot, in the absence of statute authorizing it, recover against the town damages sustained by his alleged eviction due to the construction of a bridge across the leased land with the consent of the town, which assumed the management and control of the structure, since the erection of the bridge is an act of sovereign power. Hall v. Oyster Bay, 61 App. Div. 508, 70 N. Y. Supp. 710.

Of cotenants.

If a grant of land is made to certain persons as trustees for settlers on it who have a right to take fish in the adjoining waters, the fishery is common to all the settlers, and cannot be exclusively claimed by the trustees; and regulations may be made for the taking of fish which will exclude the trustees, although they have the title to the land bordering on the fishing place. Nickerson v. Brackett, 10 Mass. 212.

One tenant in common in a fishery can maintain an action on the case in the nature of waste against the other only where a permanent injury has been done to the fishery; and hence, he cannot maintain such action against the other for digging a deposit of marl out of a small strip of land on the river bank attached to the fishery, but which did not injure it, his proper remedy being to compel such cotenant to account. Smith v. Sharpe, 44 N. C. (Busbee L.) 91.

One of two tenants in common of oyster beds cannot deprive his cotenant of the right to take any of the natural oysters by scattering seed oysters over the premises in such a manner as to make it impossible to remove the natural ones without disturbing those planted. Mott v. Underwood, 143 N. Y. 463, 32 L. R. A. 270, 69 L. R. A.

42 N. E. 1048, Affirming 78 Hun, 509, 26 N. Y. Supp. 307.

Conflict with navigation.

The right of navigation, though superior, does not take away the right of fishery in tidal waters. It only limits it so far as it interferes with its own fair, useful, and legitimate exercise. Post v. Munn, 4 N. J. L. 61, 7 Am. Dec. 570.

IX. Shell fisheries.

a. Public rights.

For the most part, the shell fisheries exist on land the title to which is in the public, and the public has, therefore, a prima facie right to enjoy them. This right is subject to regulation by the public itself, or to grants from the public which have placed the title to the beds in private ownership. Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day, 22; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 10 L. ed. 997; Parker v. Cutler Milldam Co. 20 Me. 353, 37 Am. Dec. 56; Bagott v. Orr, 2 Bos. & P. 472; Paul v. Hazleton, 37 N. J. L. 106; Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57; Weston v. Sampson, 8 Cush. 347, 54 Am. Dec. 764; Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216.

The title to the oyster beds and oysters in the tide waters of a state is absolutely in the people, and is a property right as complete and perfect as that held to any other property, which the state alone can regulate and dispose of. State v. Harrub, 95 Ala. 176, 15 L. R. A. 761, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 99, 10 So. 752.

The public right of fishery includes the right to take shell fish below high-water mark from natural beds in the tide waters of the state. Brown v. De Groff, 50 N. J. L. 409, 14 Atl. 219.

The public right of fishery for shell fish may be exercised at will, except so far as it is restrained by positive law, or by grants from the state to individuals. Ibid.

Any inhabitant may take shell fish anywhere in the waters of the state and on the shores below high-water mark as it exists from time to time, in the absence of any express restriction on such right. Allen v. Allen, 19 R. I. 114, 30 L. R. A. 497, 32 Atl. 166.

Oysters are a species of fish, and a right to take them in the sea and its arms is included in the right of "fishing therein." Caswell v. Johnson, 58 Me. 164.

The public right of fishing throughout Massachusetts, as in other parts of the United States and in Great Britain, includes fishing for shell fish as well as floating or swimming fish. Com. v. Bailey, 13 Allen, 542.

The right of taking clams from the flats under tide waters is a public right, and is not impaired by a grant of the flats to a town, or from the town to individuals. Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216.

Where the title to the bed of navigable streams is absolutely in the state, the fishing for oysters in such navigable waters is a right common to all citizens of the state, which may be exercised by them at will, except so far as it is restrained by positive law. Paul v. Hazleton, 37 N. J. L. 106.

The prima facie right of the public to take shell fish between high and low tide remains during reflux of the tide. Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day, 28.

The general right of fishery in public waters includes all fishing, even the digging of clams from the flats. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

When the legislature provides for a private ownership in oyster beds, there ceases to be any public or common right to take oysters from such beds. Com. v. Manimon, 136 Mass. 456.

And one has no private right to dig quahaugs where his enjoyment is as one of the public in pursuance of a common right. Ibid.

The rights of the public to natural oyster beds in tidal waters cannot be destroyed under guise of regulating and encouraging fisheries, without right of hearing and appeal. Averill v. Hull, 37 Conn. 320.

But the right of the public to take shell fish from the shore does not include the right to take the soil or dead shell fish imbedded therein. Porter v. Shehan, 7 Gray, 435.

Protection and regulation.

A state may pass and enforce regulations for the preservation of oysters, although it may have no absolute right of property therein. Kean v. Rice, 12 Serg. & R. 203.

The legislature has the undoubted right to regulate oyster fisheries upon tidal waters, whether the oysters grow there naturally or are planted upon the land belonging to the state lying under the water. Smith v. Levinus, 8 N. Y. 472.

The act entitled "An Act for the Preservation of Oysters and Other Shell Fish," which provides that no oysters shall be taken from the common fisheries between specified dates, and no person shall take from a public oyster bed more than 8 bushels in twenty-four hours, nor shall plant on a private bed oysters taken from a public bed, and prohibits the use of dredges in taking oysters; and which also provides for the appointment of commissioners for the leasing of land covered by public waters for private oyster beds,—is not repugnant to a Constitutional provision that "the people shall continue to enjoy and freely exercise all the rights of fishery and the privileges of the shore to which they have been heretofore entitled under the charter and the usages of this state." The object of this law is not to benefit the lessees of oyster beds, but, by holding out motives to them and encouraging them in the cultivation of oysters, to secure to the public a more abundant supply. State v. Cozzens, 2 R. I. 561.

A statute prohibiting persons from wilfully taking, destroying, or spoiling a spawn, fry, or brood of sea fish in any weir or other engine or device, whatsoever, seems not to comprehend shell fish; and, if it does, it means a taking for destruction, and not a taking of oyster spawn for the purpose of removing it to beds, for further growth and maturity to make it marketable. Bridger v. Richardson, 2 Maule & S. 568.

The legislature has power to prescribe regulations for the taking of clams from their beds, with a penalty for their violation, notwithstanding the colony ordinance provided free fishing for all the inhabitants of the commonwealth. Com. v. Bailey, 13 Allen, 541.

The state may impose such limitations and restrictions upon the mode and manner of taking fish, oysters, etc., in the navigable waters of the state as it may deem wise and just and conducive to the public good. State v. Conner, 107 N. C. 931, 11 S. E. 992.

In State v. Insley, 64 Md. 28, 20 Atl. 1031, the court, in refusing to pass on the constitutionality of a statute for the protection of oysters, said: We have no doubt whatever of the right and power of a state to pass a law that, if properly executed, would perfectly protect our oyster interest. In framing such a law, however, care should be taken that no part of it interfere with the paramount right of navigation and interstate commerce, as control over those subjects has been delegated to the general government.

Where a statute authorizing a town to designate places within its limits for oyster planting refers to a line between the navigable waters of two towns as a line running southerly, it is to be taken as meaning due south, in the absence of word or monument defecting the line either east or west. Rowe v. Smith, 48 Conn. 444.

Where a statute gave exclusive control of all shell fisheries lying south of high-water mark in Long Island sound to the state commissioners of shell fisheries, another section of the same statute providing for the appointment of a committee to designate natural oyster beds in a town did not empower the committee to designate beds in waters lying south of high-water mark. Re Darien Oyster Ground Committee, 52 Conn. 61.

A vessel cannot be seized and condemned for being used to interfere with oysters or shell fish belonging to another person, without giving the owner a jury trial, under the New York Constitution. Colon v. Lisk, 153 N. Y. 188, 47 N. E. 302, Affirming 13 App. Div. 195, 48 N. Y. Supp. 364.

The forfeiture and sale upon nonpayment of the fine imposed, of a vessel taken while dredging without a license for oysters in violation of the Maryland act of 1880, chap. 198, does not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law contrary to the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution because no notice was given to him, where the act confers a right of appeal from the decree of forfeiture, and since seizure is constructive notice to everyone having any interest in the thing seized. The Ann, 8 Fed. 923.

A statute protecting the rights of persons who have planted oysters upon state land between certain specified dates is not a general law. State v. Post, 55 N. J. L. 264, 26 Atl. 683.

Oysters taken by one in the exercise of his common right of free fishery thereby become the property of the taker; and the legislature uses a reasonable discretion when it grants a license to use portions of the state lands covered by navigable waters as places of deposit, where the title and possession of the property thus acquired may be continued and protected, the public right of fishery suffering no derogation thereby. Phipps v. State, 22 Md. 380, 85 Am. Dec. 654.

Licenses.

It has been held that the right to take oysters in the public waters of a state is a privilege which a state cannot bestow as it pleases, but is a right belonging to all citizens. Gustafson v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 67, 43 L. R. A. 615, 45 S. W. 717, 48 S. W. 518.

But the custom is quite general for the various state legislatures, for the protection and cultivation of oysters, to grant licenses of limited tracts of tide land to persons who will engage in the business of oyster culture.

But a statute authorizing the granting of a license for taking oysters in public waters is altogether invalid when it limits the privilege to taxpayers, and cannot be enforced to the extent of requiring a license from those within its benefits and privileges. Ibid.

A statute authorizing the location and appropriation within the waters of the state of limited areas for the purpose of depositing and bedding oysters is a mere license to use the state lands covered by navigable waters as places of deposit for the protection of private property in oysters taken in the exercise of the common right of free fishery; and, although several and exclusive privileges are thereby contemplated, it is not unconstitutional as conferring such privileges in derogation of the common right of free fishery. Phipps v. State, 22 Md. 380, 85 Am. Dec. 634. (It is suggested in the opinion that, at most, the argument that the common right to fish for and take them is impaired by the artificial deposits here authorized would hold good only on proof that a natural bed or deposit is appropriated to artificial uses.)

A licensee of the statutory right to plant, grow, and dig oysters is entitled to the exclusive use of the flats described in his lease to the exclusion of any use of the land by another for the purpose of digging quahaugs, thereby necessarily disturbing the oysters. Griffith v. Savary, 181 Mass. 227, 68 N. E. 426.

The express limitation of areas of 5 acres for the planting of oysters, contained in the Maryland statutes, was intended to limit individual holdings, and cannot be indirectly evaded by procuring others to locate them in their own names and then transfer them so as to aggregate in the same person more lots than any one person is in terms allowed to hold. Hess v. Muir, 65 Md. 586, 5 Atl. 540, 6 Atl. 673.

No irrevocable contract can be construed from a grant of an exclusive right of a location for an oyster bed so long as grantee shall pay a certain amount annually, but subject to a right of revocation by the general assembly. Woonum v. Mills, 17 Va. L. J. 195.

An implied license from the state to use land under water for oyster cultivation is subject to repeal, and is revoked by notice served upon the licensee by one to whom the state has ceded all its rights. Lowndes v. Huntington, 153 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 615, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 758.

One having the exclusive right to the oyster grounds opposite his property cannot insist that a statute providing for the licensing of such rights is unconstitutional, after he has taken advantage of it. Purcell v. Conrad, 84 Va. 557, 5 S. E. 545.

Where one relies upon an implied license to plant and cultivate oyster beds to the exclusion of the owner, he must show his continued occupation of such lands, and cannot abandon them and afterwards exclude the owner simply because at one time he may have had a right thereto. Riddell v. Brown, 25 Wash. 514, 65 Pac. 758.

The right of planting oysters on state land for the exclusive use of the one planting them is an exclusive privilege within the meaning of a constitutional provision forbidding the granting of such privileges by private or special laws. State v. Post, 55 N. J. L. 264, 26 Atl. 683.

One who knowingly takes oysters from a tract which has been leased from the state is guilty of a misdemeanor, even though the statute declares that all natural oyster beds shall remain open to the public, and the tract was a natural oyster bed in fact, where the statute also declares that the designations on a certain map as to which tracts are natural oyster beds and which are not shall be conclusive evidence. Fraser v. State, 112 Ga. 13, 37 S. E. 114.

One who stakes out land under the public waters of the state for the purpose of raising oysters thereon does not acquire, by virtue of N. Y. Laws 1866, chap. 404, any interest in the land independent of its occupation for the purpose of oyster planting, and by parting with his ownership of the oysters he surrenders all right to the possession of the land. Housman v. Welr, 15 Abb. N. C. 415.

The restricted privilege of locating oyster lots, given by the Maryland statute, has no 60 L. R. A.

element of a grant by patent, but is simply a license, revocable at the pleasure of the legislature, and not inheritable; nor is it assignable, since no power of assignment is given by statute, and, if permitted, it would defeat the purpose of the act to restrict individual holdings, and would increase the facilities of nonresidents to get possession of oyster lots in contravention of the statute. Hess v. Muir, 65 Md. 586, 5 Atl. 540, 6 Atl. 673.

In the statute of Texas, passed for the preservation of oysters and oyster beds, and for protecting the rights of persons to the same, the words, "stream made navigable by the laws of the state or of the United States," do not refer to legislative enactments with reference to particular waters, but to the body of the law as declared both by statute and the decisions of the courts. Jones v. Johnson, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 262, 25 S. W. 650.

A statute providing for the ascertaining and location of natural oyster beds by a committee did not authorize the committee to include beds which had previously been designated to individuals pursuant to the provisions of prior statutes. Re Clinton Oyster Ground Committee, 52 Conn. 5.

The act for the preservation of oysters and other shell fish, requiring that one part of the lease executed by the lessee and the commissioners shall be transmitted forthwith to the general treasurer, is directory to the commissioners, and a compliance therewith need not be proved by the state in an indictment for stealing oysters from a private bed granted by such lease. State v. Sutton, 2 R. I. 434.

Under a statute authorizing the staking out of oyster grounds with the consent of a committee appointed for that purpose, the consent of a majority of the committee is sufficient; and where the licensee is a member of the committee, the consent of a majority of the remaining members is sufficient. Gallup v. Tracy, 25 Conn. 10.

It is not necessary that the committee be actually assembled when it grants the license, but a majority of the committee may act at any time. Ibid.

The assignment of a lease of a private oyster fishery in the public waters of the state, given by the commissioners under the "Act for the Preservation of Oysters and Other Shell Fish within This State," if made with the assent of the commissioners, will pass to the assignee the legal title of such fishery. State v. Sutton, 2 R. I. 434.

Under a statute giving a committee power to designate places for planting oysters within the navigable waters of a town, the committee's jurisdiction is not limited to the territorial proprietorship of the town, which extends only to high-water mark, except in case of bays and harbors, but extends to the state boundary by meridional lines from the termini of the lines separating the territorial lines of the towns. Rowe v. Smith, 48 Conn. 444.

Where a committee designated ground for oyster cultivation in waters which were not included in a statute authorizing the committee to designate oyster grounds in a specified portion of the navigable waters of the town, such designation was validated by a subsequent statute confirming and validating all designations made in the navigable waters of any town by its committee. State v. Bassett, 64 Conn. 217, 29 Atl. 471.

A statute regulating the proceedings for the leasing of territory upon which to plant and cultivate oysters does not confer upon any private citizen the right to object to the granting of a lease on the ground that the applicant has not taken the proper preliminary steps for obtaining the same; neither does it confer upon the board of commissioners who are given the power to lease such territory any jurisdiction over questions involving title thereto. Parsons v. Frey, 115 Ga. 955, 42 S. E. 234.

The purpose of a statute which provides that the oysters planted or growing on any private oyster ground under lease shall, during the continuance of the lease, be the private personal property of the lessee, is to make it clear that the oysters are personal property, and to throw over them the protection which is appropriate to such property. It was not intended to restrict the right of disposing of them by contract or otherwise. At most it merely confines the legal title in the oysters to the lessee while they are in his grounds. It does not prevent his disposing of rights which can be protected in equity. New England Oyster Co. v. McGarvey, 12 R. I. 385.

A constitutional provision that "the people shall continue to enjoy and exercise freely all the rights of fishery and the privilege of the shore to which they have been heretofore entitled under the charter and usages of the state," does not confine the fisheries so exclusively to the people of the state that lessees of private oyster beds are prohibited from giving persons other than citizens of Rhode Island an interest in the oysters taken in return for investment of capital. Ibid.

A person who holds a valid lease from the state to lands on which he has planted oyster beds may enjoin others from trespassing thereon and taking oysters therefrom. Jones v. Oemler, 110 Ga. 202, 35 S. E. 375.

One who has planted oysters in tide water under a license issued under provisions of the statute has no right to remove them after he has neglected to obtain a renewal, and a license for the particular bed in which they lie has been issued to another. Keene v. Gifford, 158 Mass. 120, 82 N. E. 946.

Natural beds.

The statutes providing for leases usually except natural beds, leaving them for the benefit of the general public, and confining private enterprise to localities where oysters do not naturally exist.

A natural, as distinguished from an artificial, oyster bed, is one not planted by man, and is any shoal, reef, or bottom where oysters are to be found growing, not sparsely or at intervals, but in a mass, or stratum, and in sufficient quantities to be valuable to the public. State v. Willis, 104 N. C. 769, 10 S. E. 764.

One planting oysters in navigable waters where common beds of oysters exist has no cause of action against another for taking oysters from the beds. Shepard v. Leverson, 2 N. J. L. 391.

Those parts of bottoms that have always been regarded and recognized as natural rock, and have been used by the people as such, will continue to be so regarded until they shall become worthless to the public, or shall be declared by the legislature as open for planting. Woonum v. Mills, 17 Va. L. J. 195.

The designation by an authorized committee of a place for planting oysters is invalid where such committee, in violation of the statute, designate a natural oyster bed; and persons, gathering oysters therein will not be subjected to the forfeitures imposed by the statute upon persons taking oysters from a place designated by the committee. Averill v. Hull, 37 Conn. 320.

By the statute for the preservation of clams and oysters, the owners of flats and coves only within low-water mark may stake out beds and 60 L. R. A.

plant shell fish provided natural beds are not inclosed nor navigation interfered with; hence, an oyster planter on staked-out flats beyond low-water mark where there are natural beds cannot prevent a stranger from taking oysters therefrom. Townsend v. Brown, 24 N. J. L. 80.

Ground will not be treated as the locus of a shell fishery when the alleged fishery has ceased to exist, or becomes of no value. Clark v. Providence, 16 R. I. 337, 1 L. R. A. 725, 15 Atl. 763.

In a direct attack on the designation of land for oyster culture, it may be shown that the land designated was a natural oyster bed, although it was not mentioned in the statute determining and enumerating the natural oyster beds of the state, such statute having been adopted subsequent to the designation of the land. Cook v. Raymond, 66 Conn. 285, 33 Atl. 1006. The case is distinguishable from State v. Nash, 62 Conn. 47, 25 Atl. 451, as that case was a collateral, and not a direct, attack upon the designation, and for the further reason that the designation was made after the adoption of the statute.

The fact that oysters grow naturally at the mouth of a stream emptying into tide water, and upon the harder portions of the bed of a pond formed at the outlet, and have immemorially existed in great abundance and been openly and constantly taken by the public, furnishes very high, if not conclusive, evidence of the existence of a natural oyster bed, and of a public and common right to the enjoyment of it as such. Gulf Pond Oyster Co. v. Baldwin, 42 Conn. 255.

One digging clams from a natural clam bed in navigable tide waters beyond high-water mark, and acting in good faith, who incidentally disturbs and fatally injures oysters planted there by another who has no state grant to the bed, is not liable to the oyster planter for the damage suffered by him. Brown v. De Groff, 50 N. J. L. 409, 14 Atl. 219.

A statute validating and confirming all previous designations of places for planting oysters made by authority of the town does not validate a previous designation of an unauthorized place, such as a natural oyster bed. Clinton v. Bacon, 58 Conn. 508, 16 Atl. 548.

A statute providing that the designation of oyster grounds shall be valid, although such places may have been natural oyster beds, if in other respects valid, applies to a designation made without authority, where such unauthorized designation was afterwards validated by legislative enactment. State v. Bassett, 64 Conn. 217, 29 Atl. 471.

When lessees of tracts of navigable tide waters duly staked off to them under the terms of a statute plant oysters therein, and there are at the time a few other oysters naturally growing there, a trespasser thereon cannot escape liability upon the principle that by mixing the planted with the natural oysters there was an abandonment of property in them,—at least so as to require proof that those taken were the planted ones, to justify a recovery. Wooley v. Campbell, 37 N. J. L. 163.

Though planting oysters in a public clam fishery constitutes a nuisance, it cannot be abated summarily by one injured thereby, but without special private injuries. Brown v. De Groff, 50 N. J. L. 409, 14 Atl. 219.

Where the natural oyster beds of the state had been determined and enumerated in a statute enacted for that purpose, a person charged with having taken oysters from a bed designated for oyster planting cannot defend on the ground that the bed was a natural oyster bed, and that, therefore, the designation was invalid, unless such place was one of those mentioned in such statute enumerating the natural oyster beds. State v. Naah, 62 Conn. 47, 25 Atl. 451.

b. Private rights.

Of riparian owner.

The right to an oyster fishery depends on the right to the soil upon which the oysters are planted and grown. Den ex dem. Russell v. Jersey Co. 15 How. 432, 14 L. ed. 760.

Where a grant of land adjoining an arm of the sea includes that lying between high and low water mark, the grantee has the exclusive right to take oysters therefrom, and another removing them is liable as a trespasser. McKenzie v. Hulet, 4 N. C. (Term. Rep.) 181.

But ownership of flats by tidal waters does not include a shell fishery thereon which cannot be interfered with, since the fishery yields when the flats are used for a wharf. Lakeman v. Burnham, 7 Gray, 437; Weston v. Sampson, 8 Cush. 347, 54 Am. Dec. 764.

The owner of land adjoining a tidal river may have by prescription, as appurtenant to the land, an exclusive right of dredging for oysters. Hayes v. Bridges, Ridgeway L. & S. 390.

The bedding of oysters is not an "improvement" within the contemplation of the act of 1862 giving riparian owners the exclusive right to make improvements in the water in front of their own land, but the improvements thereby intended are such structural ones, like wharfs, piers, and landings, as are subservient to the land, and while used in connection therewith enhance its value or enlarge its commercial or agricultural facilities or other utility to the extent to which the land alone would not be capable. Hess v. Muir, 65 Md. 586, 5 Atl. 540, 6 Atl. 673.

One who plants oysters in tidal water opposite another's land cannot maintain trespass against the latter for taking them away. Brinckerhoff v. Starkins, 11 Barb. 248.

Entering upon land under claim of right to take clams thereon will establish no right as against the owner of the upland, since it is not an inconsistent user. Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day, 28.

Lands bounded on navigable waters in New Jersey extend to the edge of the water, namely to low-water mark when the tide is at ebb and to high-water mark when it is at flood, and no farther; hence, a riparian owner, staking out in front of his land a bed in a navigable river beyond low-water mark, and planting oysters therein, cannot recover of a poacher thereon. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. L. 1, 10 Am. Dec. 356.

But later it was held that one who has staked off an area of navigable waters adjoining his uplands for the purpose of planting oysters therein acquires an exclusive right, and may maintain trespass against another who invades the territory thus pre-empted and plants oysters therein in advance of him, which the trespasser afterwards gathers for himself. Paul v. Hazleton, 37 N. J. L. 106.

Under Tex. act March 8, 1879, for the preservation of oysters and oyster beds, and for protecting the rights of persons to the same, etc., the owner of land bordering on any unnavigable creek, lake, bayou, or cove is also the true and legal owner of the oyster beds along the entire front of his land, from low-water mark to the center of such creek, lake, bayou, or cove; or, if the lake, bayou, or cove, upon which his land borders, is public, navigable water, then the owner of the land is the owner of the oyster beds along the entire front of the land, and extending out from low-water mark 60 L. R. A.

into such lake, bayou, or cove, for the distance of 100 yards. Holt v. Follett, 65 Tex. 530.

So long as the owner of the land along a navigable stream is content with what the law gives him by virtue of his riparian ownership, he is protected by the imaginary line running at a distance of 100 yards from low-water mark along the entire front of his shore; and, to constitute one a trespasser in the meaning of the law, who, without the consent of the owner of the land, takes oysters within such space, it is not necessary that the owner shall have first designated it by staking it off. The provision of such act which requires one's location to be designated by stakes planted at its four corners, applies only to those cases where the riparian owner, or other person, wishes to secure a right beyond these limits. Ibid.

Riparian owners into whose land a creek makes, are entitled to the exclusive use of such creek for oyster beds on its becoming less than 100 yards in width at its mouth at low water, as against a locator of oyster beds therein by virtue of the general statutory right of citizens of the state while it exceeded that width, under a provision of the statute giving an exclusive right to riparian owners for oyster-bed purposes in case of a creek making into their land of less than that width or upon its becoming less; since the prior location in such a creek is subject to the contingency that the mouth of the creek might thereafter become less than the specified width. Powell v. Wilson, 65 Md. 347, 37 Atl. 216.

A contract to sell land lying on the side of a river in which are oyster beds must be subject to the law of the state as to the ownership of the beds; and the fact that they are, under the law of the state, leased by the state to third persons, will not absolve the purchaser from complying with his contract. Bigler v. Morgan, 77 N. Y. 312.

In Rogers v. Allen, 1 Campb. 309, in discussing the claim that a fishery must be entire, and that, if the public has a right to fish for all kinds of floating fish the lord of the manor cannot claim the right of an oyster fishery, Heath, J., said: "Part of a fishery may be abandoned, and another part of more value may be preserved. The public may be entitled to catch floating fish in the river; but it by no means follows that they are justified in dredging for oysters, which may still remain private property."

A devise of a privilege of "digging 10 barrels of clams yearly at the southern end of my farm, to a person, his heirs and assigns," creates an assignable estate of inheritance. Lakeman v. Butler, 17 Pick. 436, 28 Am. Dec. 811.

By planting and cultivation.

Oysters are not feræ naturæ, as they do not stray away nor require taming; hence, private ownership in them may be acquired. State v. Taylor, 27 N. J. L. 117, 72 Am. Dec. 347.

An individual may be the owner of oysters in tide waters if they were planted by him or his grantors in a bed clearly marked out and defined, where no oysters were growing spontaneously at the time. People v. Hazen, 121 N. Y. 313, 24 N. E. 484; Lowndes v. Dickerson, 34 Barb. 586.

But a person creating a private oyster bed in tidal waters can have no property therein if located upon land the title to which is in another. Ibid.

One who stakes out and plants an oyster bed in tide water, where no oysters were naturally growing, and takes measures to save and protect the young oysters, has the title to them, and may maintain an action against one who takes them away, and converts them to his own use. McCarty v. Holman, 22 Hun, 53.

In Texas one claiming oysters as his property because planted by him must have complied with all the regulations of the statute of the state regulating the acquisition of private right to oysters in navigable waters. It is not sufficient for him merely to file in the record of deed a notice of his claim to the body of water where the oysters were planted. Jones v. Johnson, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 262, 25 S. W. 650.

Oysters planted where they did not naturally grow, in navigable waters, in a place staked off, so that there is no interference with navigation or common rights of public fishing, remain private property, and do not constitute a special appropriation of the waters; hence they are the subject of larceny, and one indicted for stealing them cannot justify the asportation on the ground that they constituted a public nuisance and encroachment upon the common rights. State v. Taylor, 27 N. J. L. 117, 72 Am. Dec. 347.

The owner of oysters planted in an oyster lot in a creek under a location thereof which is thereafter defeated by the subsequent narrowing of the creek so as to give riparian owners the exclusive right to its use under the terms of the statute is entitled to remove them within a reasonable time. Powell v. Wilson, 85 Md. 347, 37 Atl. 218.

One who sets up claim to an exclusive oyster bed in tidal waters, founded upon staking it off, planting, and sometimes taking oysters there, if otherwise capable of private property, does not prove a possession so complete, so exclusive, or so continued, as to establish a right against those having an equal claim with himself. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. L. 4, 10 Am. Dec. 356.

A riparian owner on both sides of a navigable creek cannot, under the act of March 9, 1855, acquire exclusive rights in the bed thereof by merely staking it off; he must plant, or at least intend forthwith to plant, oysters or clams therein. Birdsall v. Rose, 46 N. J. L. 361.

Under the act for the preservation of oysters and other shell fish in the state, the lessees of oyster fisheries in public waters are obliged to set up stakes, buoys, and marks only in case the commissioners require this to be done. State v. Sutton, 2 R. I. 434.

A person in possession of oyster grounds in public waters under claim of right cannot be ousted therefrom on the suit of one who can show no right acquired under the formalities of the law by virtue of which he could have acquired such right, although the statutory rental to the state had been paid. West v. Adams, 2 Va. Dec. 517, 27 S. E. 496.

Prescriptive rights.

Exclusive right to take oysters from a navigable bay cannot be acquired by prescription, although the state may grant such right. Jones v. Johnson, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 262, 25 S. W. 650.

The state's title to bottoms cannot be disturbed by a use thereof for oyster beds, as time runs not against the state. Hurst v. Dulany, 84 Va. 701, 5 S. E. 802.

No title can be acquired by an individual to natural oyster beds located in the waters on the Gulf of Mexico within the jurisdiction of Louisiana, since their sale is forbidden by La. act 110 of 1892, declaring them the property of the state, and permitting them to be used as a common by its citizens. Louisiana Land & Fisheries Co. v. Gasquet, 45 La. Ann. 759, 13 So. 171.

A prescriptive right to take clams from certain flats cannot be established by evidence that the claimant has been accustomed to do 60 L. R. A.

so for the preceding sixty years at his free will and pleasure; and that privilege may be barred at any time by the state. Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57.

The presumption of a grant from the Crown of a several oyster fishery in a tidal river, arising from user, is not affected by evidence that the inhabitants of a borough had from time immemorial exercised the right of dredging for oysters in the river during lent. Saltsash v. Goodman, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 108.

Where the user of a several oyster fishery in a tidal river is sufficient to raise a presumption of a grant from the Crown, the fact that the inhabitants of a borough from time immemorial had exercised the privilege of dredging for oysters at the same place during lent will not raise a presumption that this period was excepted from the grant. Ibid.

Where a committee authorized to designate for oyster planting places other than natural oyster beds, designated as such place a natural oyster bed, the grantee taking possession thereunder cannot acquire any rights therein by adverse possession, as the title to the natural oyster beds is in the state, against which title by adverse possession cannot be acquired. Clinton v. Bacon, 56 Conn. 508, 16 Atl. 548.

Rights, if any, acquired by a citizen of the state of New York under the common law by long possession and user of an oyster bed in any of the common or public lands of the state are yielded up by removal from the state. Huntington v. Lowndes, 40 Fed. 625.

A custom among oyster men to assert or acknowledge between themselves an exclusive right to the possession of land under public waters staked out for the planting of oysters cannot, in the absence of color of title, give rise to any prescriptive right as against the state, or create or vest any title in, or right of possession to, the land in any person. Housman v. Weir, 15 Abb. N. C. 415.

Interference with.

Oysters planted by an individual in a bed clearly designated and marked out in tidal waters which are free for all inhabitants of the state belong to him, and he may maintain trespass against another for removing them. But, if oysters previously existed there in their natural state, he cannot deprive the public of the right to take them. Decker v. Fisher, 4 Barb. 582.

One depositing oyster shells from which by natural growth oysters develop in the course of about two years, in navigable tide waters beyond high-water mark, where natural beds do not exist, may maintain an action against a stranger who removes and converts the matured oysters. Grace v. Willets, 50 N. J. L. 414, 14 Atl. 559.

Although the act of a person in planting oysters in tide water is criminal under the laws of the state, it does not authorize a third person to confiscate them. Sutter v. Van Derveer, 47 Hun, 366.

When one has planted clams in tidal waters in a designated place where they do not naturally grow, the law does not impute an abandonment thereof; and when they do not interfere with the public right of fishery one who wantonly and deliberately takes them under color of his right to participate in a common fishery in those waters, and knowing of their private ownership, is liable in trespass. Fleet v. Hegeman, 14 Wend. 42.

One who, in digging quahaugs upon a licensed oyster bed without the consent of the licensee, destroys oysters, is liable to indictment under the Massachusetts statutes, although he has no intent to take the oysters. Com. v. Manlmon, 186 Mass. 456.

While one who plants his clams on a bed previously leased to another might have been compelled to remove them, and the lessee might have removed them himself, the fact that they were placed on the locus by one who neither knew of the lease nor was chargeable with any knowledge of it by reason of absence of buoys or stakes does not forfeit his property in the shell fish, nor justify the lessee in appropriating the clams to his own use. Davis v. Davis, 72 App. Div. 593, 76 N. Y. Supp. 539.

Where one statute provided that the taking and carrying away of oysters should be larceny, under all circumstances in which the taking and carrying away of any other personal property would be larceny, and shall be punished accordingly; and an amendment provided that "every person who shall wrongfully take and carry away oysters from a private oyster bed shall for the first offense be fined $50, and be imprisoned for thirty days, and for any subsequent offense shall be fined $100, and be imprisoned for six months,—two distinct offenses were created by such statutes, by the former the offense of larceny, and by the latter the offense of wrongfully taking. State v. Tayler, 13 R. I. 541.

Where a person is indicted for stealing oysters from a private oyster bed under the act for the preservation of oysters and other shell fish in the state, it is no defense, where it appears that the oysters were taken from a private bed, that the place from which the oysters were taken had been used as a common and public fishery; and it is no defense that the place where the private bed was located had been a common quahaug fishery, and this fishery was interrupted and destroyed by the planting of the oyster bed. State v. Cozzens, 2 R. I. 561.

A right of action against a trespasser for taking oysters from a planting ground staked out by the plaintiff is not abated by the repeal, pending the action, of the statute in pursuance of which the planting ground was staked out. Gallup v. Tracy, 25 Conn. 10.

Equity will restrain concerted action to appropriate the benefits of oyster fields during the pendency of a suit to determine whether the public have a right of fishery upon oyster grounds alleged to be private property, when it appears that, if private property is destroyed, no adequate remedy can be obtained, owing to the pecuniary irresponsibility of the defendants, or that a multiplicity of suits would have to be brought, owing to the large number of defendants. Britton v. Hill, 27 N. J. Eq. 389.

The joint lessees of adjoining tracts of navigable tide waters, who have by agreement planted them in common with oysters, may properly join in prosecuting for damages a trespasser thereon. Wooley v. Campbell, 37 N. J. L. 163.

The right to proceed criminally against one taking clams from a private clam bed in public waters, under a section of the statute forbidding such act, is not affected by the alternate enactment and repeal of another section authorizing the granting of licenses to make oyster and clam beds in the waters of the state, when the latest repealing act on the subject applies only to oyster beds, so that the maintenance of private clam beds may be regarded as lawful. State v. Goulding, 131 N. C. 715, 42 S. E. 563.

The assignee, from the state, of oyster beds may maintain an action of unlawful entry and detainer against one depriving him thereof. Power v. Taxewell, 25 Gratt. 786.

The lord of the manor cannot maintain an equitable action against the lord of another manor to quiet his right to an oyster fishery until such right shall have been first determined at law, as he is not entitled to an equitable remedy where there is a controversy with but one person, which may be determined in a single action at law. Tenham v. Herbert, 2 Atk. 483.

An action by the owner lies against one who converts to his own use oysters by dredging through the bed lying under navigable tide waters upon grounds so marked that he knows they are held as private property. Metzger v. Post, 44 N. J. L. 74, 43 Am. Rep. 841.

An indictment for wrongfully taking oysters, under R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 71, § 1, is sufficient where it charges the offense in the words of the statute, designating the bed as the bed of the lessee, who is named. It is not necessary to allege the ownership of the oysters, for it matters not whose they were, so long as they were wrongfully taken. Nor is it material that another was proved to have been interested with the lessee, for, as ownership was not alleged, there could be no variance by reason of such proof. State v. Tayler, 13 R. I. 541.

A witness cannot give his opinion as to the damages caused by dredging across a bed planted with young oysters. Newton v. Fordham, 7 Hun, 58.

X. Estimation.

The forfeiture of a several fishery is not shown by evidence that the owners of the fishery had forfeited their liberties and free usages, as these words are not sufficient to include a several fishery. Northumberland v. Houghton, L. R. 5 Exch. 127, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 66, 22 L. T. N. S. 491, 18 Week. Rep. 495.

The fact that the owner of a several fishery and his predecessors in title have for a long period of years permitted the public without molestation to fish there does not raise a presumption that the fishery has been abandoned or dedicated to the public. So held in a case relating to a fishery located in the Thames at a point above the action of the tide. Smith v. Andrews [1891] 2 Ch. 678, 65 L. T. N. S. 175.

A right of fishery, unlike a right of free warren, is divisible, so that, though the right to take floating fish may be abandoned, the right of dredging may still remain private property. Rogers v. Allen, 1 Campb. 309.

The right of fishing in private waters is a right to profit in lands, not a subjection to public servitude, like a right of way; hence, it cannot be acquired, as can the latter, by implied dedication of the owner to public use, but only by grant or prescription. Cobb v. Davenport, 33 N. J. L. 223, 97 Am. Dec. 718.

Dedication of a private fishery to the public depends upon the intention of the owner so to devote it. Lembeck v. Nye, 47 Ohio St. 337, 8 L. R. A. 578, 24 N. E. 686.

Where the owner of a fishery does not himself work it for profit, but suffers the public to fish in it without objection, a user by an individual which is not distinguished from that of the public will be considered permissive, unless there is evidence that it was under a claim of right in himself, and that the owner, knowing of such right, acquiesced in it. Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369.

The grant by the ecclesiastical commission of lands adjoining a river in which a right of fishery had previously been granted by its predecessor, without any reservation of such right, does not, therefore, extinguish it. Hamilton v. Musgrove, Ir. Rep. 6 C. L. 129, 19 Week. Rep. 443.

XI. Protection of.

Trespass.

Trespass will lie for a direct interruption of an exclusive fishery. Hart v. Hill, 1 Whart. 181.

Trespass will lie for disturbing a several fishery in the soil of another, though no fish are taken. Holford v. Bailey, 8 Q. B. 1000, affirmed in 13 Q. B. 426.

A writ of trespass quod cepit piscem is good although the charge is for taking divers fishes from diverse places. 4 Hen. VI., 11, pl. 7.

One having a free fishery may maintain trespass against one fishing there and taking fish. Smith v. Kemp, Carth. 285, Holt, 822, 2 Salk. 687.

Where the owner of the soil covered with water has a right to fish with others, he may have an action of trespass, though Holt, Ch. J., said that it would not lie for one who had but a liberty to fish. Gipps v. Woollicot, Holt, 823, Skinner, 677, Comb. 433, 464.

But in an action for trespass for taking fish from plaintiff's free fishery, judgment was rendered for defendant because the declaration did not allege that the defendant took salmones suos. Gibbs v. Woollicott, 3 Salk. 291, 360.

The owner of a private lake or pond may prevent any other person from taking fish therefrom, and may bring an action of trespass. If, after proper notice, anyone insists on taking such fish, and may make criminal complaint against him under How. Anno. Stat. § 2197k, if he himself has first complied with the statute. Re Water Rights, 5 Det. L. N. No. 14.

The owner of a fishery can maintain trespass against anyone, even the several owner of the underlying soil, for taking his fish. Turner v. Hebron, 61 Conn. 175, 187, 14 L. R. A. 386, 22 Atl. 951.

Trespass may be maintained by one in actual physical or mechanical possession of a fishery. Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641.

The right to fish is what is commonly called a profit à prendre; it is of such a nature that a person who enjoys that right has such possessory rights that he can bring an action for trespass at common law for the infringement of those rights, as, e. g., the pollution of the stream. Fitzgerald v. Firbank [1897] 2 Ch. 96, 76 L. T. N. S. 584, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 529.

The owner of a several fishery has such a property in the fish therein that he may maintain an action of trespass against one taking them, alleging in his declaration that it is for taking pieces suas. Child v. Greenhill, Cro. Car. 553.

Trespass quare clausum lies against one who breaks down weirs on his own land, causing the water to overflow another's fishery on adjoining land; and the fact that the fish thereby escape is but an aggravation of damages, and does not change the nature of the action. Courtney v. Collet, 1 Ld. Raym. 272, 12 Mod. 164.

The possessory title of one occupying land containing a trout stream under an unrecorded, but valid, lease is sufficient to enable him to maintain trespass against one fishing in the stream under no better title. Beach v. Morgan, 87 N. H. 529, 41 Atl. 349.

An action of trespass can be maintained by the owner of lands upon which a lake is exclusively situated against persons entering upon such lake and taking fish therefrom without the consent and against the will of such owner. Beckman v. Kremer, 43 Ill. 447, 92 Am. Dec. 146.

The lessee of lands occupied by him for fishing purposes may maintain trespass against one who unlawfully enters and fishes upon them. 60 L. R. A.

Solomon v. Grosbeck, 65 Mich. 540, 36 N. W. 163.

In trespass for fishing in plaintiff's several fishery it is no defense that defendant caught no fish, for the act of fishing was not an infringement of plaintiff's right, but would afterwards be evidence of a using and exercising of the right by the defendant if such an act were overlooked. Patrick v. Greenway, cited in Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Wms. Saund. 346b.

But case, and not trespass vi et armis, is the remedy to be pursued by the owner of a sole and separate fishery against a lower owner of a similar fishery who, by the construction of fish traps and weirs, prevents the passage of fish up the stream to plaintiff's fishery. Hamilton v. Donegall, 3 Ridgeway, 267, 324.

So, a grantee of a right of fishery on grantor's flats can maintain case, and not trespass quare clausum, for an injury to his easement. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

Ejectment will not lie to recover a fishery. Waddy v. Newton, 8 Mod. 275; Herbert v. Laughluy, Cro. Car. 492.

Extraordinary remedies.

The owners of an exclusive fishery in a non-tidal lake will be protected in their property by extraordinary remedy. Pery v. Thornton, Ir. L. R. 23 Eq. 402.

Where one claims a sole fishery in a navigable river by grant from the King, quo warranto will issue to try the title of the grantee. Warren v. Matthews, 1 Salk. 357.

Equity may restrain interference with a several fishery where no adequate remedy exists by tort or statutory process or seizure of boats, seines, etc. Wilson v. Hill, 46 N. J. Eq. 367, 19 Atl. 1097.

Equity will restrain trespass on a private fishery in tidal waters when, by reason of the trespasser's impecuniosity, the remedy at law is inadequate. Ibid.

One claiming an exclusive right of fishing in an arm of the sea may have relief by injunction, as his common-law remedy of proceeding separately against each trespasser is insufficient. Allen v. Donnelly, 5 Ir. Ch. Rep. 229.

Making the unlawful destruction of fish a misdemeanor and punishable as such does not preclude a civil proceeding to enjoin it as a nuisance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 39 L. R. A. 581, 48 Pac. 374.

A man in actual possession of a sole right of fishery may maintain a bill against one threatening to disturb him in his right, for a commission to examine his witnesses and perpetuate their testimony, without first bringing an action at law; though it would be otherwise had he been actually disturbed in his fishing, thereby giving him a remedy at law. Dorset v. Girdler, Prec. in Ch. 531.

The grantee of an exclusive right of fishing in a nonnavigable river may maintain an action for injunction and damages against a person who, by discharging water polluted with sand and gravel into the river, has driven away the fish and injured the spawning beds. Fitzgerald v. Firbank, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 529 [1897] 2 Ch. 96, 76 L. T. N. S. 584.

When a claim to an exclusive fishery, set up against the common right of the public, has been established in point of fact, interference therewith will be restrained by injunction. Allen v. Donnelly, 5 Ir. Ch. 229.

An injunction will be granted to restrain apprehended injury to fish ponds. Bathurst v. Burden, 2 Bro. Ch. 64.

The owner of premises used for fish culture, whose pond is supplied by water from an underground channel of a stream, and not merely by percolation, is entitled to an injunction requiring the erection of a barrier or dam on the premises of an adjoining owner, so as to restore to a spring on his premises the water diverted from the pond supplied thereby and from a natural water course which is the outlet thereof, by the digging of a well on such other premises. Castalia Trout Club Co. v. Castalia Sporting Club, 8 Ohio C. C. 194.

One who has been in possession of a sole fishery for a considerable length of time may bring a bill to be quieted in possession, although he has not established his right at law; and it is no objection to such relief that the different defendants have separate defenses, as the question whether the plaintiff has a right to the sole fishery extends to all the defendants. York v. Pilkington, 1 Atk. 282.

One not occupying, or intending to occupy, his alleged private fishery cannot be so injured in respect thereto as to give him any claim to protection by an injunction against an interference with any technical right he may have. Stannard v. Hubbard, 34 Conn. 375.

Equity will not restrain the removal of stakes from a fishing ground when they will not be needed for immediate use, can be easily replaced in ample time for use, and at a price easily ascertained and measurable in damages. Hettrick v. Page, 82 N. C. 65.

Injunction will not lie to restrain interference with a public fishery, upon the suit of one who shows no special injuries arising from the violation of private right. Delaware & M. R. Co. v. Stump, 8 Gill & J. 479, 29 Am. Dec. 561; Reyburn v. Sawyer, 128 N. C. 8, 37 S. E. 954.

But equity will restrain the maintenance of a fishing trap in violation of law upon the suit of one who suffers special damage thereby. Cherry Point Fish Co. v. Nelson, 25 Wash. 558, 66 Pac. 55.

An injunction restraining the drawing of nets in a public fishery adjoining private lands in violation of statutory rights cannot be broader than is justified by the statute. Heckman v. Swett, 107 Cal. 276, 40 Pac. 420.

Penalties.

A penal statute forbidding any person to enter upon the land of another without the permission of the owner, for the purpose of fishing, applies to every such act; and failure to take care that the statutory direction is observed supplies the criminal intent. State v. Turner, 60 Conn. 222, 22 Atl. 542.

Under the English act of 1878, forbidding the fishing for trout with rod and line without a license, a person licensed to fish with rod and line will be subject to the penalty if he attempts to use three rods and lines at the same time while having only one license. Combridge v. Harrison, 64 L. J. M. C. N. S. 175, 15 Reports, 327, 72 L. T. N. S. 592, 59 J. P. 198.

In a criminal prosecution against one in charge of a vessel for taking fish in violation of a statute, a decree forfeiting the vessel violates the owner's constitutional right to a trial by jury, where he is not a party to the proceeding, which was criminal in its nature, and not in rem. The J. W. French, 13 Fed. 916.

A statutory provision that any person taking fish in violation of its terms shall forfeit his vessel does not authorize the forfeiture and sale of the vessel of another of which the offender had possession at the time. Ibid.

An information, to be sufficient to charge the offense defined by an act entitled, "An Act to Prevent Fishing and Hunting on the Inclosed Lands of Another," must expressly allege, not only want of consent of the owner to the entry upon the land, but also the want of the like consent of the "proprietor and the agent in charge," owner, proprietor, and agent being all named in the statute. Holtgraft v. State, 23 Tex. App. 104, 5 S. W. 117.

One who owns the land on but two sides of a pond of water, the other sides of which are owned by other persons whose title extends to low-water mark, is not entitled to maintain a proceeding under N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 623, to recover the prescribed penalties for taking fish from a pond laid out as a private park for propagating and protecting fish, since he has no such exclusive ownership or control over the waters or the land underneath as is required by the act. Hill v. Bishop, 48 N. Y. S. R. 736, 17 N. Y. Supp. 297.

One who paddles a boat in which another is illegally fishing may be convicted for participating in the offense. Com. v. Richardson, 142 Mass. 71, 7 N. E. 26.

One not the owner or lessee of all the land under or around and adjoining a pond is not entitled to maintain an action to recover the penalty prescribed by Gen. Laws, chap. 179, § 1, for catching fish in the pond of another. Chase v. Baker, 59 N. H. 347.

Under a statute against killing fish in a private river without the consent of the owner, such killing must have occurred in an inclosed ground. Rex v. Sadler, 2 Chitty, 519.

Under a penal statute prohibiting the erection of a fish weir in tide waters below low-water mark in front of the shore or flats of another, without the owner's consent, if "the rights of others" would thereby be interfered with, it was held that the owner has acquired no such fishing right as to be protected by equity, unless he actually uses such privilege. Perry v. Carleton, 91 Me. 349, 40 Atl. 134.

An indictment at common law for a nuisance does not lie for obstructing the passage of fish by a dam built across a river not navigable, but recourse must be had to the remedy provided by statute, where the statute has changed the common law on the subject. Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 190, 16 Am. Dec. 386.

An indictment will lie for fishing in another's pond and carrying away the fish, being the goods and chattels of the prosecutor. Reg. v. Steer, 6 Mod. 183.

That a weir is placed on land from which the tide wholly ebbs does not prevent its being within the terms of a statute forbidding the placing of a weir below low-water mark in front of the shore of a third person without his consent. It is sufficient if the weir is erected beyond or nearer the middle of the channel than the low-water line of the flats intended to be protected. Donnell v. Joy, 85 Me. 118, 26 Atl. 1017.

A statute protecting the fishery of the owner of a "private" stream, spring, or pond relates only to a stream, spring, or pond the waters of which are entirely controlled in every part by the person claiming the fishery. Benscoter v. Long, 157 Pa. 208, 27 Atl. 674.

Abatement.

While the right to abate a public nuisance created by the interruption of the public right of navigation or of fishery belongs to every citizen, such right cannot be exercised lawfully if its exercise involves a breach of the peace; but in such case the one erecting the nuisance must be proceeded against legally. Day v. Day, 4 Md. 262.

A right to remove engines placed in a tidal river for catching salmon is not limited to the conservators or overseers under a statute providing that any engine placed or used in contravention of the statute may be taken possession of or destroyed. Williams v. Blackwall, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 174, 2 Hurlst. & C. 33, 9 Jur. N. S. 579, 8 L. T. N. S. 252, 11 Week. Rep. 621.

One has no right to interfere (trespass) with the weir of another, even though as against the Crown it is a purpresture. Wilson v. Codyre, 27 N. B. 320.

The owner of a several fishery may detain the nets and oars of persons unlawfully fishing as security for his damages; but, if he destroys them, he is liable in trespass. Leynell v. Champennoon, Cro. Car. 228.

Any act which interferes with the enjoyment of the right of fishery in Lake Michigan in any particular locality, if it affects all alike who fish in that locality, is a public, and not a private, nuisance; and no private individual may maintain an action in equity to enjoin its continuance. Kuehn v. Milwaukee, 83 Wis. 583, 18 L. R. A. 553, 53 N. W. 912.

Procedure.

Claimants of rights in a fishing privilege may be joined as defendants in an action to quiet title thereto by the owner of the land to which such right is by statute appurtenant, although claiming and exercising such rights severally and separately, each at a distinct part of the shore, where their claims, though under different patents, were from the same source, and the injury to the plaintiff, as well as their defenses to the action, depend as to each upon the same facts. Heckman v. Swett, 99 Cal. 303, 33 Pac. 1099.

A cause of action for wrongfully entering upon plaintiff's lands under water and taking and carrying away fish therefrom may be united with a cause of action for an entry upon the same land at another time and catching and killing muskrats there. Whattling v. Nash, 41 Hun, 579.

Damages.

Prospective profits of a fishing business are of too speculative a nature to be allowed in an action for damages for negligent injury to nets. Wright v. Mulvaney, 78 Wis. 89, 9 L. R. A. 807, 46 N. W. 1043.

What plaintiff must show.

One claiming an exclusive fishery in tide water must establish his right by satisfactory proof. Gould v. James, 6 Cow. 369; Yard v. Carman, 8 N. J. L. 937; Fitzwalter's Case, 1 Mod. 105.

A several or exclusive fishery in tidal waters must be strictly established by either grant or prescription. Preble v. Brown, 47 Me. 284.

A several fishery in a tidal river is not a common right, and therefore prima facie does not belong to any person until some evidence is given. Paley v. Birch, 8 Best & S. 336, 16 L. T. N. S. 410.

No right to an exclusive fishing privilege in a navigable river is established without proving a compliance with the statutory requirements. Tinicum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 21, 100 Am. Dec. 597; Benscoter v. Long, 157 Pa. 208, 27 Atl. 674; Keynolds v. Com. 93 Pa. 458.

One cannot recover a verdict in an action of trespass for fishing in his fishery unless he shows either possession or right. Richardson v. Orford, 2 H. Bl. 182, 4 T. R. 437, 1 Anstr. 281.

One claiming trespass on a several fishery in brachium maris, pleaded in confession and avoidance, must establish his title. Crichton v. Colliery, 19 Week. Rep. 107.

One claiming a right to abridge the common-law right of any subject to take sea fish must 60 L. R. A.

plead that matter specially; it cannot be presumed. Baggott v. Orr, 2 Bos. & P. 472.

It is not necessary to show that one's own weir is within his defined limits to maintain an action for infringing his exclusive right of fishing on certain flats, although its position might have a material effect upon the amount of damages to be recovered. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

Evidence.

An inhabitant of a particular place cannot be sworn to prove a prescriptive fishery in all the inhabitants. Gould v. James, 6 Cow. 369; Jacobson v. Fountain, 2 Johns. 175.

But, upon the question of the right of the proprietor of a certain neck of land to an exclusive shell fishery upon the shore, a neighboring proprietor similarly situated is a competent witness to establish the right. Gould v. James, 6 Cow. 369.

And an inhabitant of an adjoining town is admissible as a witness on behalf of another inhabitant sued for trespassing on a private shell fishery to prove a free fishery in the locus in quo on behalf of all the inhabitants of the state, even though he is liable to prosecution for a similar trespass in case the right does not exist. Ibid. H. *1. Section 3342, Rev. Stat., requiring railroad companies to construct and keep open ditches of sufficient depth, width, and grade to conduct to some proper outlet the water which accumulates along the sides of such roadbed from the construction or operation of such road, is a valid statute in so far as the accumulation of water is injurious to the contiguous lands or detrimental to the public, but invalid where such water is not injurious to such lands or the public.

2. In so far as §§ 16 and 19 of article 1 of the Constitution conflict with the common law, these sections must prevail over that law; and this is so whether the conflict is as to the right or remedy.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Allen County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in defendants' favor in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an order for the construction of a drainage ditch. Reversed.

Statement by Burket, Ch. J.:

The Chicago & Erie Railroad Company, plaintiff in error and also plaintiff below, filed the following petition in the court of common pleas against Priscilla Keith and Theo. D. Robb, as probate judge of Allen county:

"Now comes the plaintiff, the Chicago & Erie Railroad Company, and says that it is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Indiana, and for cause of action against the defendants, Priscilla Keith and Theo. D. Robb, as judge of the probate court of Allen county, Ohio, avers as follows, viz.: That on May 9, A. D. 1899, there was served by the sheriff of Allen county, Ohio, upon one F. C. McCoy, the agent of plaintiff at the city of Lima, Ohio, a notice, signed by Theo. D. Robb, as probate judge for Allen county, Ohio, and bearing the seal of the probate court of said county, and purporting to be the copy of an order, judgment, or decree entered in case No. 7,442 of said court, entitled 'Priscilla Keith, Plaintiff, v. The Chicago & Erie Railway Co., a Corporation, Defendant,' the said defendant in said cause No. 7,442 of said probate court of Allen county, Ohio, being the plaintiff in this proceeding; and by the terms of said judgment, order, or decree this plaintiff, as said defendant, was directed to construct a drain, or drains and ditches, of sufficient capacity to conduct to some proper outlet the water accumulated along the side of plaintiff's roadbed, by reason of the construction and operation of said roadbed, situate within the limits of section thirty-five (35) of said roadbed, and adjoining lands owned or occupied by Priscilla Keith, said lands being in section twelve (12), township four (4) south, range four (4) east, in Allen county, Ohio; and said notice further declared that unless said defendant (the plaintiff herein) should comply with the requirements thereof within thirty days from said May 9, 1899, then that said Theo. D. Robb, as said probate judge of Allen county, Ohio, would forthwith proceed and advertise for the letting, and proceed and let the contract for draining said accumulated water from the side of said roadbed along the points and places above described to the lowest bidder, in accordance with law. That prior to said May 9, A. D. 1899, this plaintiff, as defendant in said proceedings in case No. 7,442 of the probate court of Allen county, Ohio, had no notice or summons of any kind directed to it, 60 L. R. A.

requiring it to appear before said probate court and have judicially determined whether or not the land described in said proceedings could be properly drained and the costs thereof assessed against plaintiff herein as said defendant, or whether or not the roadbed of the defendant was constructed and maintained at said points and places through swamp lands, so as to exempt plaintiff, under the statute, from the cost and expense of draining said lands; and plaintiff, without fault on its part, was prevented from tendering any issue that might have been tried or determined in said cause. That the time named within the notice served by the sheriff upon the agent of plaintiff on May 9, A. D. 1899, has expired, and the defendant, Theo. D. Robb, as probate judge of Allen county, Ohio, is threatening to proceed and advertise for the letting of a contract for draining the lands above described at the points and places above described; and, unless restrained by an order of this court, said Theo. D. Robb, as said probate judge, will advertise and let said contract, and thereafter will charge the cost and expense of the same against the property of plaintiff, and will thereby deprive plaintiff of its property without due process of law; and for all of which wrongs and injuries plaintiff has not an adequate remedy at law. That said plaintiff in said cause No. 7,442 of the probate court of Allen county, Ohio, is proceeding under the alleged authority of an act of the legislature of Ohio, passed May 7, 1869, entitled 'An Act to Require Railroad Companies to Drain Water from the Sides of Their Roadbeds in Certain Cases,' and which alleged law is now designated as Ohio Rev. Stat. §§ 3342-3346, and is (as plaintiff herein believes) contrary to the provisions of section nineteen (19), art. one (1), of the Constitution of Ohio. That said probate court of Allen county, Ohio (as plaintiff believes), has no authority in law to enter the order and notice served upon plaintiff as herein alleged, or, upon failure of plaintiff to comply with said order, to advertise for the opening of said ditches and drains and let the contract therefor, or to certify the cost and expense thereof and place the same upon the tax duplicate against plaintiff, for that thereby plaintiff is deprived of its property without due process of law and without any judicial determination that the same is for the public welfare. Wherefore, plaintiff prays that a temporary injunction may issue directing said Theo. D. Robb, as said judge of the probate court of Allen county, Ohio, and his successors in office, to refrain from advertising the letting, and to refrain from the letting, of a contract to dig said ditches and drains described in these proceedings, and to refrain from certifying the cost and expense of said proceedings, so that the same may be placed against the property of plaintiff on the tax duplicate of Allen county, Ohio, for collection, until the legality of said acts of said probate court may be inquired into, and until the constitutionality of said act of the legislature of Ohio may be judicially determined; that plaintiff may have any other and further orders necessary to fully protect its rights and give adequate relief in equity; and that upon the final hearing of this cause said injunction may be made perpetual."

To this petition the defendants filed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court of common pleas; and, the plaintiff not desiring to further plead, the court dismissed the petition and rendered final judgment against the plaintiff, to which the plaintiff excepted. The circuit court affirmed the judgment, and thereupon the railroad company filed its petition in error in this court, seeking to reverse the judgments of the courts below.

Messrs. W. O. Johnson and Ridenour & Halfhill, for plaintiff in error:

The statute being void, the ordinary principles of equity would permit the filing of a bill to enjoin a tax or assessment.

Burket, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of the action is to test the constitutionality of the sections of the statute mentioned in the petition. The original statute was passed in the year 1869, and its provisions have been carried into the Revised Statutes. The sections are as follows:

"Sec. 3342. There shall be constructed and kept open, along the roadbed of every railroad, except where the road extends through or by swamp land, by the company or person operating the road, ditches or drains of sufficient depth, width, and grade to conduct to some proper outlet the water which accumulates along the sides of such roadbed from the construction or operation of such road.

"Sec. 3343. If, after ten days' notice or request to any ticket or other agent of the company or person operating a railroad, to provide such drain or ditch, preferred by the person authorized to institute the proceedings hereinafter provided for, the provisions of the foregoing section be not complied with, any owner or tenant of land contiguous to such railroad feeling aggrieved by such neglect may give notice of the fact, in writing, to the probate judge of the county in which such neglect occurs, designating in such notice the place or places on such road where such drains or ditches have not been made; and upon the receipt of such notice the probate judge shall appoint a commission of three disinterested freeholders of such county, who, together with the county surveyor, shall proceed to the place designated in the notice, and if, upon inspection, it is found that the provisions of the preceding section are not complied with, the commission, or a majority thereof, shall report the same to such probate judge, who shall keep a record of such proceedings; and the probate judge shall designate a time within which such ditches or drains shall be made or opened, and shall forthwith notify the company or person operating such road, in writing, whose duty it shall be to make or open such ditches or drains within the time specified.

"Sec. 3344. If such company or person neglect to comply with the notification of the probate judge, he shall forthwith, by advertisement for three consecutive weeks, in one or more of the weekly newspapers published in such county, give notice that the work of making or opening the ditches or drains will be let to the lowest bidder at such time and place as shall be designated in the advertisement.

"Sec. 3345. The probate judge shall, at the time and place specified in the advertisement, sell the job or jobs of making or opening such ditches or drains to the lowest bidder, and take from such bidder a sufficient bond, with surety, for the performance thereof, and upon the completion thereof to the satisfaction of the probate judge, he shall give the bidder a certificate therefor, stating the amount due for the work; and upon presentation of the certificate to the auditor of the county, he shall place the amount so certified forthwith upon the tax duplicate of the county, against the company, together with all the costs and expenses for inspection by the commission and surveyor, notices, advertisements, sale of work, making contract therefor, approval of the work, and other costs, and interest on the amount certified to be due for the work from the time the work is approved until the amount can be collected by the treasurer of the county; and such tax shall be collected as other taxes, and be paid to the persons entitled thereto on the warrant of the county auditor on the county treasurer.

"Sec. 3346. The probate judge, commissioners, and surveyor shall be entitled to receive for their services such costs, fees, and expenses as are provided by law for costs, fees, and expenses of county commissioners and others under proceedings relating to ditches."

That a duty may rest upon a railroad company to remove such water as accumulates along the sides of its roadbed from the construction or operation of its road, to the injury of contiguous lands, or to the detriment of the public health, convenience, and welfare, seems clear, and that such railroad company may be compelled by statute and upon proper proceedings to discharge such duty and remove such water is equally clear; but where such water so accumulates on the right of way and along the sides of such roadbed, and does no injury to contiguous lands, and is not detrimental to the public health, convenience, and welfare, the railroad company cannot be compelled by statute to remove the same, because it has the right to use its right of way, its property, as it pleases, so long as such use does no injury to the public or to private persons. The right to store water on the right of way may in certain cases be a valuable right, and when no injury results from such storage the right cannot be curtailed. Where an accumulation of water along the sides of such roadbed is not detrimental to the public health, convenience, or welfare, but is injurious to contiguous lands, the injury arising from such accumulation is not an injury to the public, to be by it redressed or prevented, but is a private injury to the contiguous lands, to be redressed by the owners by an action for damages, or other proper action, in the court of common pleas; the probate court not having jurisdiction of such actions.

The ditch act of May 1, 1854, was held unconstitutional for the reason that it authorized the entry upon lands of others, and the construction of drains, when demanded by private interest merely, without reference to public interests, convenience, or welfare. Reeves v. Wood County Treasurer, 8 Ohio St. 333, 346. And in McQuillen v. Batton, 42 Ohio St. 202, this court again held that ditches could be constructed only in the interest of the public, and that the fact that larger crops could be raised on lands to be benefited by a ditch was a private, and not a public, interest, and would not warrant the establishment of the proposed ditch. The sections in question do not in the least provide for the protection of the public health, convenience, or welfare, but are solely for the redress of grievances of private persons, the owners of lands contiguous to the railroad; and said sections are so broad that under them railroads might be compelled by the owner or tenant of contiguous lands to drain off all such accumulations of water, even though not injurious to such lands or the public, and accumulated and stored on the right of way for the use of such railroad. The general assembly has not the power to impose or enforce such a duty. By these sections authority is attempted to be given for the lowest bidder to enter upon the right of way of the railroad and construct a ditch for the sole benefit of a private individual, without reference to the interests of the public. The costs of such ditch and all costs of the proceedings are to be assessed against the railroad, placed upon the tax duplicate, collected by the county treasurer as other taxes, and paid over to such bidder upon the warrant of the county auditor; and all this is done, not in the interest of the public, but in the interest of private persons. It is not so much a case in which private property is taken for public use for which compensation must be first made in money, as it is a taking of private property for private use, and therefore in violation of that part of § 19 of the Bill of Rights which says: "Private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare." The money required to pay the assessment is the private property of the railroad company, and cannot be taken from it for the private welfare of another. The sections in question provide solely for the relief of the lands of private individuals in their private interests, and seek to impose a burden by way of assessment, to be collected as taxes from the railroad company for the private benefit of such individuals, and for that reason are unconstitutional. Assessments and taxes can be levied and collected only for public purposes.

There is another reason why these sections are unconstitutional: An assessment is attempted to be authorized upon the railroad company without an opportunity to be heard. The owner or tenant of land contiguous to the railroad may give ten days' notice to any ticket or other agent of such company to provide such ditch, and upon failure to do so he may give notice in writing to the probate judge of the county, and the judge thereupon appoints a commission to inspect the part of the road in question and report to him. Thereupon the judge notifies the railroad company in writing to open such ditch within a time specified. If not opened, the probate judge, upon three weeks' notice by advertisement, lets the work of opening such ditch to the lowest bidder. After the work is completed, the cost thereof and all costs of the proceeding are to be certified to the auditor, placed on the duplicate, collected as other taxes, and paid over to the person who did the work. The railroad company is notified by the owner or tenant to open the ditch, and is also notified by the probate judge to open it, but no notice is given to it of any hearing, and no provision whatever is made for a hearing at any stage of the proceeding. It may be that the railroad extends through or by swamp land, in which case the statute by its terms is not applicable. It may be that the ditches already provided are of sufficient depth, width, and grade to conduct the water to a proper outlet. It may be that the accumulation of water does not arise from the construction or operation of the road, but from the natural lay of the land. It may be that no public interest is to be conserved, for which alone an assessment can be made. It may be that the accumulation of water is not injurious to contiguous lands or the public. As to all these, and other material matters, the railroad company has a right to be heard before it is condemned to suffer and pay an assessment. Reasonable notice, and an opportunity to be heard in defense or opposition, are prerequisites to jurisdiction; and an assessment made without such notice and opportunity to be so heard is void, not only for want of jurisdiction, but also because there was not due process of law. While taxes are laid without notice, the statutes being regarded as sufficient notice, and § 4859 as sufficient remedy, special burdens by way of special assessments cannot be laid on property without notice and an opportunity, somewhere along the line, to be heard in opposition or defense. Special assessments cannot exceed the special benefits. Walsh v. Barron, 61 Ohio St. 15, 55 N. E. 164. And if there is nothing else available to the landowner, this question may arise in every case, and therefore the landowner is entitled to notice before any burden by way of special assessment is laid on his property. The rule in such cases is well stated in Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289, as follows: "A law imposing an assessment for a local improvement, without notice to and a hearing or an opportunity to be heard on the part of the owner of the property to be assessed, has the effect to deprive him of his property without 'due process of law,' and is unconstitutional. The law may prescribe the kind of notice and the mode in which it may be given, but it cannot dispense with all notice. It is not enough that the owner may by chance have notice, or that he may as a matter of favor have a hearing. The law must require notice and give a right to a hearing."

It is urged by counsel for defendants in error that the sections in question are enacted under the police power, and do no more than to require the railroad company to so use its property as not to injure that of another, and cite Cooley, Const. Lim. *573. While the general assembly under the police power may restrict and regulate the conduct of persons and the use of property within reasonable bounds, it must do so under the limitations of the Constitution, and cannot, under the guise of that power, take the private property of one person and bestow it upon another for his private use and benefit. Neither can it lay an extra burden on property without notice to the owner and an opportunity to be heard. The regulation and restriction under the police power in behalf of the public may be enforced by taxation or assessment, but in behalf of a private individual it can only be enforced by action in a court of competent jurisdiction.

It is also urged by counsel for defendants in error that the accumulation of water along the roadbed is a nuisance, and that the proceedings authorized by said sections are not more than the abatement of such nuisance at the expense of the party creating it, and this seems to have been the view taken by the courts below. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Keith, 21 Ohio C. C. 669, and Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 134, 23 N. E. 878, are cited and relied upon to support this contention. The law of nuisance has no application to the subject-matter of these sections. Nothing is said in them as to nuisances, and there is no declaration in the statute making such accumulation of water a nuisance and no authority given to abate any such pretended nuisance. The whole object of the statute is to conduct the accumulated water to a proper outlet, so as to protect lands contiguous to the railroad, and for the private benefit of the owners of such lands. There is nothing in the statute looking to the protection of the public health, convenience, or welfare. So that, if the law of nuisance were to be applied to this case, it could not avail, because the nuisance would be to private individuals, and not to the public. Even Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 134, 23 N. E. 878, concedes that a private nuisance cannot be abated by the party inconvenienced, without process of law. In Lawton v. Steele the statute declared and made the fish nets a public nuisance, and authorized their destruction by any person, and required the game and fish protectors to destroy them. Under that statute the destruction of the nets was upheld as not being a taking of private property for public use without compensation, and also as not being a taking without due process of law. That case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499, the court holding that the statute came within the police power, and as to the value of the nets, in effect, applied the maxim of De minimis non curat lex. The exact question has never been passed upon by this court, but from the general trend of our decisions, and the construction of our Constitution, it may well be doubted whether the summary destruction of such nets under such a statute would be upheld by this court. In Edson v. Crangle, 62 Ohio St. 49, 56 N. E. 647, the statute forbade the use of the nets, and provided that nets set or placed contrary to the act should be confiscated, sold, and proceeds placed in the public treasury; and this court held the seizure of such nets without process of law to be in violation of the constitutional rights of the owners, and compelled the game warden to make compensation. In that statute there was no provision declaring the nets a nuisance, as in the sections under consideration here there is no provision making the accumulated water a nuisance. That which the general assembly has not declared a public nuisance, and authorized its summary abatement in the interest of the public, cannot be construed by a court to be such nuisance and liable to be summarily abated without process of law, even in the interest of the public, and certainly not in the interest of private individuals. This is conceded in Lawton v. Steele, supra.

It is also urged that at common law nuisances might be abated, and that our Constitution has made no change in this regard. If at common law private property might be taken for private use, or taken for public use without compensation, or taken or destroyed without due course of law, then our Constitution has rendered inoperative the common law in that regard, because under our Constitution private property shall ever be held inviolate, and where taken for public use compensation therefor must be first made in money, and every person for an injury done him in his land, goods, or person shall have remedy by due course of law. The common law, in so far as it conflicts with these provisions of the Constitution, is inoperative. There is nothing so sacred in the common law that it should override a constitution or statute. Much of our Constitution was adopted, and many of our statutes enacted, to get rid of the imperfections and injustice of the common law. While, therefore, said § 3342 is valid as to the duty imposed on such railroad company to construct and keep open ditches as therein provided, where the accumulation of such water is to the injury of contiguous lands, or detrimental to the public, it is invalid when such water is not injurious to such lands or the public, because, if no injury is done by such accumulated water, the railroad company can use its right of way for the storage of such water or other purpose as to it may seem proper. The remedy provided in said §§ 3343, 3344, 3345, and 3346 for the enforcement of said duty so imposed by § 3342 is in conflict with § 19 of article 1 of the Constitution, and § 16 of the same article, because the private property of the railroad company, the money to pay the assessment, is taken, not for a public, but private, purpose, and thereby the constitutional right of the company to hold its private property inviolate is invaded; and this is done without due course of law, because done without notice and an opportunity to be heard in defense, and because, further, that the right of the owner of contiguous lands for redress against the company for failure to construct and keep open such ditches is a private right, to be enforced by proper action in a court of competent jurisdiction, and not by the paternal remedy of assessment and taxation for the protection and benefit of private persons. The power of assessment and taxation can be enforced by the state in the interest of the public only, and not for the redress of private wrongs.

The judgments of the courts below will be reversed, the demurrer to the petition overruled, and the cause remanded to the Court 60 L. R. A.

of Common Pleas for further proceedings according to law.

HAMILTON, GLENDALE, & CINCINNATI TRACTION COMPANY, Pf. in Err.,

v.
O. V. PARRISH.

(.....Ohio.....)

- *1. The consents of owners of lots abutting on a street to the construction and operation of a street railroad on such street are not property rights that can be appropriated under the power of eminent domain.
2. Such consents are not property rights, but rights in their nature personal to each owner of an abutting lot.
3. Such personal rights were bestowed by the general assembly on owners of abutting lots as a check upon the power of municipal authorities to authorize street railroads to be constructed and operated against the wishes of the owners of lots on such street.
4. The owners of abutting lots are free to give or withhold such consent, upon such terms as to them severally may seem proper, and there is no public policy in this state against giving such consent for a valuable consideration moving from the street railroad company to such lot owner.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Butler County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the placing of tracks in the street in front of plaintiff's property. Reversed.

Statement by Burket, Ch. J.:

Said defendant in error, as plaintiff below, filed his petition in the court of common pleas against said plaintiff in error, and after the proper preliminary averments as to the incorporation of said company, his ownership of a lot on Third street, along which said company was about to build its street railroad under an ordinance passed by the board of control of the city of Hamilton, averred as follows: "Plaintiff says that said ordinance is void, and never went into operation, for the reason that the written consents of the owners of more than one half of the feet front of the lots and lands abutting on said Third street from High street to Maple avenue, for the construction of said railroad, were never obtained or filed with said board of control, and that, therefore, said board of control had no jurisdiction to pass said ordinance, and the franchise granted thereby is void. Plaintiff further says that the written consents of the abutting property owners that were procured and filed by said defendant to the construction of said street railroad on said Third street were procured by purchase for money or other valuable consideration, which inured to the exclusive benefit of the said abutting property owners, and that said written consents so purchased by money or other valuable consideration were the consents of owners of lots and lands abutting on said Third street, along which it is proposed to construct said railroad under said pretended ordinance, and that said owners immediately before and at the time they so signed said written consents were opposed to the construction of said street railroad along and over said route and in said street, and that they did not believe that the same so constructed over said route and on said street would be in the interest of themselves as property owners and of the public; that said abutters so signing for a consideration would not have signed said consent but for said consideration so paid, or things furnished them for so consenting; that said considerations were substantial, and in most instances large, sums of money paid to obtain said consents; that said payments and promises were made by and on behalf of said defendant's company to said property owners, and plaintiff says that without the consents of said property owners, so obtained by purchase and other substantial considerations and promises, the consents of the owners of one half of the feet front of the lots and lands abutting on said Third street, along which it is proposed to construct said railroad, could not have been obtained and presented to said board of control; that the opposition of said abutting property owners so receiving said consideration to the construction of said street railroad was conscientious, and in good faith. Plaintiff further says that, before said ordinance was passed by said board of control granting said franchise, that members of said board of control who voted in favor of said ordinance, to wit, Joseph J. Pater, C. E. Mason, Conrad Semler, and Joseph Strategier, had knowledge of the fact that, in order to secure the written consents of a majority of the feet front abutting on said Third street, that said defendant had procured the same by purchase or other valuable consideration. Plaintiff therefore says that by reason of the premises that said ordinance is illegal, null, and void." Plaintiff below prayed that the construction and operation of said street railroad be perpetually enjoined.

The traction company answered, denying the material allegations of the petition, and, after pleading the expenditure of over $35,000, justified as follows: "Defendant further admits and alleges the fact to be that the said board of control of the city of Hamilton duly passed an ordinance granting and giving to this defendant the right to build said road along said route on said streets, 60 L. R. A.

and in pursuance of said grant made by the said city of Hamilton it is now engaged in constructing its said route, and was so engaged when enjoined therein. Defendant further says that the action of plaintiff is not brought in good faith as an abutting property holder, and for the benefit and protection of his said property, but is brought solely in the interest of rival street railroad companies, known as the Hamilton & Lindenwald Electric Transit Co. and the Southern Ohio Traction Co., of which said plaintiff is a stockholder and director, and for the purpose of preventing defendant from constructing its said track, and thereby preventing it from entering into competition with the said Hamilton & Lindenwald Electric Transit Co. and the Southern Ohio Traction Co., and solely in the interest and at the expense of said rival street railroad plaintiff is maintaining this action, and for no other purpose whatsoever. Defendant further says that the citizens of Hamilton and the public in general are desirous for said road to be constructed; that the same will be of great public advantage and benefit to the citizens and business men of the city of Hamilton; and that, if said plaintiff should prevail in this action, the same will be detrimental to the public interest, prevent defendant from constructing said road, and thereby deprive the citizens and people of Hamilton of the advantages and benefits of said street railroad line, and in addition thereto will cause a loss to this defendant of not less than $—— by reason of the purchases as aforesaid made, the work done, obligations incurred, and defendant would be required to restore streets to their original condition. Defendant further says it has constructed a line and has the same completed from the village of Glendale, in Hamilton county, to the north corporation line of the city of Hamilton, on East avenue, and that with the construction of the present line now proposed it will be able to carry passengers direct from Third and High streets, in said city of Hamilton, to Fifth and Walnut, in the city of Cincinnati, without change of cars, and at a greatly reduced rate in fare, and in a much shorter time than is now charged or consumed by the other company; and the same will be the only route by which passengers can travel directly from Third and High streets, in Hamilton, to Fifth and Walnut, in the city of Cincinnati, without transfer or change of cars."

The substance of the reply is as follows:

"He denies that this action is not brought in good faith. He denies that it is brought solely in the interest of rival street railroad companies known as the Hamilton & Lindenwald Electric Transit Co. and the Southern Ohio Traction Co., and for the purpose of preventing defendant from constructing its track, and thereby preventing it from entering into competition with said street railroad companies; but avers that the action is brought in good faith by him as an abutting property holder, and for the benefit and protection of his property. He admits that he is one of the stockholders and directors of the Hamilton & Lindenwald Electric Transit Co. and the Southern Ohio Traction Co."

Upon trial in the circuit court on appeal that court, after finding that said O. V. Parrish is the owner of an improved lot on Third street, and that he commenced and prosecuted the action in good faith as an abutting property owner, found the further facts as follows:

"The total frontage on Third street from High to Canal street, now called 'Maple Avenue,' is 760.50 feet. A majority of the feet front is 381 feet. Of this number property owners representing 232.90 feet voluntarily signed their consent to the construction of the road in Third street. That the consent of 39 feet was signed 'Alexander Gordon, by J. L. Blair, His Agent,' subject to Alexander Gordon's approval; and that said Alexander Gordon never, although duly notified, disapproved of said written consent, and is therefore deemed to have approved the same. That the following written consents were procured by purchase for money consideration, to wit:

George Herold	30.00 ft.	$400
Clement Snider	20.00 ft.
Caroline Snider	25.00 ft.
Pauline Schwartz	18.50 ft.	50
Margaret Schwartz	75.00 ft.	250
Fred Fries	52.00 ft.	100
	<hr/> 220.50 ft.

"And that when said written consents were filed with the board of control, to wit, August 10, 1901, said board of control knew that the same had been procured by purchase. The court also find that at the time of the commencement of this improvement up until August 9 and 10, 1901, when said consents were procured by purchase, the said George Herold, Clement Snider, Caroline Snider, Pauline Schwartz, Margaret Schwartz, and Fred Fries had been opposed to the construction and operation of said street railroad in and along and upon said Third street. The court finds that at the time said ordinance was passed there was not on file with the city clerk, nor was there presented to the board of control, the valid written consents of the owners of a majority of the feet front of the property abutting upon said Third street from High to said Maple avenue, because of said consents so purchased."

As its conclusions of law upon the above facts the court found: "First. That the plaintiff was entitled, as an abutting property owner, to maintain this action. Second. The court finds as a conclusion of law that the said written consents procured by purchase of the abutting property owners are invalid, null, and void, and against public policy, and that the same cannot be counted to determine the majority of the feet front on said street, and that, therefore, at the time said ordinance was passed, there was not produced and filed with said 60 L. R. A. board of control the written consents of the owners of the majority of the front feet on said part of said Third street, and that said board of control never acquired jurisdiction to pass said ordinance making said grant."

Proper exceptions were preserved throughout. The circuit court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff below against the traction company perpetually enjoining the construction of said street railroad on said part of Third street, and for costs. Thereupon the traction company came here seeking to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

If the statute confers upon the abutting property holders a property right incident to their land, then the nonconsenting abutter has the same property right as the consenting abutter, and the effect of this construction of the law is to take away from the nonconsenting abutter his property without due compensation, as the law requires only a majority of the abutting property owners, as measured by the feet front, to consent, and the law would be unconstitutional and void.

Burket, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contention in the pleadings and finding of facts as to whether Mr. Parrish brought and prosecuted the action in good faith is of no importance, because, if he had a legal right which he sought to protect by an action in a court of justice, the motive which induced him to bring the action cannot be inquired into. To sustain his action, if brought in good faith, and defeat it if brought in bad faith, would be to control his morals by means of a lawsuit. That cannot be done. Unless restrained by statute, a man may direct his moral conduct as he pleases. In State ex rel. Flowers v. Columbus Bd. of Edu. 35 Ohio St. 368, the following appears on page 382: "If it is apparent that the relator is legally capable of prosecuting this proceeding, and that he has a clear legal right to the remedy he is seeking, we cannot stop to inquire whether he is moving of his own volition or at the request of some third party." To the same effect are Lewis v. White, 16 Ohio St. 444; Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294, and Letts v. Kessler, 54 Ohio St. 73, 40 L. R. A. 177, 42 N. E. 765. And it can make no difference whether his right is clear or not, only so that it exists. The fee of the land occupied by highways outside of municipalities is in the owner of the adjoining lands. Lawrence R. Co. v. Williams, 35 Ohio St. 168; Daily v. State, 51 Ohio St. 348, 24 L. R. A. 724, 37 N. E. 710; Phifer v. Coz, 21 Ohio St. 248, 8 Am. Rep. 58; and Callen v. Columbus Edison Electric Light Co. 66 60 L. R. A.

Ohio St. 166, 58 L. R. A. 782, 64 N. E. 141. But in municipalities the fee of the streets is in the city or village, in trust, however, for street purposes. Rev. Stat. § 2601, Swan & C. Rev. Stat. p. 1483; Cincinnati & S. G. Ave. Street R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523; Columbus v. Agler, 44 Ohio St. 485, 8 N. E. 302, and Callen v. Columbus Edison Electric Light Co. 66 Ohio St. 166, 58 L. R. A. 782, 64 N. E. 141. The fee being in the municipality in trust for street purposes, the abutting lot owner, in addition to his easement in the street for passage and repassage in common with the general public, has a special easement in the street appendant and appurtenant to his lot for ingress and egress; and when the street becomes vacated the public thereby surrenders, or, more properly speaking, legally abandons, the public use thereof for travel, but the private or special use or easement adheres to the abutting lots, and becomes part and parcel of them as by accretion, so as to preserve the right of ingress and egress to the lots over the land that formerly formed the street or part thereof. The reason that a street, when vacated, becomes a part of the abutting lots, is not because the owner of the lot owned the fee of the street, but because it must go there by necessity, to preserve his easement of ingress and egress, which in many cases is a valuable property right, and without which the lots might be of little value. The street being vacated and abandoned, the public no longer owns it, and it must either revert to the original owner, or adhere to the abutting lots as by accretion. As the original owner is presumed to have received full value for the street when he sold the lots, there is no just reason why he should have the street, when vacated, restored to him. And as the lot owners and those in the line of title have paid an increased price for lots by reason of the easement in the street, it is only just that when the street becomes vacated the easement should be preserved to them by adding the vacated street to the lots; and therefore this doctrine of accretion in such cases has been adopted in this state, and generally elsewhere. While the abutting lot owner has this right of public travel on the street, and the right of ingress and egress from the street to his lots, the public authorities retain the right to improve the street, and place such means of travel thereon as, in their judgment, shall best conserve the public welfare. And so long as his easement of ingress and egress is not materially injured, he is without remedy, because he is not wronged, said easement—all the property right he has in the street—not being interfered with. If, however, his easement of ingress and egress should be materially injured by the building and operation of the street railroad, then he must be first fully compensated for such injury. This, in substance, is the holding of this court in Cincinnati & S. G. Ave. Street R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523, and subsequent cases on this subject. His easement of ingress and egress being the only property right he has in the street, the city authorities had the power, under the Constitution, to construct and operate a street railroad on and along the street without his consent and against his will, unless restrained by statute, provided they cause no material interference with his easement of ingress and egress.

The general assembly at an early day foresaw that the public authorities, in the exercise of the power to grant franchises for street railroads, with a liability to make compensation only in cases of interference with the property right of ingress and egress, might act oppressively, or against the wishes of the abutting lot owners, and therefore imposed a further check upon that power, and required that the consent in writing of the owners of a majority of the feet front on the street should be obtained and produced to the proper officer. This was done, as held by this court in Roberts v. Easton, 19 Ohio St. 86, "to protect the owners of property on the streets of cities . . . from the exercise of an arbitrary power on the part of the city authorities in permitting the streets to be used for street railroads." But this additional check did not have the effect to vest the fee of the street in the abutting lot owner, nor to give him a right to compensation, unless his easement of ingress and egress should be injured. It therefore gave him no more property rights than he had before the statute as to such consents was enacted. Such consent is, therefore, not a property right adhering to the lot, but is a personal right in the owner of the lot, a power or sword in his hands with which to protect his lot against the arbitrary powers of the city authorities. A majority of consents by the feet front is a condition precedent to jurisdiction to pass a street railway ordinance, and each abutting lot owner is free to aid in conferring such jurisdiction, and free to withhold such aid. His actions cannot be controlled in that regard by others on the street, nor by courts of justice in their behalf. Such a condition, such consent, in the nature of things, cannot be appropriated under the power of eminent domain. The consent must be given or withheld at the option of the lot owner. He cannot be forced to give it, nor forced to withhold it. Rev. Stat., § 3439, provides for this written consent, and it imposes no conditions or restrictions, but leaves the lot owner free to give or withhold his consent. And § 3440 goes further, and provides that "nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of property owners to give or withhold their consent." So that our statutes, while granting this power of consent, and providing for the giving or withholding of the same, impose no conditions or limitations on such power, but expressly provide that the statutes shall not affect the rights of property owners to give or withhold such consent. We cannot approve the Illinois cases on this question, but regard the New York and New Jersey cases on the question as stating the correct rule. As the general assembly, while having the subject before it, imposed no conditions or limitations upon the exercise of this power, can this court amend the statute by construction, and add conditions or limitations not imposed by the legislature? We think not. In some other like statutes the general assembly has imposed conditions and limitations, and, if it had regarded them necessary in this statute, it would have inserted them into the act, as was done in the two-mile pike act, now Rev. Stat., § 4836. It is, therefore, clear that the general assembly did not regard it wise or necessary to impose conditions or limitations upon the exercise of the power of consent in such cases.

But it is urged that outside of the statute, and independent of it, the purchase of such consents for value is against public policy, and this seems to be the ground upon which the circuit court based its judgment; because that court found, as a conclusion of law, that the "consents procured by purchase are invalid, null, and void, and against public policy." As they are not shown to be defective in form or substance, and are not prohibited by statute, there can be no reason for holding them "invalid, null, and void," unless they are against public policy. We will therefore address ourselves to the matter of public policy, as the case was argued here upon that ground. In Probasco v. Raine, 50 Ohio St. 378, 34 N. E. 536, this court held: "If a statute is constitutional, it is valid, and cannot be set aside by a court as being against public policy or natural right. There can be no public policy or right in conflict with a constitutional statute." In the case at bar the effort is, not to invoke public policy to override a valid statute, as was attempted in the Probasco Case, but rather to bring forward a public policy to supply a rule of decision as to a statutory matter as to which the general assembly has been purposely silent. In Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205,—a case from Pennsylvania,—the Supreme Court of the United States laid down the rule as to public policy in such cases as follows: "Nor are we at liberty to look at general considerations of the supposed public interests and policy of Pennsylvania upon this subject, beyond what its Constitution and laws and judicial decisions make known to us. The question, What is the public policy of a state, and what is contrary to it? if inquired into beyond these limits, will be found to be one of great vagueness and uncertainty, and to involve discussions which scarcely come within the range of judicial duty and functions, and upon which men may and will complexionally differ. . . . We disclaim any right to enter upon such examinations beyond what the state constitutions, laws, and decisions necessarily bring before us." No decision of this court is cited, and we know of none, recognizing or establishing the public policy contended for in this case, and we think it safe to hold that there is none. Under a system like ours, where the fundamental rights of the people are defined and guarded by a written constitution, where all crimes are statutory, and our civil rights and procedure also regulated by statutes, there is but little room for public policy outside of our statutes and Constitution. In this regard our system is very different from that of England, where the doctrine of public policy in earlier days had a wide scope, and from which it was brought to this country, and has often been indiscriminately applied by courts here without observing the distinction between the systems of the two countries. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Girard Will Case, 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205, states the rule as to public policy correctly, and, tested by that rule, we find nothing in our Constitution, statutes, or decisions sustaining the public policy contended for.

It is urged that to purchase consents for value is a species of bribery, and an expression to that effect in Makemson v. Kauffman, 35 Ohio St. 444, is cited, and relied upon. But upon turning to our bribery statute we do not find it to cover the case, and, as we have no common-law crimes, but all defined by statute, we must conclude that such purchase of consents is not a species of bribery, because under our system what is not prohibited is tolerated. Again, title 1, chap. 8, of our Penal Code, from §§ 6929 to 7017, is devoted to "Offenses against Public Policy," and it is only fair to presume that, if the general assembly had intended to prohibit the purchase of such consents, it would have done so in this chapter 8, or in the street railroad sections.

It is also urged that the abutting lot owners, as to these consents, act in a public capacity, or perform a public function, and that they must, therefore, act from pure motives for the benefit of the public, or, at least, for the good of all on the street, and that their action for or against the street railroad cannot be influenced by considerations of gain; and some cases are cited supporting this view. But here again we are asked to amend the statutes by construction, and to create a public policy which is not deducible from our Constitution and statutes. This court cannot control the morals of litigants, unless so provided by statute. And when the evil results flowing from a given course of conduct have not been of a grave enough character to attract the attention of the general assembly, this court cannot, by construction, provide a new remedy under the plea of public policy.

The cases cited by counsel on both sides have been fully considered, but their review has not been found necessary in this opinion.

With this view as to such written consents, the questions growing out of 95 Ohio Laws, § 3439a, p. 475, are immaterial, and are not here decided. The judgment of the circuit court will be reversed, and judgment entered upon the finding of facts in favor of the plaintiff in error.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for plaintiff in error.

LONDON & LANCASHIRE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY et al.

(75 Conn. 397.)

In distributing the loss upon a building, machinery, and stock between insurance policies covering all the items for a gross sum and those specifically liable on each item, all of which provided that the liability shall not be greater "than the amount hereby insured shall bear to the whole insurance," the blanket policies should be regarded as insuring each item to the entire amount unappropriated when it is reached, making the adjustment item by item in the order of greatest loss, if that will work substantial equity and justice to all concerned, and deducting the sums appropriated to the respective items as they are adjusted and passed.

(January 7, 1903.)

NOTE.—As to proportioning loss between blanket policy and one covering specific property only, see also, in this series, Page v. Sun Ins. Office (C. C. App. 8th C.) 33 L. R. A. 249. 60 L. R. A.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for New Haven County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain policies of fire insurance in which the question was as to the amounts which the respective policies should contribute toward the loss. Judgment in favor of specific policies.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. Stoddard and George R. Cooley for plaintiff.

Messrs. Fay & Bennett, for defendants:

The clause which provides for an apportionment of the loss in case of other insurance on the property is a part of the contract, and must receive a reasonable construction. It must be construed as any other stipulation between the insurer and the insured.

Ogden v. East River Ins. Co. 50 N. Y. 388, 10 Am. Rep. 492; Page v. Sun Ins. Office, 64 Fed. 194, 33 L. R. A. 249, 20 C. C. A. 397, 36 U. S. App. 672, 74 Fed. 203.

The compound policies cover to the full amount every item of property described in them.

Leisure Lumber Co. v. Mutual F. Ins. Co.

101 Iowa, 514, 70 N. W. 761; Page v. Sun Ins. Office, 33 L. R. A. 249, 20 C. C. A. 397, 36 U. S. App. 672, 74 Fed. 203.

The blanket policy should not be allowed to claim any benefits because of the incidental fact that it finds a specific policy on some portion of the property, where, in the absence of such other insurance, it would properly be obliged to follow and pay the whole loss, up to the full amount for which it is written.

Ostrander, Fire Ins. p. 495; Page v. Sun Ins. Office, 33 L. R. A. 249, 20 C. C. A. 397, 36 U. S. App. 672, 74 Fed. 203, 64 Fed. 194; Sherman v. Madison Mut. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 104; Cromie v. Kentucky & L. Mut. Ins. Co. 15 B. Mon. 432; Angelrodt v. Delaware Mut. Ins. Co. 31 Mo. 593.

Messrs. Alling, Webb, & Morehouse also for defendants.

Prentice, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the owner of premises upon which stood a brewery and shed. In the brewery were machinery and stock. Upon the buildings, machinery, and stock the plaintiff carried in some thirty-four companies insurance against fire aggregating $60,000 in amount. These policies were all of the standard form, and contained the following provision: "This company shall not be liable under this policy for a greater proportion of any loss on the described property . . . than the amount hereby insured shall bear to the whole insurance, whether valid or not, or by solvent or insolvent insurers, covering such property. . . ." Thirty-one of the policies, covering insurance for $55,000, were of the kind known as "blanket" or "compound" policies; that is, they insured said buildings, machinery, and stock as a whole, and without distributing the amount of the insurance among the several items. The remaining policies, containing insurance for $5,000, were of the kind known as "specific;" that is, the amounts insured thereby were distributed among the several items of property, a specified amount to each item. Each of these specific policies covered in the whole precisely the same property as did the compound insurance, but distributively. The manner of distribution was uniform among the specific policies, and was among four separate items, to wit, the main or brewery building, stock, machinery, and shed, as follows: $1,634.88 on the brewery, $1,839.21 on the stock, $1,498.64 on the machinery, and $27.24 on the shed. A fire damaged the brewery, stock, and machinery. The sound value of the property insured was $59,982, divided as follows: Brewery, $20,586; stock, $11,085; machinery, $28,111; and shed, $200. The loss by the fire was mutually adjusted at $42,953, distributed as follows: Brewery, $15,115; stock, $11,085; machinery, $16,753; and shed 0.

It is conceded that the assured is entitled to receive from the defendants the amount of his loss above stated. The only question in the case is one between the several defendants as to the sums which each should pay. Between the blanket insurers there is no dispute, and between the specific there is none. The contention is between the two classes of insurers, and is as to the method to be employed in the apportionment of the loss in view of the provision as to prorating which appears alike in all the policies and which has been quoted. It is clear that the compound and the specific insurance must be brought together in the prorating. This necessarily involves an adjustment by separate items, and the application in some way of the blanket insurance to each item covered by specific insurance. The question is as to how this shall be done. The claim of the blanket insurers is that their policies should, for the purpose of the distribution of the loss, be converted into specific ones; specific amounts under the policies being set out to each item upon which there is specific insurance, so that, for the purpose of determining the amount that any blanket policy shall contribute towards any item of loss upon which there is specific insurance the amount of the blanket policy's insurance upon such item and the total amount of insurance thereon shall be computed upon the basis thus ascertained. The methods suggested for making this conversion from compound to specific are two, both of which are claimed as having the approval of authority and experience. One method is to distribute the amount of the blanket policy over the property insured by it so that the items bearing specific insurance shall be credited with insurance to such a proportionate amount of the whole as the sound value of the specific item bears to the sound value of the whole. The other is to make this conversion upon the basis of the respective losses upon the property insured. The specific insurers, upon the other hand, contend that there should be no such conversion, but that in adjusting each item of loss the total amount of insurance thereon and the amount insured by each blanket policy be determined by including the entire amount of the compound insurance which has not been previously exhausted in adjusting some other item. The widely differing results to which the two claims might lead are apparent. In making these claims, and others which are incidental to them, all the parties concede that, whatever general rule of apportionment of loss may be adopted, it must, in so far as it is not directly prescribed by the contract, yield in case of need to the interests of the assured. The first requisite of any method of apportionment sought to be applied must be the assured's protection to the full extent of his rights under his policies. Any method which, in a given case, fails to afford him the full measure of his just indemnity, must give place to another which will. In the present case the plaintiff has no concern as to which of the suggested modes be adopted in distributing his loss among his insurers. The interests of the latter are alone involved. The whole question arises out of the application to the facts of the case of the provisions of the prorating clause in the policies. Each insurer has not entered into an unqualified obligation to indemnify the assured to the extent of his loss, or to the extent of his loss limited by the amount of the policy. It has made a contract which gives it, as against the assured, a benefit arising from coinsurance. It stipulates that its liability shall be limited in amount dependent upon the existence and amount of such coinsurance. The policy expressly states how its liability shall be determined. The question, therefore, becomes one of contract construction. It is not one of equitable determination in the absence of an agreement, as was the case in certain of the adjudicated cases. We are not called upon to adjust the equities between coinsurers, one having paid more than his fair share of the loss. We are not dealing with the doctrine of subrogation. The parties have recorded their agreement, and we have only to determine its meaning, and enforce it.

The policy provision, to restate its pertinent portion, is: "This company shall not be liable under this policy for a greater proportion of any loss on the described property . . . than the amount hereby insured shall bear to the whole insurance." It is thus provided that the mode to be employed in determining the extent of liability is purely a mathematical one, involving the stating of a problem in simple proportion. The three known terms of the proportion, from which the fourth, to wit, the amount of the liability under the given policy, is to be deduced, are stated to be the whole insurance, the amount insured under the policy, and the loss. The loss is in this case an ascertained sum. In any it is a determinable one. Where the given policy is a specific one, the second term is also a definite one, and only the first remains open to question. If the given policy is a blanket one, then both the first and second terms are subject to dispute. An answer to a single question, however, resolves all. That question which thus stands out as the controlling one in the situation is thus seen to be this: "By the terms of a blanket policy, what amount of insurance attaches to each item embraced within the insurance?" The answer to this question is not a hidden one. The characteristic features of a blanket policy are well understood. Its very essence is that it covers to its full amount every item of property described in it. If the loss upon one portion or item of the property exhausts the full amount of the policy, the whole insurance must be paid. There can be no apportionment of it. In the absence of a prorating clause, one blanket insurer among many insurers, whether blanket or specific, may be sued, and he must pay the whole loss, if it is not in excess of his policy. His payment will give him certain equitable rights of contribution as against his coinsurers, but his legal obligation to pay the assured cannot be questioned. The contract holds him to that. These principles are elementary. 3 Joyce, Ins. § 2492; 1 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 13; Ostrander, Fire Ins. 60 L. R. A.

§ 204. It is in such particulars as these that blanket policies differ from specific. The difference is one which inheres in the nature of the two contracts, and has its recognition in the accepted advantages of a blanket policy to the assured and its disadvantages to the insurer, and in the more exacting terms which are customarily demanded for its issue. The answer to our question must, therefore, be that the whole amount insured by a blanket policy attaches, and invariably attaches to each item thereunder. The blanket insurers concede the peculiar character which in general inheres in such policies, but they say that for the purpose of the contributing clause they are entitled to an apportionment of their insurance in cases of adjustment in connection with specific insurers. We fail to see anything in this claim but an appeal from the contract to assumed principles of fairness and equity. It certainly does not rest upon any logical foundation. The palpable answer to it is found in the fact that the question is one of legal construction of an express contract obligation, and not of equitable determination. The parties having made a contract, the courts are powerless to change it. What the blanket insurers ask is, in effect, that there be read into their policies a provision which is not there. Had the parties wished, this provision might easily have been incorporated. It was not, and the contract must stand as made.

We have thus far discussed the question at issue as one of reason, and not of authority. The analogous cases are few. They are, however, to be found. Concerning them it has to be confessed that the majority which have arisen under the operation of the prorating clause have adopted the compound insurers' view. It is noticeable, also, that of these all save a very few state the proposition as a dictum, or imply its correctness without argument or reason therefor. Such are the cases of Blake v. Exchange Mut. Ins. Co. 12 Gray, 272; Cromie v. Kentucky & L. Mut. Ins. Co. 15 B. Mon. 432; Lesure Lumber Co. v. Mutual F. Ins. Co. 101 Iowa, 514, 70 N. W. 761. In Chandler v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 70 Vt. 562, 41 Atl. 502, the court attempts to give a reason for this position. It is contained in these words only: "As by the terms of the specific policies they cannot be converted into blanket policies, it necessarily follows that the only way in which the loss can be adjusted is to turn the blanket policies into specific ones." This is a clear case of a non sequitur. The argument rests upon an assumed necessity which does not exist. It is practically as simple to adjust a loss by not apportioning as by apportioning the blanket insurance. In Ogden v. East River Ins. Co. 50 N. Y. 388, 10 Am. Rep. 492, the court finds its reason in the fact that it was unreasonable to assume that any of the parcels included in the blanket insurance was over-insured where the total insurance was not in excess of the total value. What method of adjustment this argument would have led the court to adopt had concurrent compound policies for different gross sums, all or part exceeding specific item valuations, been involved, was not stated. An assumption of such a situation sufficiently discloses the fallacy of the case. Of all these cases it is to be observed that none attempts to lay down a rule of universal, or even general, application. They treat each case by itself, conceding that in the next the rule might not apply. The trouble has been that, in ignoring the contract, all has been left to arbitrary and uncertain action, which fairness and equity in the given case seemed to dictate. In Page v. Sun Ins. Office, 33 L. R. A. 249, 20 C. C. A. 397, 36 U. S. App. 672, 74 Fed. 203, the other side of this question is distinctly avowed. The decision is put squarely upon the terms of the contract. The argument, although brief, is substantially that which has guided us. The position assumed in the case last cited seems to have the approval of Joyce in his latest work. 4 Joyce, Ins. § 3457. In Sherman v. Madison Mut. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 104, also, this doctrine receives at least implied sanction.

One other point remains to be considered. As the existence of the specific policies compels the adjustment of the loss by items, these items must be taken up in some order. This order might very materially affect the result, both as respects the companies and the insured, since that portion of a blanket policy which is exhausted in the settlement upon the first item no longer remains to be applied to the second item, and so on through the list. This matter of order is one upon which the policies in suit and policies ordinarily are silent. Evidently nothing remains but some arbitrary method of selection, in which the considerations influencing a choice should be what, on the whole, under the conditions, best satisfies the ends of fairness and justice as between the companies, the assured being given his rightful amount of indemnity. A little study of the peculiar situations which may arise may convince one that no rule of universal and unvarying application can be safely laid down. Whether one suggests the order of the greatest losses, or of the least losses, or the order of the enumeration in the special insurance, or an order to be determined by lot,—two at least of which methods appear to have been used,—or some other order, he will quite likely be met with an assumed situation in which his system seems to fail to fully accomplish equity and justice. Fortunately we have no need to search for a universal rule. In the present case it matters not to the assured, and little to the insurers, what order of adjustment is adopted. The order first indicated, to wit, that of the greatest losses, is one which, as a general rule, has some considerations in its favor. In this case it works out substantial equity and justice to all concerned. We therefore select it for the purposes of this case as on the whole the best.

The superior court is advised that in the adjustment of the plaintiff's loss and its apportionment among the defendant companies the items upon which there was loss be taken up in the order of the greatest losses, the whole property being divided for this purpose into items corresponding to those designated in the specific insurance; that in computing the total amount of insurance upon the first item the full amount of the blanket insurance be applied, and that the full amount of any given blanket policy be regarded as the amount of insurance upon the item under such policy; that with respect to the second and subsequent items the same rule be adopted, save that the total amount of insurance thereon be reduced by the amount of blanket insurance already exhausted in the settlement upon former items, and the amount of insurance under any given blanket policy likewise reduced by the amount thereof used in prior adjustments, and that judgment be rendered against the several defendants according to the results thus obtained.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jackson County to review a judgment refusing a writ of mandamus to compel the commissioners of Jackson County to proceed to erect an armory. Affirmed.

Statement by Taylor, Ch. J.:

The plaintiffs in error instituted mandamus proceedings in the circuit court of Jackson county against the county commissioners of said county. An alternative writ was granted and issued, and alleges as follows:

"In the Name of the State of Florida: To E. T. C. Dickenson, Chairman, Frank Peacock, A. A. Stribling, C. B. Pledger, and J. W. Carter, Members of the Board of County Commissioners of Jackson County, Florida, and Composing said Board of County Commissioners, Greeting:

"Whereas, a sworn petition of John Milton, Jr., as captain, C. L. Wilson as first lieutenant, and George Horne as second lieutenant, of a military company known as the 'Jackson Guards,' and designated as Company M, Third Battalion, First Regiment of Florida State Troops, shows that John Milton, Jr., is captain, and C. L. Wilson is first lieutenant, and George Horne is second lieutenant, of a military company known as the 'Jackson Guards;' that said military company has been duly mustered into the service of the state of Florida, and is a part of the Florida State Troops, and known and designated as Company M, Third Battalion, First Regiment Florida State Troops; that it contains, rank and file, forty men; that said men all reside at Marianna, Jackson county, Florida, and in the immediate vicinity of said town, except one, or perhaps two, who were enlisted and were mustered in in said town and have since removed; that said military company has been duly armed and equipped by the state of Florida, and has possession of a large quantity of arms, uniforms, and other military equipments furnished by the state; that said company has no armory suitable for its meetings and drills and for the safe storage of its arms and equipments; that its captain and commissioned officers have applied to the county commissioners of Jackson county, state of Florida, to provide them with an armory suitable for its meetings and drills and for the storage of its arms and equipments, but said respondents have wholly neglected, refused, and failed to provide such an armory.

... In the name of the state of Florida, you are hereby commanded to provide a suitable armory for its meetings and drills, and for the safe storage of its arms, of the Jackson Guards, Company M, Third Battalion, First Regiment Florida State Troops, forthwith, or to show cause before the judge of the first judicial circuit of Florida, at his office in the city of De Funiak Springs, Florida, Walton county, at 10 o'clock A. M. on the 16th day of September, 1901, why you should not do so; that you have then and there this writ."

The respondents moved to quash the alternative writ upon the following grounds: That Laws 1899, § 27, chap. 4684, laws of the state of Florida, under which said alternative writ was issued, is null and void for the following reasons: (a) That said section is in contravention and contrary to § 5, art. 9, of the Constitution of Florida; (b) that said section is in contravention and contrary to the provisions of §§ 20, 21, art. 3, of the Constitution of the state of Florida; (c) that said section is contrary to the provisions of article 14 of the Constitution of the state of Florida; (d) because said section is contrary to the provisions of § 16, art. 3, of the Constitution of the state of Florida.

This motion was granted, and the alternative writ was quashed, and this judgment the relators have brought here for review by writ of error.

Messrs. Benjamin S. Liddon and William B. Farley, for plaintiffs in error:

The armory is a county purpose within the meaning of the Constitution. The court has never been narrow or technical in placing a construction upon the phrase "county purpose." It has stated that no certain, fixed rule can be prescribed by which the question can be determined.

Military aid in the maintenance of law and order, and the protection of the public property, the suppression of mobs and riots, and the prevention of what is called lynch law, are each more of a county purpose.

The erection of an armory for a company of the Florida state troops in the county where such company is organized is not a county purpose. Each company is a compound part of the state troops and subject to governor's orders.

There is no county purpose connected with the building; it serves no county end, and is in no way of a peculiar benefit to the inhabitants of the county, different from the inhabitants of other counties of the state.

Nor is the question in any way affected by the fact that the legal title to the armory is in Cuyahoga county. The character of the imposition is determined by the fact that the armory is to be used for the accomplishment of duties which the Constitution charges upon the general assembly and the officers of the state.

Taylor, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Laws enacted in 1899, chap. 4684, § 27, to enforce the provisions of which this proceeding was instituted, provides as follows: "It shall be the duty of the board of county commissioners in each county in which there is a company or battery of state troops to provide each company or battery with an armory suitable for its meetings and drills and the safe storage of arms and equipments." The first contention of the motion to quash the alternative writ is that the provision of this section of the law is void because it violates the provisions of § 5 of article 9 of the Florida Constitution, which reads as follows: "The legislature shall authorize the several counties and incorporated cities or towns in the state to assess and impose taxes for county and municipal purposes, and for no other purposes, and all property shall be taxed upon the principles established for state taxation. But the cities and incorporated towns shall make their own assessments for municipal purposes upon the property within their limits. The legislature may also provide for levying a special capitation tax, and a tax on licenses. But the capitation tax shall not exceed $1 a year, and shall be applied exclusively to common-school purposes." The limitation imposed by this section of the organic law upon the legislature, in its grants of authority to the counties to assess and impose taxes, is that such taxes must be for none other than county purposes. As the expense of building or renting armories for state troops must necessarily be met by taxation, it follows that the validity of a law imposing the burden of supplying such armories upon the counties must depend upon the question whether or not it is a county purpose. And this brings us to the question, Is a company of state troops, regularly enlisted as a part of the militia of the state, in any sort or sense such a county institution of the county where its members individually reside as that the erection or maintenance of its armory in such county can properly be termed a county purpose?

Section 1 of article 14 of our Constitution provides as follows: "All able-bodied male inhabitants of the state between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, that are citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become citizens thereof, shall constitute the militia of the state; but no male citizen of whatever religious creed or opinion shall be exempt from military duty except upon such conditions as may be prescribed by law." Section 2 of the same article provides that "the legislature may provide by law for organizing and disciplining the militia of the state, for the encouragement of volunteer corps, the safe keeping of the public arms, and for a guard for the state prison." Section 3 of the same article provides for the appointment by the governor, by and with the consent of the senate, of two major generals and four brigadier generals of militia. Section 4 of the same article provides that "the governor shall have power to call out the militia to preserve the public peace, to execute the laws of the state, to suppress insurrections, or to repel invasion." Section 16 of article 4 of our Constitution provides that "the governor shall appoint all commissioned officers of the state militia, including an adjutant general for the state. The adjutant general shall be the chief officer of the governor's staff, with the rank of major-general. His duties and compensation shall be prescribed by law." Section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution provides that "the governor shall be commander-in-chief of the military forces of the state, except when they shall be called into the service of the United States."

From these provisions of our organic law it will be seen that that instrument recognizes and provides for the militia as a state institution, of which the chief executive of the state is made the commander in chief, and it is designated therein as being "the militia of the state," and every able-bodied male inhabitant of the state, regardless of the county of his residence, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, who are citizens of the United States, or who have declared their intention to become citizens thereof, are made members thereof; and it is made the duty of the legislature to provide by law for the proper discipline thereof, and, as part and parcel thereof, to encourage volunteer corps. The arms with which they are equipped is also recognized as being the public property of the state. The provisions of § 2 of said article 14, providing for the state militia, also seems to contemplate that the legislature may, from the body of the militia of the state, supply a guard for the state prison. If the state prison were fixedly established in any particular county, and a company of state militia were organized in such county exclusively of residents thereof, and such company were assigned to duty as a guard for such state prison, there could be no question but that the expense of housing and maintenance of such guard would be properly chargeable to the state. And this duty of acting as a guard for the state prison seems to be contemplated by the Constitution as being one of the functions of the militia of the state. Their other functions and duties are summarized in § 4 of article 14, above quoted, as being subject to the call, not of a county or any local official, but of the governor, to preserve the public peace, to execute the laws of the state, to suppress insurrection, or to repel invasion, not confined in any particular county or locality, but anywhere within the borders of the state. In a democratic form of government like ours the military establishment may be said to be the dernier ressort of governmental authority, that is never called upon except when all other civil authority fails and becomes powerless to preserve public order. It is the strong arm of, and represents the might of, governmental sovereignty, and is a power that should never be surrendered to an agency of the state, such as a county or municipality, but should be held, as our Constitution seems to contemplate, subject to be wielded solely by the supreme sovereign arm of the state. Said chapter 4684, Laws 1899, entitled "An Act to Provide for and Encourage the Organization of a Corps of Volunteer Militia for Service as a Land Force," etc., provides that there shall be organized in this state, for service as a land force, a body of militia composed of such able-bodied males between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, that are citizens of the United States, as may volunteer and take the oath of enlistment. It provides further that the applicant for enlistment shall be physically examined, and shall take an oath of enlistment, and the certificate of physical fitness and oath of enlistment shall be forwarded promptly to the adjutant general by the commander of the organization in which the applicant enlists. It provides further that the body of the militia thus enlisting shall be known as the "Florida state troops," and shall be the first to be called into service by the commander-in-chief to preserve the public peace, to execute the laws of this state, to suppress insurrection, or to repel invasions, and shall be the first troops subject to any call of the President of the United States for the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. Section 4 of the same act provides that the governor shall be the commander in chief of such Florida state troops, and shall appoint all commissioned officers thereof, including an adjutant general, and all officers so appointed shall hold office for four years. Section 40 of said act provides that the state troops, or any portion thereof, when called out to aid the civil authorities, shall be considered for the time being in actual service, and shall be governed by such articles, rules, and regulations as may be promulgated by the adjutant general for the government and discipline of the state troops. Section 42 of said act provides that "when an invasion of, or insurrection in, the state is made or threatened, or whenever there exists a riot, mob, unlawful assembly, breach of the peace, or resistance to the execution of the laws of the state, or imminent danger thereof, and the civil authorities are unable to suppress the same, it shall be the duty of the commander-in-chief, or, in case he cannot be reached and the emergency will not admit of awaiting his orders, it shall be the duty of the adjutant general, to issue an order to the officer in command of the nearest body of state troops, commanding such officer to call out the troops under his command, and to proceed with all possible promptness to suppress the same." From this and the other provisions of law, statute and organic, referred to and quoted, it will be seen that the only duty or function that a body of state troops can be called upon, or are under any duty, to perform, in any given county, is dependent in such county upon the happening there of any of the extraordinary contingencies that justify resort to military force, and their duties and functions are not confined exclusively to the county where its individual members reside, but can be called into play in any other county of the state wherever the same contingency may arise. No body of the state militia, in other words, has any prescribed function or duty to perform exclusively in or for any particular county in the state that it is not under equal obligation to perform in or for any other county of the state wherever the exigency may arise for its exercise. And whenever and wherever it is so called upon to act, it is there as the representative of the state's supreme sovereignty, and not as that of the county in which it acts. The place of residence of its individual members has nothing whatever to do with fixing its status either as a state or county institution. The conclusion reached is that the militia of the state, and every part thereof, is essentially and necessarily a state institution, or, rather, an arm of the state government, resort to which can only be had upon the failure of all other governmental authority; and that it can be, and should be, in the very nature of things, wielded only by the supreme sovereign power of the state; that it is in no sense such a county institution or establishment as that any particular county can exclusively be either authorized or required to impose taxes for its, or any part of its, maintenance. It is essentially a state institution, taxation for the support and maintenance of which can be imposed only by the state, and, when so imposed, such taxation is required by § 1 of article 9 of our Constitution to be at a uniform and equal rate upon all the taxable property throughout the state, and cannot for such purpose be confined to or burdened upon the property in any one county, to the exclusion of any or all of the other counties of the state. Hubbard v. Fitzsimmons, 57 Ohio St. 436, 49 N. E. 477; Wasson v. Wayne County, 49 Ohio St. 622, 17 L. R. A. 795, 32 N. E. 472; Sanborn v. Rice County, 9 Minn. 273, Gil. 258; Taylor, McBean, & Co. v. Chandler, 9 Heisk. 349, 24 Am. Rep. 308; Stetson v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 272, 7 Am. Dec. 145; Hutchinson v. Ozark Land Co. 57 Ark. 554, 22 S. W. 173; Jackson County v. State, 155 Ind. 604, 58 N. E. 1037.

It follows from what has been said that § 27 of chapter 4684, Laws enacted in 1899, imposing the duty upon the board of county commissioners in each county in which there is a company or battery of state troops to provide each company or battery with an armory for its meetings and drills and the safe storage of its arms and equipments, violates the provisions of §§ 1 and 5 of article 9 of our Constitution, and is, therefore, null and void.

The judgment of the court below is hereby affirmed at the cost of the plaintiffs in error.

Carter, J., concurring:

I concur fully in the conclusion reached by the chief justice, that a county cannot be compelled under Laws 1899, chap. 4684, § 27, to erect an armory for the use of a company of state troops organized therein. In reaching this conclusion, I have given due weight to the legislative construction of the Constitution of 1868, and that of 1885, as evidenced by the various acts of that body from 1868 up to the present time, imposing the duty upon the several counties of providing armories for companies located therein; and I also recognize the rule that, if the constitutionality of an act is doubtful, the doubt must be resolved in favor of the act. A careful consideration of the question has, however, convinced me that a proper construction of the Constitution requires us to hold that the power does not reside in the legislature to compel a county to provide an armory under the circumstances of the present case. It may be admitted that the legislature possesses unlimited power over the counties, which are merely governmental agencies of the state, unless restrained by express or implied limitations in the Constitution, and that, to deny the power, the court must find the limitation in that instrument. I am not prepared to say that most, if not all, "state purposes" are not also county purposes in a sense, but I think it would not be questioned that if the state capitol, or a state prison, or the state asylum, or institution for the blind and deaf, or a state college or university, or any other state institution, were located in a particular county, an act of the legislature requiring the county in which it was located, either alone or in conjunction with a number of other counties less than the whole, to pay for the erection or maintenance in whole or in part of such state institution, would be unconstitutional, though it is apparent that such institution would in a sense be a county purpose, and would greatly enhance property values in and otherwise benefit the county where located. These and all other state institutions are properly and primarily "state purposes," to be erected and maintained from the state revenues, which must, under §§ 1 and 2, article 9, be derived by means of a uniform and equal rate of taxation upon all the taxable property throughout the state, and to require one or more counties to build or maintain them would clearly violate that constitutional rule of taxation, even though such institutions are in a sense county purposes, and particular counties may derive special benefits from them. The state troops under the laws now in force is such a state institution; companies are organized in the several counties, without reference to the wishes or desires of such counties, by state militia officers, and without reference to the necessities for military protection of the particular counties in which they are organized. The number of companies is limited to less than the number of counties in the state, and one county may have more than one company. The members of a company are not required to be citizens of the same county, nor are the companies organized or stationed in those counties only which need the police protection of the military. In a word, the law looks to the organization of a state force, for the protection of the entire state and every part thereof, and not of county forces for the protection of the counties. If the military is needed, the nearest company is called upon, but each company can be required to go to any part of the state when needed. Jackson county no doubt derives an incidental benefit from the fact that it has a military company within its borders, the mere presence of which tends to prevent lawlessness and to the security of the property of its citizens, but Calhoun, Washington, Holmes, and other adjoining counties derive the same kind of benefit from the presence in Jackson county of such company, though in a less degree, yet they are not required to contribute to the expense of an armory for the use of such company. If Jackson county can be taxed to provide the armory, and in addition pay its share of the taxes required by the state to enable the latter to pay other expenses incident to the maintenance of the company, while the other counties mentioned are required to contribute only to the general tax levied by the state, it is quite evident that the burdens laid upon those counties are much lighter than those laid upon Jackson county, and that, too, for a purpose in which all are interested and from which all derive a benefit. Sections 1 and 2, art. 9, of the Constitution, would be practically eliminated and without force if one or more counties could be compelled to assume the burdens incident to the maintenance of a state institution, in whole or in part, upon the theory that a mere incidental benefit accruing from the location of such institution within its or their borders would authorize the legislature to compel the counties to erect or maintain it, as being for county purposes. No doubt the location of the state capitol at Tallahassee is beneficial in many ways to the people of that city and the county of Leon, and that it adds greatly to the welfare and prosperity of the city and county; but I apprehend it would not be maintained by anyone that the legislature could compel that city or county to pay for the improvements now being made upon the capitol. It may be that the legislature could authorize the county of Jackson through its proper officers to provide an armory for the use of the Jackson Guards, and that the county could voluntarily provide it under such power, but that question is not involved in this case, and I express no opinion in regard to it. It may be that, if the civil authorities were unable to maintain law and order in the county without the aid of the military, the legislature could provide for organizing and stationing a company there, and compel the county to pay the expense thereof, or furnish an armory therefor; but that question is not involved, and I express no opinion as to that. The proposition in the present case is that the legislature can compel one county in the state to pay the expense of providing an armory for a state institution, to wit, a company of state troops, that happens to be located therein, without reference to the needs of such county for military protection, or its consent to the imposition of such burden. I am satisfied no such power exists, and that the decision of the court below is correct.

Mabry, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the conclusion and views of the court in this case. The sole question involved is the constitutionality of the Laws of 1899, § 27, chap. 4684 "to provide for and encourage the organization of a corps of volunteer militia for service as a land force, and to enforce the discipline therein," and to repeal certain prior laws on the subject.

The motion to quash the alternative writ is on the grounds that the section of the statute referred to is unconstitutional because in contravention of (a) § 5, art. 9, (b) §§ 20 and 21, art. 3, (c) article 14, and (d) § 16, art. 3, of the Constitution of the state. After a reference to various provisions of the Constitution, the conclusion in the opinion prepared by the chief justice is that the section of the statute referred to is in conflict with § 5, art. 9, of the Constitution, though mention is made in connection therewith of § 1 of said article. The view expressed by Mr. Justice Carter, in agreeing to the conclusion reached, is that the direct conflict of the designated section of the statute is with § 1, art. 9, of the Constitution. I will make no reference to §§ 16, 20, and 21, art. 3, as it appears they have exerted no influence in the conclusion reached.

The 5th section of article 9 of the Constitution provides, in reference to county taxation, that the legislature shall authorize the several counties in the state to assess and impose taxes for county purposes, and for no other purposes. The limitation contained in this section is on the power of the legislature to authorize counties to levy taxes for other than county purposes. If the authorized tax is for a county purpose, then there is no limitation so far as this section is concerned. The Constitution does not undertake to define what are "county purposes," and, as said by this court in Stockton v. Powell, 29 Fla. 1, 15 L. R. A. 42, 10 So. 688, the authorities have formulated no generally accepted definition of such purposes, but leave each case involving the question to be decided as it may arise. In Cotten v. Leon County, 6 Fla. 610, this court said, in construing a similar constitutional provision, "that the Constitution does not attempt to give a definition to the term 'county purpose,' and to obtain a correct interpretation of that phrase we must look to the contemporaneous legislation upon that subject, and the uniform action of the county courts under the territorial government." And in Stockton v. Powell it is said: "In somewhat the same strain Judge Cooley, in treating of what constitute public purposes for which taxation may be laid, says in his work on Taxation, 2d ed. p. 116, that in deciding whether in a given case the object for which the taxes are assessed is public or private, the courts must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support, and for the proper use, of the government, whether state or municipal; that whatever lawfully pertains to this, and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people, may well be held to belong to the public use, and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation." It was held in that case that the act of the legislature authorizing Duval county to issue bonds to improve the navigation of the St. Johns river was valid, although the river was a navigable stream and public highway running from its mouth in the county hundreds of miles beyond its limits through other counties, and commerce was carried on it from other states and foreign countries, and the commerce or business on the river confined within the limits of Duval county was very small and of no importance. The cases of Skinner v. Henderson, 26 Fla. 121, 8 L. R. A. 55, 7 So. 404, and Duval County v. Jacksonville, 36 Fla. 196, 29 L. R. A. 416, 18 So. 339, recognized the authority of the legislature to direct the application of funds raised by county taxation to objects that were embraced within the term "county purposes," though such objects might also include in part other purposes. In the case of Cotten v. Leon County, 6 Fla. 610, it was held that neither the locality of the work nor the anticipated benefit is of itself a certain test, but as furnishing a general rule the concurrence of the two would seem to be required. The views expressed in Nichol v. Nashville, 9 Humph. 252, were approved, to the effect that the improvements must have some connection with the corporate town claiming them as a corporate purpose more direct than that which would result from the general increase of prosperity of the country by reason of such improvement made without a direct reference to or connection with the town. In the case of Hamilton County v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109, a case characterized by Judge Dillon, as observed by this court in Stockton v. Powell, as one in which the distinction between cities and towns, or municipal corporations proper, and involuntary quasi corporations, such as counties, is very clearly drawn, it is said: "A county organization is created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large, for purposes of political organization and civil administration, in matters of finance, of education, of provision for the poor, of military organization, of the means of travel and transport, and especially for the general administration of justice. With scarcely an exception, all the powers and functions of the county organization have a direct and exclusive reference to the general policy of the state, and are in fact but a branch of the general administration of that policy." The word "county" signifies the same as "shire,"—"county being derived from the French, and shire from the Saxon. Both these words signify a circuit or portion of the realm into which the whole land is divided for the better government thereof and the more easy administration of justice." 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. Rawle's Revision, p. 450. It is the settled rule of constitutional construction in this court that, if there is a reasonable doubt as to the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, it should, in deference to the legislative judgment, be upheld, and this rule of construction should apply especially to a legislative declaration of what is a county purpose. Duval County v. Jacksonville, 36 Fla. 196, 29 L. R. A. 416, 18 So. 339; State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 So. 767. In view of these authorities and the past legislation in this state, I do not think it should be held that the section of the statute in question is in conflict with the 5th section of article 9 of our Constitution. The 2d section of article 14 ordains that "the legislature may provide by law for organizing and disciplining the militia of the state, for the encouragement of volunteer corps, the safe keeping of the public arms, and for a guard for the state prison." All able-bodied male inhabitants of the state between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, that are citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become such, are constituted the militia of the state, and subject to military duty. They are ascertained and enrolled by the county authorities in each county. The Laws of 1899 (chap. 4684) provide for a volunteer organization to consist of not more than two regiments of infantry of twelve companies each, and one battalion of artillery of four batteries of field artillery, to be known as the "Florida state troops." The organization under it is by the commander-in-chief, and based in part upon the volunteer organizations existing under prior laws. Of the existing organizations, two regiments of three battalions each, one to contain four companies, and the others three companies each, were to be organized, and the additional companies provided for were to be added at such times as the commander-in-chief might deem advisable. At no time could the enrolled militia organize and become a part of the volunteer corps of state troops at will, but the organization and admission of a military company into such body have been under the control and direction of the commander-in-chief. The policy of the state, as evinced by the course of action in reference to voluntary organizations, is to enlist companies in the populous districts of the state where violence, riots, and forcible resistance to the execution of the laws are more liable to happen, and where there is the greatest need for an armed force. When an organized company has been accepted and duly admitted into the body of state troops, it may be required to do service in the preservation of the peace, the execution of the laws, and the suppression of insurrections and invasions. The 42d section of the act provides that "when an invasion of, or insurrection in, the state is made or threatened, or whenever there exists a riot, mob, unlawful assembly, breach of the peace, or resistance to the execution of the laws of the state, or imminent danger thereof, and the civil authorities are unable to suppress the same, it shall be the duty of the commander-in-chief, or, in case he cannot be reached, and the emergency will not admit of awaiting his orders, it shall be the duty of the adjutant general, to issue an order to the officer in command of the nearest body of state troops, commanding such officer to call out the troops under his command and proceed with all possible promptness to suppress the same." But it is contended that such services are rendered for the state, and, the military organization rendering them being a part of a state institution, the burden of maintaining and supporting it devolves upon the state at large. If it be conceded that the construction of local armories in counties for the use of volunteer companies therein is a county as well as a state purpose (and clearly the suppression of riots, mobs, the preservation of the peace, and assistance in the execution of the laws subserve county organizations and purposes), there is nothing in § 5, art. 9, of the Constitution to prevent county taxation to accomplish it. The only limitation therein is in the power of the legislature to authorize county taxation for other than county purposes, and, conceding such purpose, the power exists. If the building of local armories in the counties in which military companies exist is exclusively a state institution, and one of the general charges of the state government for the maintenance of which taxes should be imposed as equally as possible on all the property of the state, the prohibition against county taxation to build them is to be found in § 1 of the 9th article. But I do not think that a local armory constructed by a county in its limits for the use of a volunteer military company domiciled therein is a state institution. The provision held to be unconstitutional makes it the duty of the county commissioners of any county in which there is a military company of state troops to provide each company with an armory suitable for its meetings and drill and the safe storage of its arms. This armory is for the use in the county by a company in aid of its efficiency for prompt and effective service, and is not made the property of the state, or subject to the control of state authorities. There is no purpose in the act to impose by county taxation the burden on the counties, as such, to maintain the organized militia of the state. All the expenses incident to such organizations, including those of the stated encampments of the state troops, except the building of armories in the counties, are borne by the state at large. For a period of thirty-five years the construction of such armories for use by companies in the counties has been regarded by the legislature as a county purpose. Almost contemporaneous with the Constitution of 1868, containing provisions as to military organizations similar to those found in the present revision, it was provided by the legislature that the county commissioners should provide at the cost of the counties suitable and safe armories for the volunteer companies within their respective limits. Acts 1868, § 20, chap. 1636. From that time to the present similar provisions have been kept continually on our statute books. The existence of a volunteer company in a county has a direct contact and connection with it, and affords a special and more direct protection, in case of emergency, to the lives and property of its inhabitants, than would be afforded by a company in another and possibly distant county. In view of this special benefit resulting to the counties in which companies are organized and exist, it would appear that there was ample basis for a legislative declaration that the construction of armories in a county for the use of companies therein was a county purpose. It is eminently proper and just that populous districts where lawlessness, riots, mobs, and the resistance to the laws are more apt to occur, and which demand the existence of military organizations therein, should defray the expense of providing a storage room for the arms and a meeting place for the efficient training of the men who may be called on to render their special services. Bryant v. Palmer, 152 N. Y. 412, 46 N. E. 851.

If taxes can be authorized by the counties to erect such armories, it must be on the ground of a county purpose, and if it can be authorized as such it can be enforced as a duty. Decisions in Illinois, under constitutional provisions somewhat similar to those found in article 9 of our Constitution, hold that the legislature may authorize a municipality to levy the tax, but cannot compel it to do so. These decisions are referred to in the case of Potter v. Lainhart (Fla.) 33 So. 251. It is also decided in that state that, where the tax is authorized to accomplish an object which it is the duty of the municipality in the exercise of a governmental agency to carry out, the tax may be enforced. A county is specially an agency of the state in the administration of justice and the carrying out of the objects of government, and, if the tax for armories can be permitted, it may be coerced as a duty properly imposed upon it.

The motion to quash did not question the alternative writ on the ground that the provision in reference to the construction of armories was in conflict with § 1, art. 9, of the Constitution, but, if it did, I do not think the result would be different. That section directs that the legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of taxation, which means that, when a tax for state purposes is authorized, it must be uniform and equal on all the property in the state not exempt, and when it is authorized for a county or municipal purpose it must rest uniformly and equally upon all the taxable property in the county or municipality respectively. Duval County v. Jacksonville, 36 Fla. 196, 29 L. R. A. 416, 18 So. 339. If the construction of an armory is a county purpose, then the tax to pay for it must rest upon all the taxable property in the county. There is no suggestion in this case that such would not be the result if the county should be compelled to build the armory.

This is an outline of my views, without further discussion of the authorities, or a distinguishing of those cited in the opinion, which I think are not sufficient when properly applied to support the conclusion reached.

Rehearing not allowed.

v.

STATE of Florida.

(.....Fla.....)

- *1. The mere separation of jurors impaneled to try a capital case, from their fellows, without the attendance of an officer, although an irregularity, is not a sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict, if the court is satisfied that the prisoner has not sustained any injury from such separation. But where there has been an improper separation during such trial, if the verdict is against the prisoner he is entitled to the benefit of a presumption that the irregularity has been prejudicial to him, and the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to show to the entire satisfaction of the court that the prisoner has suffered no injury by reason of the separation. Contrary dicta in State v. Madoil, 12 Fla. 151, disapproved.
2. If intoxicants be shown to have been used by the jury impaneled in a capital case, the presumption arises in favor of the convicted defendant that it resulted injuriously to him; and the burden is on the state to show affirmatively, to the entire satisfaction of the court, that their use was to such a limited and moderate extent as completely and satisfactorily to negative any harm to the defendant from its use by the jury, or any member of it.

(October 7, 1902.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Dade County to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. A. Thrasher, for plaintiff in error:

The separation of the jury that tried this case was so flagrant and gross a violation of the law and rights of the prisoner that the court should have granted a new trial.

Thompson & M. Juries, § 313; State v. Madoil, 12 Fla. 159; Coker v. Merritt, 16 Fla. 426; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 375.

The use of intoxicants by a jury is ground for new trial.

Ryan v. Harrow, 27 Iowa, 494, 1 Am. Rep. 307; Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 496, 9 Am. Rep. 760; People v. Gray, 61 Cal. 164, 44 Am. Rep. 549.

In a capital case the burden of proof is upon the state to show that there was no chance for anyone to tamper with the jury.

State v. Madoil, 12 Fla. 151.

Mr. William B. Lamar, Attorney General, for the State.

Taylor, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, David Gamble, was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced for the crime of murder in the first degree at the spring term, 1902, of the circuit court for Dade county, and comes here by writ of error.

The only question presented here is the propriety of the denial of the defendant's motion for new trial, upon the fifth and sixth grounds thereof, as follows:

"(5) Because the jury that was impaneled to try, and did try, this case, were not, during said trial and consideration of this case, so guarded or protected as the law requires, either by the sheriff or bailiff, as to prevent said jury or protect them from improper communications or instructions."

"(6) That the said jury were allowed during the trial of the case to separate and absent themselves from the presence of each other and from the presence of the bailiff, and individual members of the jury were allowed to talk and converse with other persons who were not members of the jury, said person or juror so conversing not being at the time in the presence of the members of the jury, or in the presence of the bailiff, sheriff, or other officer; that the place where said jury ate and slept during the time of the trial and consideration of this case was at the hotel known as the 'Everglade,' one of the leading hotels of the city of Miami, Dade county, and located several blocks from the courthouse; that much of the time was spent at and about said hotel, during which time various members of the jury would separate or absent themselves from the jury as a body, some being in the porch of the hotel, some in the hall, some in the toilet room, and some in the yard, during which time the said several members of the jury, or those who desired, could, and some did, converse with persons not members of the jury; that said jury at night occupied different rooms in said hotel, to wit, three rooms, there being four jurymen to each room."

In the case of State v. Madoil, 12 Fla. 151, which was a trial for larceny, it is said: "In trials for offenses punished capitally, where one or more of the jury separate from their fellows, we think it should be shown that the separation was from urgent necessity, and that no opportunity was offered for any improper or undue influence. In such cases the conduct of the absent juror should be subjected to the most rigid scrutiny, in order to ascertain if it was blameless while separated from his fellows; and the verdict should only be allowed to stand when the prosecution can show that there was no opportunity to tamper with the juror, or to influence him in finding his verdict." This rule, we think, indulges too strong a presumption against the integrity of the jurors, and is too favorable to the accused in such cases, as it makes the integrity of the verdict dependent solely upon the existence of an opportunity for an improper tampering with a juror, whether such opportunity was utilized, or not, by anyone in any manner. Besides this, what was said in that case as to the rule governing the separation of jurors in capital cases was obiter dicta, as the court was not dealing with a capital case, but one of larceny only. In the case of Bird v. State, 18 Fla. 60 L. R. A.

493, it is said that "where it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that there was no misconduct upon the part of the jurors, and it is so certified by the court in the bill of exceptions, the mere separation of the jury is not a sufficient ground for a new trial." The Bird Case was one for murder, and it recognizes the propriety of the rule that, even though there may be an opportunity for the exertion of improper influences upon the jurors, yet the bare fact of such opportunity, without resultant harm to the accused, is not enough to avoid the verdict. The correct rule, as we think, deducible from these and other cases, is that the mere separation of jurors impaneled to try a capital case, from their fellows, without the attendance of an officer, although an irregularity, is not a sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict, if the court is satisfied that the prisoner has not sustained any injury from such separation. But where there has been an improper separation during such trial, if the verdict is against the prisoner, he is entitled to the benefit of a presumption that the irregularity has been prejudicial to him, and the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to show to the entire satisfaction of the court that the prisoner has suffered no injury by reason of the separation. See State v. Cucuel, 31 N. J. L. 249.

The facts, in brief, disclosed by the examination of the jurors, bailiff, sheriff, and others, in this case, are, in substance, as follows: The jury, in charge of a bailiff, took their meals and slept at a hotel in the town of Miami, where the trial was had. They occupied three adjoining rooms on the upper floor of said hotel, and were the sole occupants of that floor; the bailiff in charge staying there with them. In passing to and fro between the courtroom and hotel they did not keep compactly together, but straggled somewhat, and such straggling also occurred while they were about the hotel; but on such occasions they were all in view of the bailiff. At the hotel some of them would loiter in the halls, and on one or two occasions while so loitering would speak a few words to some girls who were staying there. When they would come into the hotel from the courthouse, they would all repair to a small washroom of the hotel, too small to accommodate them all at once; and, as one batch of them would get through bathing, they would step outside and wait just outside the door, under a tree, until the others got through; the bailiff the while having all of them practically in his view. On one occasion one of the jurors got up from the dining table during meal time, and went upstairs alone to their rooms, for the purpose of getting his handkerchief, and remained away several minutes. The bailiff went after him, leaving the rest of the jury unattended at the dining table, but met him on the stairs, and returned immediately with him to the rest of the jury in the dining room. On one occasion, at a late hour in the night, one of the jurors being sick, the bailiff and another juror got up and went out of the hotel, and into the town with him, and saw a doctor, and from the doctor went to a drug store, and immediately back to their rooms at the hotel; the rest of the jury being left meantime unattended and unconfined in their rooms at the hotel. On another occasion, while the jury, in a body, were walking past the barber shop of one of their number, they stopped while the owner of the shop went in and gave some business directions to his assistants in charge of the shop. The jury were also taken in body to the postoffice to get their mail, but none of them received any letters or other communications that had anything to do with the case. On one occasion an outside party was permitted by the bailiff, after exhibiting two telegrams to the bailiff, to show them to one of the jurors in the presence of the others. These telegrams were entirely foreign to the case on trial, and were from commission firms in two distant cities in other states, relative exclusively to the sale and shipment of tomatoes for the juror to whom the telegrams were shown.

While the motion for new trial was not based upon the use of intoxicants by the jury during the trial, yet it appeared from their examination that they procured and had in their rooms at the hotel ten or a dozen bottles of lager beer, a pint and half pint flasks of whisky, and a regular bottle of whisky, during the time of the trial. The proofs showed that of this they drank very sparingly and moderately; none of them being at any time the slightest bit intoxicated from its use; half of the full bottle of whisky being left unconsumed at the close of the trial. This liquor, it appears, was procured at the expense of the jurors themselves; they contributing money for its purchase. While these irregularities and separations on the part of the jury were shown by their own statements to have occurred, yet we think that it was also affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that nothing occurred from it to influence the verdict, and that no harm resulted therefrom to the defendant. It was affirmatively shown that, in all the separations of the jury, no communication in reference to the case was had between them and any outside party, and that none of them heard anything tending to influence their verdict; that none of them conversed with anyone in reference to the case; neither was anything said with reference to it in their hearing; and none of them received any communications from outside in reference to the case. The use of intoxicants by the jury was also affirmatively and satisfactorily shown to have been to such a limited and moderate extent as to leave no room for any supposition that harm resulted therefrom to the defendant. As to the use of intoxicating liquors by juries in capital trials, practically the same rule applies that appertains to separations by the jury in such cases. If intoxicants be shown to have been used by the jury, the presumption arises in favor of the convicted defendant that it resulted injuriously to him, and the burden is on the state to show 60 L. R. A. affirmatively, to the entire satisfaction of the court, that its use was to such a limited and moderate extent as to completely and satisfactorily negative any harm to the defendant from its use by the jury, or any member of it. Jones v. People, 6 Colo. 452, 45 Am. Rep. 526; Jones v. State, 68 Ga. 760. The conduct of both the bailiff in charge of the jury in this case and of the jurors themselves was highly irregular, and unbecoming the proper and decorous conduct of the trial of a citizen for his life, for all of which misconduct on the part of the bailiff and the jurors they should, at least, have been severely reprimanded by the court, if not more severely dealt with; but, in consonance with the rule of law above announced, it having been affirmatively and satisfactorily shown, as we think, that no harm resulted to the defendant from such irregularities and misconduct on the part of the jury and the bailiff in charge, we cannot disturb the verdict found.

This disposes of the only question presented either by the record or in the briefs of counsel, and, finding no reversible error, the judgment of the court below is hereby affirmed.

DUVAL COUNTY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CHARLESTON LUMBER & MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

(.....Fla.....)

*Rev. Stat. § 1666, as amended by Fla. Laws 1893, chap. 4136, which provides: "Every person who shall have brought a suit in any court of this state against any person, natural or corporate, shall have a right to a writ of garnishment under the circumstances and in the manner hereinafter provided, to subject any indebtedness due to the defendant by a third person, and any goods, moneys, chattels, or effects of the defendant in the hands, possession, or control of a third person. The officers, agents, and employees of any companies or corporations shall be, as regards such companies or corporations, third persons, and as such shall be subject to garnishment after judgment against such companies or corporations."—does not authorize a writ of garnishment against a county; and where such writ has been issued, and judgment entered against a county, the judgment is void.

(January 27, 1903.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Duval County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a garnishment proceeding to reach an asset of S. S. Leonard, which was alleged to be in the hands of the county. Reversed.

*Headnote by HOCKER, J.

NOTE.—As to liability of county to garnishment, see also State ex rel. Summersfield v. Tyler (Wash.) 37 L. R. A. 207, and note.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George U. Walker for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Fleming & Fleming for defendant in error.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was taken up and considered by division B, and, there being a difference of opinion among the members thereof, the cause was referred to the court in banc for decision.

On July 6, 1896, the Charleston Lumber & Manufacturing Company filed its declaration in assumpsit against S. S. Leonard. A final judgment by default was entered against Leonard for $504.49 damages, and costs, $3.43.

On September 13, 1897, the Charleston Lumber & Manufacturing Company filed the affidavit of its attorney, F. P. Fleming, Jr., as a basis for garnishment, alleging a balance of $200 to be due, and a præcipe for garnishment to be directed to Duval county.

A writ of garnishment was issued, and duly served upon the chairman of the board of county commissioners of said county September 15, 1897.

On November 1, 1897, default in said garnishment proceedings was entered by the clerk against the county of Duval for want of appearance or answer.

On November 5, 1897, the clerk issued a writ of scire facias to said garnishee, notifying it that in the suit of the Charleston Lumber & Manufacturing Company against S. S. Leonard default had been entered against it as garnishee, and warning it to show cause December 6, 1897, why final judgment should not be entered upon said default, which writ was duly served on Duval county on the same day.

On December 6, 1897, judgment was rendered by the court and entered by the clerk, wherein and whereby the foregoing facts were recited, and a final judgment entered against Duval county as garnishee in the sum of $200.

On May 6, 1898, a writ of error from this court to the circuit court of Duval county was sued out returnable to the June term, 1898, of this court. The only error assigned is that the county of Duval is not subject to be garnished, as was done in this cause, and prays the reversal and annulment of said judgment.

Two questions are presented in the briefs of the respective parties: First, whether under the law of Florida a county is liable to be garnished; second, whether in this case the county of Duval, having permitted a default against itself for want of appearance and answer, can in this court for the first time challenge the judgment entered against it, and from which it appeals.

Section 1666 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by Laws 1893, chap. 4136, provides: "Every person who shall have brought a suit in any court of this state against any person, natural or corporate, shall have a right to a writ of garnishment under the circumstances and in the manner hereinafter provided, to subject any indebtedness due to the defendant by a third person, and any goods, moneys, chattels, or effects of the defendant in the hands, possession, or control of a third person. The officers, agents, and employees of any companies or corporations shall be, as regards such companies or corporations, third persons, and as such shall be subject to garnishment, after judgment against such companies or corporations."

Section 1, chap. 1, title 1, div. 1, of the Revised Statutes, provides: "In determining the meaning of these Revised Statutes . . . the word 'person' may extend to and be applied to a corporation."

In the case of Martin v. Townsend, 32 Fla. 318, 13 So. 887, in determining the mode in which a deed should be executed by county commissioners, this court used this language: "Boards of county commissioners are quasi corporations, and their official duties and powers partake more of the characteristics of corporate acts and powers than those of mere trustees." This language is to be understood in its relation to the matter in hand, which was the mode in which a deed should be executed by a board of county commissioners. In classifying corporations they are generally divided into public and private corporations. Says Beach on Public Corporations, vol. 1, § 2: "The difference between strictly private and strictly public corporations is obvious and radical; the former being formed by the voluntary action of the corporators between whom there exists a contract whereby each subjects his interest, with certain restrictions, to the control of the corporate management for the accomplishment of the ends for which the company was formed, and the latter not being in the same sense voluntary associations, and no contract existing between the members." Again, in § 3, Id., public corporations "are subdivided into municipal and public quasi corporations. Municipal corporations embrace incorporated cities, villages, and towns, which are full-fledged corporations with all the powers, duties, and liabilities incident to such a status, while public quasi corporations possess only a portion of the powers, duties, and liabilities of corporations. As instances of the latter class may be mentioned counties, hundreds, townships, overseers of the poor, town supervisors, school districts, and road districts."

In § 4, Id., this author further discusses the generic differences between municipal and quasi public corporations, but in the latter part of § 5 he says: "As popularly and loosely used, the term 'municipal corporation' frequently includes the public quasi corporations, such as counties, school districts," etc. It will be observed that in some of the cases hereinafter referred to the term "municipal corporation" is used as embracing counties, and, so far as the points here under consideration are concerned, they apply the same principles of law to cities and counties.

It is stated in the text-books that by the weight of authority municipal corporations (including therein counties) are not subject to garnishee process, unless the right to so subject them is conferred by clearly expressed legislation. 2 Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 1654, 1655; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 101, and note 1; Drake, Attachm. § 516. There is, however, a conflict of authority on this question, as will be seen from the foregoing authorities. The decisions on this question are very numerous, and a critical examination of each one of them would lead to great prolixity. The majority of the cases cited by Drake are against the right of garnishment. Of those cited by him in favor of the right, the case of Whidden v. Drake, 5 N. H. 13, is based on a statute which provides "that when any corporations or body politic within this state shall be possessed of any money, goods, . . . of any debtor, such corporation or body politic may be summoned as the trustee of such debtor," etc.

In Connecticut it is held that the word "corporation" embraced towns, and subjected them to garnishment process. Bray v. Wallingford, 20 Conn. 416. In the case of Adams v. Tyler, 121 Mass. 380, it is held that a county is chargeable with trustee process, inasmuch as the statute makes a county a corporation for the purpose, among others, of suing and being sued, making contracts, etc.; and inasmuch as the legislature had indicated its intent that counties should be subject to garnishee process by eliminating from the statute an exception in their favor as regards such process. In the case of Wales v. Muscatine, 4 Iowa, 302, the liability of the town to garnishment is based on the theory that the word "corporation" in the statute embraces towns, and no distinction is made between public and private corporations. In Laredo v. Nalle, 65 Tex. 359, it was held that, inasmuch as there was no statute exempting municipal corporations from garnishment process, the defendant was liable, taking into consideration the character of the debt garnished, it not being a salary. In Kentucky it seems the salaries of state officers cannot be garnished, because the state cannot be sued, and a garnishment proceeding is a suit. But the salaries of city officers can be garnished because cities can be sued. Rodman v. Musselman, 12 Bush, 354, 23 Am. Rep. 724. In Waterbury v. Deer Lodge County, 10 Mont. 515, 20 Pac. 1002, it was held that counties are subject to garnishment process because the statute makes all persons having in possession or under their control and credits or personal property, etc., of a defendant liable to garnishment process, and that the word "person" may be applied to bodies "politic and corporate," and that counties are bodies "politic and corporate." As sustaining the doctrine that a county or municipal corporation cannot be garnished unless the process is plainly authorized by statute, the following cases are cited: Mobile v. Rowland, 26 Ala. 498; Skelly v. Westminster School Dist. 103 Cal. 652, 37 Pac. 643; Holt v. Experience, 26 Ga. 113; McLellan v. Young, 60 L. R. A.

54 Ga. 399, 21 Am. Rep. 276; First Nat. Bank v. Ottawa, 43 Kan. 294, 23 Pac. 485; Switzer v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 250, 19 Pac. 620; Baltimore v. Root, 8 Md. 95, 63 Am. Dec. 696; Merwin v. Chicago, 45 Ill. 133, 92 Am. Dec. 204; Wallace v. Lawyer, 54 Ind. 501, 23 Am. Rep. 661; McDougal v. Hennepin County, 4 Minn. 184, Gil. 130; Dollman v. Moore, 70 Miss. 267, 19 L. R. A. 222, 12 So. 23; Hawthorn v. St. Louis, 11 Mo. 59, 47 Am. Dec. 141; People ex rel. Spaun v. Omaha, 2 Neb. 166; State ex rel. Crawford v. Eberly, 12 Neb. 616, 12 N. W. 96; Memphis v. Laski, 9 Heisk. 511, 24 Am. Rep. 327; Chamberlain v. Watters, 10 Utah, 298, 37 Pac. 566; VanCott v. Pratt, 11 Utah, 209, 39 Pac. 827; Merrill v. Campbell, 49 Wis. 535, 35 Am. Rep. 785, 5 N. W. 912; Stermer v. LaPlata County, 5 Colo. App. 379, 38 Pac. 839; Mesa County v. Brown Bros. 6 Colo. App. 43, 39 Pac. 989; Porter & B. Hardware Co. v. Perdue, 105 Ala. 293, 16 So. 713; State ex rel. Summerfield v. Tyler, 14 Wash. 495, 37 L. R. A. 207, note, 45 Pac. 31. Several of the foregoing cases hold that statutes authorizing garnishment proceedings against corporations do not apply to public, but only to private, corporations. The reasoning of these authorities is summarized in that of the court in McDougal v. Hennepin County, 4 Minn. 184, Gil. 130. The garnishment law "which authorizes 'corporations to be proceeded against as garnishees in the same manner and with like effect as individuals,' . . . applies only to private corporations, and was not designed to include municipal corporations charged with the interests of the public. Counties are public corporations, and their officers are public officers. The varied relations which such bodies, through their officers, hold towards individuals as their debtors, would render them liable to be constantly attacked with such process, and would very materially embarrass them in the performance of their official duties. If they are subject to such suits, they are bound to give them the same attention which is required of private individuals; and this would involve their attendance upon distant courts, and the consequent absence from respective . . . offices." It might be added that it would also subject them to the payment of attorneys' fees, and in some instances costs. It can readily be seen that in large counties, where the public interests required the employment of a considerable number of persons, a liability to garnishment would be highly injurious to the public interests. Public corporations such as counties are created for the care and promotion of public interests, and should not, from motives of public policy, be subjected to the liability of becoming involved in the disputes of private persons, or be made the instrumentalities for collecting private debts. Admitting that the word "person," used in the garnishment statute (Laws 1893, chap. 4136), "may extend to and be applied to a corporation," as provided in § 1, chap. 1, title 1, div. 1, of the Revised Statutes, yet, under the authority of the decisions cited, it cannot be held to include public quasi corporations, such as counties. Our conclusion is that a county is not liable to the process of garnishment.

The next and only other question to be determined is whether, by failing to appear or answer the garnishment process and permitting a default judgment against itself, it waived the right to contest in this court the judgment appealed from.

The defendant in error contends that the exemption from garnishment proceedings claimed by the plaintiff in error cannot be raised for the first time in this court. In support of this view the following Florida cases are cited: Parker v. Hendry, 8 Fla. 53; Summis v. L'Engle, 19 Fla. 800; Peck v. Spencer, 26 Fla. 23, 7 So. 642; Livingston v. Webster, 26 Fla. 325, 8 So. 442; Jacksonville & A. R. Co. v. Woodworth, 26 Fla. 368, 8 So. 177; Waddell v. Cunningham, 27 Fla. 477, 8 So. 643; Logan v. Slade, 28 Fla. 699, 10 So. 25. In all of these cases the parties were before the court below, and in none of them was the question attempted to be raised in this court of a jurisdictional nature. Moreover, none of these cases involved a garnishment proceeding.

It is generally held in this country that garnishment is a purely statutory proceeding, and cannot be pushed in its operation beyond the statutory authority under which it is resorted to. Drake, Attachm. § 451 (a); 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 809. In Mississippi, a county, if its board of supervisors object, cannot be garnished, either at law or in equity. If the county does not object to the garnishment, the debtor cannot. It is held that the courts have jurisdiction of a garnishment against a county, but must sustain an objection made by the board of supervisors, the board being the judge whether or not the proceeding will restrict the performance of its public functions. McBain v. Rodgers (Miss.) 29 So. 91; Dollar v. Allen-West Commission Co. 78 Miss. 274, 28 So. 876; Dollman v. Moore, 70 Miss. 267, 19 L. R. A. 222, 12 So. 23. In Las Animas County v. Bond, 3 Colo. 411, the court decided that generally, and upon considerations of public policy, a municipal corporation is not subject to garnishment. The exemption may, however, be waived by appearance and submission to liability. "Here the judgment expressly recites that no one appeared on behalf of the board of county commissioners. Whether process was served on the board or not is unimportant. If it did not appear and waive the exemption, no valid judgment could be given." In the case of Van Cott v. Pratt, 11 Utah, 209, 39 Pac. 827, it was held that Salt Lake City, a municipality, could not, by ordinance, waive the exemption from liability to garnishment process. The same doctrine is announced in Porter & B. Hardware Co. v. Perdue, 105 Ala. 293, 16 So. 713. In State ex rel. Summerfield v. Tyler, 14 Wash. 495, 37 L. R. A. 207, 45 Pac. 31, the court holds that a county is not liable to garnishment unless made so by express statutory provision; that a statute naming corporations among those subject to garnishment does not apply to a county; and that a judgment against a county as garnishee defendant, when the statutes do not make a county subject to garnishment process, is void on collateral attack. The court says: "If the process served upon the county was one which was not authorized by the statute, no rights could be obtained by such service. If it commanded the county to do that which, under the statute, it had no right to do, it was without force."

The contention by defendant in error that, because a county can be sued, it is, therefore, liable to garnishment, is met in several of the cases which have been cited, and especially in the last one, and the holding is adverse to the contention in all of them except one or two. In our view, by the great weight of authority, and upon principles of public policy, a county is not, in this state, subject to garnishee process, and no valid judgment can be rendered against it in such a proceeding.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed.

Carter, J., dissenting:

On August 22, 1896, defendant in error obtained judgment in the circuit court of Duval county against S. S. Leonard for $504.49, and on September 13, 1897, after complying with the requirements of the garnishment statutes, caused to be issued and served upon the county of Duval a writ of garnishment, alleging in the affidavit therefor that $200 remained due on the judgment. The county failed to appear, in consequence of which a default was entered, and thereafter a scire facias was duly issued to it, and served as required by the statute. Thereafter, on December 6, 1897, the county having failed to show cause, as required by the scire facias, the court rendered judgment against it in the sum of $200. From such judgment the county sued out this writ of error on May 6, 1898. The only error assigned is "that the said county is not subject to be garnished, as was done in said cause." It is conceded in the brief that the judgment is valid and binding unless the law is that "a county—quasi a municipal corporation—is not liable to garnishment." This proposition is the only one argued or insisted upon for reversal of the judgment.

The writ of garnishment has from the earliest period of the territorial history of this state been authorized by statutes enacted from time to time to subject indebtedness due defendants by other persons, and goods, moneys, chattels, or effects of such defendants in the hands of such persons, to the payment of judgments against them upon application of judgment creditors. See Acts 1822, p. 14; Duval, Comp. § 17, p. 11; Thomp. Dig. p. 371. In 1845 the remedy was extended to plaintiffs in attachment even before judgment obtained (McClellan's Dig., § 12, p. 550), and in 1861 it was extended to every plaintiff in every suit before as well as after judgment obtained (§ 14, p. 551, Id.). By Laws 1887, chap. 3738, the remedy was extended so as to reach money and property of railroad companies in the hands of their officers, employees, or agents. By Acts 1893, chap. 4136, the remedy was further extended so as to authorize garnishments to issue to officers, agents, and employees of "any companies or corporations" after judgment against them. By Acts 1901, chap. 4973, the writ is authorized to subject to decrees for alimony "all moneys or other things due to any person or public officer, state or county," whether the money or other thing is due for the salary, personal labor, or service of such person or otherwise. Act 1845, chap. 43, § 1, authorized the writ of garnishment to issue against "any person or persons other than the defendant" who were indebted to or who had any of the effects or property of defendant "in his, her, or their hands or possession or control." This act became the basis of Rev. Stat. § 1666, which, both before and after it was amended by Acts 1893, chap. 4136, provides that "every person who shall have brought a suit in any court of this state against any person, natural or corporate, shall have the right to a writ of garnishment under the circumstances and in the manner hereinafter provided to subject any indebtedness due to the defendant by a third person and any goods, chattels, money, effects, or credits of the defendant in the hands, possession, or control of a third person." I refer to these various statutes to show that the legislature has steadily extended the remedy by garnishment, and, as they are remedial statutes, they ought to be interpreted so as to carry out the evident purpose of the legislature, which was to extend to creditors complete remedies for subjecting to their demands every species of the property of their debtors liable for debt. The only statutory exemption from garnishment or statutory prohibition of its employment is that found in Rev. Stat. § 2008, compiled from Acts 1875, chap. 2065, to the effect that no writ of garnishment shall issue to attach or delay payment of any money or other thing due to any person who is the head of a family, when the money or thing is due for the personal labor or services of such person.

Counties are, and have been from the earliest period, recognized as political subdivisions of the state. The present Constitution recognizes and provides for such political subdivisions, and provides for county commissioners and other officials of the several counties. By Laws 1872, chap. 1882, it was provided that the county commissioners should "represent the county in the prosecution and defense of all legal causes." Rev. Stat. § 578. It may be conceded that this statute did not extend to counties the writ of garnishment theretofore provided for, but in 1881 another act was passed, which, as subsequently incorporated into the Revised Statutes, provides that "the county commissioners of the several counties shall sue and be sued in the name of the county of which they are commissioners." It further provides that a change in the persons composing the board shall not abate the suit, but that it may be proceeded with as if such change had not taken place. While this legislation may not constitute them corporations, strictly speaking, it does recognize them as distinct entities capable of suing and of being sued in like manner as corporations. The word "person" in the garnishment laws does not mean natural persons only, but evidently embraces artificial entities, who are by law capable of suing or being sued, and of contracting indebtedness, or of holding property belonging to another. And I take it that this was so before the rule of interpretation that the word "person" may be construed to mean "corporation," which exists independently of legislation, was incorporated into § 1 of the Revised Statutes. Portsmouth Gas Co. v. Sanford, 97 Va. 124, 45 L. R. A. 246, 33 S. E. 516. Now, garnishment is a suit. Counties are capable of suing or being sued, and of owing debts, and perhaps of holding possession of the "property, money, or effects" of others. They are, therefore, "persons" or "corporations" within the meaning of the garnishment laws, unless some good reason exists for excluding them. Nearly, if not all, of the authorities which hold that counties and municipal corporations cannot be garnished, admit that under legislation like ours the language of the statutes is broad enough to cover them, but that by reason of public policy the general language will be restrained so as not to embrace them. If, therefore, there exists in this state no public policy forbidding the garnishment of a municipal corporation or county, the courts are not justified in writing an exception into the statute; and, if there is a public policy, the exception ought logically to extend no further than that public policy requires it to be extended. Respectable courts have differed as to the existence in particular states of a public policy that would require them to exempt from the general language of garnishment statutes municipal corporations or counties. Those which admit such a public policy do not agree upon its extent; some holding that it requires a complete exemption, others that it applies only to exempt cases, where the writ will cause embarrassment to the municipality or county in the performance of its governmental functions, or to its officers in such performance. It must not be forgotten that the exemption of such municipalities or counties from garnishment necessarily exempts the funds or property in their hands from the debts so long as it remains due from or in the hands of such municipalities. A party may, under such a rule, be the creditor of a county for thousands of dollars by purchasing indebtedness against it, or becoming its creditor by investing in its securities or otherwise, and this indebtedness is effectually shielded from the grasp of his creditors by reason of their inability to sue, and even though it largely exceeds the sum which the Constitution exempts from his debts, leaving the creditor absolutely powerless to subject the excess. If there is a public policy in allowing this injustice, when to require the county to pay the money to the creditor under garnishment proceedings will not interfere in the slightest with its governmental functions, I am unable to see it. The counties of this state owe thousands of dollars, evidenced by warrants, fines, and forfeiture scrip, bonds, and other evidences of debt. Duval, Hillsborough, Dade, and other counties have hundreds of thousands of dollars in bonds issued to secure money for various purposes; and to say that owners of these bonds hold them exempt from their debts is a proposition shocking to our sense of justice; and yet such must be so if the county is exempt from the process of the courts which would require them to pay the proceeds over to a creditor of their creditor. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 101, says that on principle a municipal corporation is exempt from liability to garnishment with respect to its revenues and the salaries of its officers, but that, where it owes an ordinary debt to a third person, the mere inconvenience of having to answer as garnishee furnishes no sufficient reason for withdrawing it from the reach of the remedies which the law gives to creditors of natural persons and of private corporations. His view is concurred in by the supreme courts of Texas and New Jersey, and is quoted with approval in Virginia in opinions that are forcible and convincing. Laredo v. Nalle, 65 Tex. 359; State, Jersey City, Prosecutor, v. Horton, 38 N. J. L. 89; Portsmouth Gas Co. v. Sanford, 97 Va. 124, 45 L. R. A. 246, 33 S. E. 516. See also the opinion of Mr. Waples in his work on Attachment & Garnishment, 2d ed., § 430, and of Mr. Wade in his work on Attachment, vol. 2, § 345. The public policy theory has also been repudiated, either wholly or partly, in Iowa, New Hampshire, Montana, Kentucky, Connecticut, Ohio, and Rhode Island. Wales v. Muscatine, 4 Iowa, 302; Whidden v. Drake, 5 N. H. 13; Waterbury v. Deer Lodge County, 10 Mont. 515, 26 Pac. 1002; Rodman v. Musselman, 12 Bush. 354, 23 Am. Rep. 724; Bray v. Wellingford, 20 Conn. 416; Newark v. Funk, 15 Ohio St. 462; Wilson v. Lewis, 10 R. I. 285. See also Adams v. Tyler, 121 Mass. 380. The first four cases cited discuss the question of public policy very fully. The most of the authorities supposed to sustain the opposite doctrine are referred to in the majority opinion. In many, if not most, of those cases the effort was to subject to the process of garnishment wages or salaries due to the officers of the municipality; and, while the arguments of the courts in deciding them are very broad, the facts of the cases bring them within Judge Dillon's rule, and in others the facts showed that to permit the garnishment would embarrass the municipality in its governmental functions, and therefore fall strictly within the rule that private interests must not be permitted to interfere with those of the public. The reasons stated for these decisions are not uniformly the 60 L. R. A.

same, and in some of the states where it is held that municipalities cannot be garnished it is held that this exemption is a privilege which can be waived. This cannot logically be true if it be conceded that the garnishment statutes do not include municipal corporations, as is held in some cases. We ought to be sure that there is a public policy in Florida that forbids garnishment proceedings against municipalities under any and all circumstances before we deny to creditors the remedies afforded by our statutes to subject to their demands the property of or debts due to their debtors. It is one of the prime purposes of government to furnish remedies whereby to compel every member of society to render unto every other member that which is due; and, unless in so doing the public interests will be injuriously affected, this public policy is paramount to considerations of mere convenience. Where, as in many states, municipalities are limited, as to debts they may contract, to those matters wherein a garnishment of such debt would interfere with their governmental functions, or where the power given to sue them is limited, there is much reason for holding that garnishment should not lie against them; but where, as in this state, the power to sue them is general, and the powers to create debts are broad enough to embrace debts, the garnishment of which will not interfere with their governmental functions, I can see no reason why their liability to garnishment shall be altogether denied by the courts. It is more just to hold them liable in all cases where public policy does not demand that they be exempt. If their creditors should assign their demands against them to other persons, the municipality will be compelled to pay same to the assignee. The garnishing creditor stands in the place of an assignee, the only difference being that the assignment in his case is one forced by the law, instead of being a voluntary assignment by the debtor.

The rule I contend for is this: That the statutes of this state authorize counties and municipal corporations to be sued in garnishment, but that this general authority to sue does not repeal the rule of public policy which forbids it in case such garnishment will embarrass them in their governmental functions. This principle is expressly ruled in Lewis v. Denver, 9 Colo. App. 328, 48 Pac. 317, and Troy Laundry & Machinery Co. v. Denver, 11 Colo. App. 308, 53 Pac. 256, wherein it was held that, although the statute expressly authorized municipal corporations to be garnished, yet that this statute would not be held to authorize garnishment of the salary of a municipal officer, because public policy forbade it. I think it finds support, also, in the decisions of this court in Post v. Love, 19 Fla. 634, and Crescent Ins. Co. v. Bear, 23 Fla. 50, 1 So. 318. In those cases it was held that garnishment does not lie against an executor during the progress of the administration of an estate to reach a legacy bequeathed to a debtor, and that a debt due a partnership cannot be garnished by a creditor of one of the parties, although the statute authorizes the writ to issue against "any person or persons," which clearly embraces executors and persons indebted to partnerships. Although our statute, by the use of the term "third person," would embrace persons who act as receivers, clerks of the court, sheriffs, or other officers holding money in a fiduciary capacity, yet many courts hold, and probably this court would hold, that no recovery could be had in garnishment against them, not because such receiver, clerk, or sheriff is not a "person," but because public policy forbids it. They are not exempt from suit because not embraced in the garnishment statutes, but no recovery can be had against them on grounds of public policy if the facts are made to appear.

In the present case the county made no defense. It does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the record that the debt sought to be garnished was one which was exempt from garnishment upon grounds of public policy, and the default admits that it was not. I think, therefore, that the judgment ought to be affirmed. I regard the principle decided in this case as an important one, and sufficiently broad to exempt cities and towns from garnishment, and to declare absolutely void any judgment against municipal corporations in garnishment proceedings, because the courts have no jurisdiction to render them. Because of its importance, and the great hardship upon creditors of withdrawing from the grasp of process in their favor all debts due by cities, towns, and counties, of whatever nature, I have thought best to express my views at length.

In my opinion, the judgment ought to be affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

May Q. ROBINSON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GEORGIA RAILROAD & BANKING

(.....Ga.....)

*The mother of an illegitimate child has no right of action, under Civil Code, § 3828, for his homicide.

(February 10, 1908.)

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's child. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Arnold & Arnold, for plaintiff in error:

The mother is recognized as the only parent, and exercises all parental power.

Ga. Code, § 2509.

Even if a woman has both legitimate and illegitimate children, bastards inherit equally the estate of their mother; and, if the bastard dies without issue or widow, his mother and brothers and sisters inherit his estate.

Ga. Code, § 2510.

The bastard is made the mother's son in every legal sense. The child, as relates to his mother, is, under our statutes, a legitimate child, as to everything in which the common law made him illegitimate.

Messrs. Joseph B. Cumming, Bryan Cumming, and Sanders McDaniel for defendant in error.

FISH, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This record presents but a single question for our determination, and that is, Has the mother of an illegitimate child a right of action, under Civil Code, § 3828, for his wrongful or negligent homicide? That section reads as follows: "A widow, or, if no widow, a child or children, may recover for the homicide of the husband or parent, and if suit be brought by the widow or children, and the former or one of the latter dies pending the action, the same shall survive in the first case to the children, and in the latter to the surviving child or children. The husband may recover for the homicide of his wife, and if she leaves child or children surviving, said husband and children shall sue jointly, and not separately, with the right to recover the full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence, and with the right of survivorship as to said suit if either die pending the action. A mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of a child minor or sui juris, upon whom she or he is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support, unless said child leave a wife, husband, or child. Said mother or father shall be entitled to recover the full value of the life of said child." In seeking for the true meaning of this section as to the question under consideration, we must be guided by two firmly established and familiar rules of construction: (1) That statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed, and (2) that prima facie the word

"child" or "children," when used in a statute, will, or deed, means legitimate child or children,—in other words, bastards are not within the term "child" or "children." This court on several occasions, in construing this very section, has applied to it the first of these rules. In Smith v. Patcher, 102 Ga. 158, 29 S. E. 162, it was held: "It is essential to the maintenance of an action by a parent for the homicide of his child that the former should, at the time of the homicide, be to a material extent dependent upon the latter for a support, and that the child should then be actually contributing thereto." In the opinion Lumpkin, P. J., said: "The statute giving a right of action to a parent for the homicide of a child, and conferring upon the former the right to recover the full value of the child's life, is, to say the least, a harsh one, and must be strictly construed." Substantially the same language is used by the learned justice in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Spinks, 111 Ga. 573, 36 S. E. 855. In Marshall v. Macon Sash, Door, & Lumber Co. 103 Ga. 725, 41 L. R. A. 211, 30 S. E. 571, it was held: "A child has no right of action for the homicide of its stepfather." In that case it was alleged that the plaintiffs were the only heirs of their stepfather, he having left no widow and no other children; that he married the mother of the plaintiffs eight years prior to his death, and from the time of such marriage to the date of his death he maintained and supported the plaintiffs as his children, rearing them in his own home, feeding, clothing, and schooling them, and exercising over them complete parental control, by consent of their mother and themselves; and that such relation continued up to the date of his death, up to which time he not only contributed to their support, but they were entirely dependent upon him for a livelihood. The action was dismissed on general demurrer. Mr. Justice Lewis said: "The right of action provided for in the above Code section [3828] did not exist at common law. This statute is therefore in derogation of the common law; and, applying to it the universal rule of strict construction, we cannot see how there is any escape from the conclusion that the legislature never contemplated giving a child any right of action for the homicide of a step-parent." Instances of the application by this court of the second of these rules of construction are: Hicks v. Smith, 94 Ga. 809, 22 S. E. 153; Floyd v. Floyd, 97 Ga. 124, 24 S. E. 451; and Johnston v. Taliaferro, 107 Ga. 6, 45 L. R. A. 95, 32 S. E. 931. In the first of these cases it was held: "Where, by the provisions of a will made by the great-grandfather of a bastard on the paternal line, an estate is vested in the father of a bastard for life with remainder over to his children, and, he failing issue, remainder over in fee to other great-grandchildren of the testator, upon the death of the father of such bastard without issue other than such legitimated bastard, while the latter, by force of the statute, may take by descent from his father, he cannot take by purchase under the will 60 L. R. A.

of his great-grandfather, which devises the estate to his great-grandchildren generally, there being in the will no language expressly indicating a purpose to include within the scheme of his benevolence any bastard descendants." Mr. Justice Atkinson in that case said: "The word 'children,' as a general rule, means legitimate children, and will not be extended by implication so as to embrace children other than legitimate, unless such construction be necessary to carry into effect the manifest purpose of the testator." In the second case it was held: "The term 'child,' as employed in § 2664 of the Code, does not include a bastard so as to entitle him to the benefits of its provisions, and the conclusive presumption of a gift resulting from continuous possession, under the circumstances therein set forth, arises only in favor of legitimate children." In the opinion Chief Justice Simmons said: "It is well settled that at common law the words 'child' and 'children' mean only legitimate child and children." In the third case it was held: "The words 'child' and 'children,' appearing in a deed conveying to an unmarried female certain property during her life, and at her death to such child or children as she may leave living at the time of her death, will not include an illegitimate child of such female born several years after the making of the deed, unless it plainly appears from the language of the instrument that it was the intention of the grantor that an illegitimate child was to take thereunder. The word 'issue,' used in a subsequent part of the deed under consideration in the present case, is to be given the same meaning as the words 'child' or 'children.'" Mr. Justice Cobb, in delivering the opinion, said: "The words 'children' and 'issue' in deeds, wills, and other conveyances must be held to mean legitimate children or issue, unless the context is such as to require a different meaning, or the circumstances surrounding the execution of the paper are such as to make the words import other than legitimates." Page 20, 107 Ga., page 102, 45 L. R. A., and page 937, 32 S. E.

The exact question we have in hand has been decided by courts in other jurisdictions, and upon the application of the two rules of construction under discussion. In Dickinson v. North Eastern R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 735, it was held that the word "child," in § 2 of 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93 (Lord Campbell's act, which is the prototype of our statute), means a legitimate child, and that an action could not be maintained on behalf of a bastard child against a railway company for the homicide of its mother. Counsel for the plaintiff in that case contended that the case was within the spirit of the act, for beyond question the child was dependent solely on the mother, and that the act must mean any child who was deriving pecuniary advantage, and is deprived thereof by the death. Pollock, C. B., said: "We have no doubt that in the act of Parliament, as in all others, the word 'child' means 'legitimate' child only. In Gibson v. Midland R. Co. 2 Ont. Rep. 653, it was held, under a statute of Ontario similar to Lord Campbell's act, the mother of an illegitimate child could not recover damages for its death. To the same effect is Clarke v. Carlin Coal Co. [1891] A. C. 412. In Harkins v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 15 Phila. 280, it was held: "The mother of an illegitimate child is not within the words or meaning of the act of April 26, 1855, which enacts that the persons entitled to recover damages for any injury causing death shall be the 'husband, widow, children, or parents of the deceased and no other relative.'" In his opinion, Thayer, P. J., after citing Dickinson v. North Eastern R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 735, said: "The line of argument adopted by the plaintiff's counsel in that case was much the same as that pursued by the plaintiff's counsel in the present case, viz., that the legislature intended the right of action to be co-extensive with the moral right to support; that, for many purposes, the law recognizes the relationship of a bastard child to his parent; and that, therefore, the question of legitimacy or illegitimacy is immaterial. But we are not convinced by this reasoning. It is true that some rights have been accorded by statute to illegitimate children and their mothers which did not exist at common law. The act of 26th of April, 1855, § 3 (Purdon, Dig. p. 810), enacts that illegitimate children shall take the name of the mother, and that they and the mother respectively shall have capacity to take or inherit from each other personal estate as next of kin and real estate as heirs, but this act conferred only limited powers upon persons of this description. It did not legitimate illegitimate children, and it was so ruled by the supreme court of this state," citing cases. In conclusion, the learned justice said: "In addition, it may be observed that, by the act of 26th of April, 1855, the right of action is given, not to the mother alone, but to the 'parents' of the deceased. If the effect of the act of 26th of April, 1855, were to legitimate bastards for all purposes, and to give to them and their natural parents the standing in all respects which the law accords to lawful children and lawful parents, then the natural father would, equally with the natural mother, be within the enabling words of the act. We do not think this to have been the purpose of the law, but are of the opinion that the legislature, in enacting the act of 26th of April, 1855, and when using the words, 'husband, widow, children, parents of the deceased, and no other relative,' had in view the family relation as constituted and recognized by law, and that it was not intended to extend the benefits of the act to persons not falling within the legal definition of the enumerated relationships." In Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Williams, 78 Miss. 209, 51 L. R. A. 836, 28 So. 853, it was held: "A mother cannot maintain an action for damages caused by the wrongful killing of her bastard son," citing Illinois C. R. Co. v. Johnson, 77 Miss. 727, 51 L. R. A. 837, 28 So. 753, where it was held that an illegitimate half-sister cannot maintain an action under a statute of Mississippi entitling a sister or brother to sue for the homicide of a sister or brother.

In further support of the proposition that the right of action for a negligent or wrongful homicide is purely a statutory one and in derogation of common law, and that, therefore, the statute giving the right must be strictly construed and the case brought clearly within its provisions to enable the plaintiff to recover, we select from a number of cases the following: Good v. Towns, 56 Vt. 410, 48 Am. Rep. 799, wherein it was held: "Under the civil damage act, giving an action to one 'dependent' on the deceased, a plaintiff claiming to be his widow must show a lawful marriage, and one claiming to be his child must show his legitimacy." Rowell, J., said: "It is true, as contended, that the language of the statute is broad—in any manner dependent; but, after all, we think it should be construed to mean a legal dependency only, the same as though it read, 'in any manner legally dependent.'" Dickinson v. North Eastern R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 735, was approvingly cited, Thornburg v. American Steamboard Co. 141 Ind. 443, 40 N. E. 1062, wherein it was held that a statute giving a father a right of action for the homicide of his child confers no right upon one who marries the mother of a bastard child, and receives the child into his home as a member of his family, to sue for the death of the child. McDonald v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 144 Ind. 459, 32 L. R. A. 309, 43 N. E. 447, in which it was held a bastard is not a child within the meaning of the statute of Indiana providing that a father may maintain an action for the death of a child. It appeared in that case that the plaintiff, when the child for whose death the action was brought was six months old, received him from his mother and relieved her of his care and custody, and acknowledged him as his own son, and afterwards discharged every duty as a parent towards him, and received from him all the services, obedience, and respect due from a legitimate son, and that his mother abandoned him and was dead, and that the deceased had no guardian or next of kin. The plaintiff's action was dismissed on demurrer. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Cooper, 22 Ind. App. 459, 53 N. E. 1092, in which it was held: "The right of a father or mother to recover damages for the wrongful killing of a child is statutory, and such an action cannot be maintained by a woman, where she is not the mother and has not legally adopted the child, although it was given to her in infancy, and she had ever since maintained and treated it as her own." Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McGill, 21 L. R. A. 818, 6 C. C. A. 521, 12 U. S. App. 651, 57 Fed. 699, where it was held under a statute of Kansas, giving a right of action for death by wrongful act, and providing that the damages must inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow and children, if any, or next of kin, that a widower could not recover for the wrongful death of his wife, who left children living, because he was not one of the beneficiaries of the statute, although under the Kansas statute of descent and distribution of estates a husband who survives his wife is entitled to a share of her personal estate. In the opinion, Sanborn, J., referring to the statutes giving a right of action for the negligent killing of another, said: "Under these statutes the following rules have been established without dissent among the authorities: The action under them is entirely the creature of the statute. If the right to maintain it and to recover the damages allowed in it in any case is not expressly given by these statutes, the judgment rendered cannot stand. Where such a statute giving a new right of action for damages specifies the person or class of persons for whose exclusive benefit the damages are to be recovered, no damages to any other person or class of persons can be allowed in the action based on the statute." In 1 Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence, § 136, it is said: "Whereas, in England, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, Missouri, and Kansas, and other states, the statute [giving a right of action for homicide] specifies the 'child' of the deceased, an illegitimate child is not within the description."

There are, however, authorities of a different tenor. In Muhl v. Michigan Southern R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 272, the headnote is: "In an action by the administrator of a woman killed by the carelessness of the servants of a railroad company in running its locomotive, the petition alleging and the proof showing the deceased to have left a son as her sole surviving heir, held (1) That it is error to order a nonsuit on the ground that such child is illegitimate; (2) that the fact of such child's legitimacy or illegitimacy can in no respect affect the right of action in his behalf." It appears that the suit was based upon a statute of Ohio, which provided that the action for a homicide should be brought by the personal representative of the deceased, and that the recovery should be distributed to the "widow and next of kin, in the proportions provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal estates left by persons dying intestate." Act March 25, 1851. The deceased left a lawful sister and an illegitimate son. The trial court granted a nonsuit because the child alleged in the petition to be next of kin was a bastard. This ruling was reversed by the supreme court, upon the ground that the action was properly brought in the name of the personal representative of the deceased, and that the question whether the child or sister should be regarded as the next of kin did not in any way affect the cause of action, for the reason that the right to sue existed in favor of the administrator in either case. It is true the court added: "But it is quite evident that the nearness or remoteness of kin on the part of the son of the deceased mother, neither in fact, nor by any canon of descent under the statute, depended at all upon the circumstance of his being born within or without lawful wedlock." In view of the ruling made, this remark seems merely obiter. In Security Title & T. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. 91 Ill. App. 332, it was held: "(1) It was the intention of the legislature, by § 2 of the act of 1872 (Laws 1872, p. 353), . . . to remove the common-law disability of illegitimate children. (2) . . . Under the statute requiring compensation for causing death by wrongful act, neglect, or default, an action can be maintained for the benefit of the mother of an illegitimate child, as the next of kin of such child." The Illinois statute seems to be the same as the Ohio statute just referred to, and provides that the recovery "shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin," etc. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1893, p. 813, chap. 70, § 2. As the mother of an illegitimate child could inherit from it under the law of Illinois, the court held that she was included within the term "next of kin" of such child. In Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 120 Mo. 275, 25 S. W. 179, it was held: "Under the provisions of Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4425, giving the father and mother the right to join in an action for damages for the wrongful death of their unmarried minor child, and, in case of the death of either parent, that such suit may be brought by the survivor, the mother of a deceased illegitimate minor child may, in such case, sue alone, and the reputed father need not, and should not, be made a party." In delivering the opinion, Black, P. J., said: "The harsh rules of the common law have been modified by express statute in this state, so that the mother is declared the natural guardian of her illegitimate child. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5279. And § 4473 declares: 'Bastards shall be capable of inheriting and transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother, and such mother may inherit from her bastard child or children in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of her.' It may be stated that the plaintiff in this case finally brought his action against the same defendant in the circuit court, S. D. Ohio, W. D., and, while the case was dismissed upon the ground that the statute upon which it was based was penal, and for that reason could be enforced only within the sovereignty of its creation, yet Sage, J., said, as the matter had been fully argued before him, he would express his opinion as to whether the plaintiff had any standing in court. His opinion was that the statute extended only to the cases of natural born legitimate children, and no action could be maintained by a mother for the death of her bastard child. Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 46 Fed. 269.

In this state, the mother of a bastard child is entitled to its possession, unless it is legitimated by the father, and, being the only recognized parent, may exercise all the paternal power. Civil Code, § 2509. "Bastards have no inheritable blood, except that given to them by express law. They may inherit from their mother, and from each other, children of the same mother, in the same manner, as if legitimate. If a mother have both legitimate and illegitimate children, they shall inherit alike the estate of the mother. If a bastard dies leaving no issue or widow, his mother, brothers, and sisters shall inherit his estate equally. In distributions under this law the children of a deceased bastard shall represent the deceased parent." Id. § 2510. While it is evidently true that the status of bastards under our law is greatly superior to what it was under the common law, yet it cannot be said that they have been legitimated, at least for all purposes, and placed upon the same footing in all respects as children born in lawful wedlock; and in view of the decisions of this court above cited, to the effect that the statute giving a right of action for a homicide should be strictly construed, and that the word "child" used in a statute prima facie means a legitimate child, we are constrained to hold that the mother of an illegitimate child has no right of action for his wrongful or negligent homicide. The statute provides that "a mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of a child minor or sui juris, upon whom she or he is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support, unless said child leave a wife, husband, or child: Said mother or father shall be entitled to recover the full value of the life of said child." There are no words in the statute qualifying the word "child" in any particular, nor is there anything in the context which would authorize a conclusion that the legislature intended to use the word in any broader sense than is usually given it in statutes, but, on the contrary, the context plainly indicates, to our mind, that the child in legislative contemplation, was the child of a lawful marriage, whose mother, or, if no mother, whose father, might recover for his homicide.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Lumpkin, P. J., absent on account of sickness.

Candler, J., concurring specially:

I concur in the judgment rendered in this case, because of the previous rulings of this court, which seem to be binding upon us. If it were an original question, I would never agree to a judgment which holds that the doubly unfortunate mother of a child whose sole parent she is and upon whom she is dependent,—this dependence probably due to the fact of its miserable birth,—cannot recover for its homicide, although our law-makers have declared that "a mother may recover for the homicide of a child upon whom she is dependent, or who contributes to her support."

H. J. BERKNER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Joseph DANNENBERG et al.

(.....Ga.....)

1. Inasmuch as the answers filed deny the commission of an assault and battery of the kind and character alleged in the petition, and for which the plaintiff sought to recover damages, they cannot properly be treated as pleas of justification, although they admit a battery of a minor character, and aver, as a justification of the battery as admitted, certain opprobrious words and abusive language spoken by the plaintiff to one of the defendants. But, treating the answers as pleas in extenuation and mitigation of damages, the trial judge committed no error in overruling a demurrer to the same.
2. The provision of our statute that opprobrious words or abusive language may justify an assault, or an assault and battery, is applicable only on the trial of one who has been indicted for either of these offenses; and while, on the trial of a civil action brought by one person against another to recover damages for an assault and battery alleged to have been committed on the plaintiff by the defendants, any such words and language may properly go to the jury, they are admissible only in extenuation or mitigation of damages, and not as a justification.
3. In an action to recover damages resulting from an assault and battery committed on the plaintiff, if there be aggravating circumstances either in the act or intention, punitive or exemplary damages may be recovered.
4. In order to entitle the defendant to the opening and conclusion before the jury under a plea of justification filed in an action to recover damages for the commission of a tort, the plea must admit the commission of the acts charged in the petition as they are therein alleged; and a plea which only partially admits the commission of the acts charged is not a plea of justification, and does not entitle the defendant to the opening and conclusion of the argument.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Bibb County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for an assault. Reversed.

Cumming v. State, 99 Ga. 662, 27 S. E. 177; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 977.

The batteries were separate; therefore the torts were severable, and severable or separate damages might have been assessed by the jury.

The three defendants not acting in concert, there being no conspiracy between them to assault the plaintiff, but their actions each being inspired on the spur of the moment, each acting for himself without any common purpose, the battery of each was a several, not a joint, act, and each was responsible only for the consequences of his own act.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action to recover damages on the part of Berkner for personal injuries which he alleged the defendants had inflicted on him was tried, and there was a verdict for the defendants.

1. In his bill of exceptions the plaintiff in error alleges that the trial judge erred in overruling the demurrer which he filed to the pleas of the defendants. Evidently the main purpose of the demurrer was to call in question the sufficiency of the defendants' answers as pleas of justification. We are of the opinion that the answers filed cannot, in 60 L. R. A.

law, be treated as pleas of justification. The action brought by the plaintiff sought a recovery in damages for a tort, and Civil Code, § 3891, declares that in every case of a tort, if the defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same as a justification. The test, therefore, to which the answers are to be subjected to determine whether or not they can properly be classed as pleas of justification, is: First. Do the answers admit the battery as set out in the petition? Second. Do the matters set up as a reason for committing the battery, in law, authorize the defendants to commit the battery? If the pleas be wanting in either of these particulars, they are not pleas of justification. An examination of the answers discloses that they do not admit the assault and battery as charged in the petition. In order to make a plea one of justification, it must plainly admit that the act as charged in the petition was committed by the defendant. Under such a plea there can be no issue between the parties as to whether the acts charged were committed by the defendant, but the only issue raised is whether the defendant was in law justified in doing the acts for which the plaintiff seeks redress. The answers in this case, therefore, cannot be considered as pleas of justification. By Civ. Code, § 3892, it is declared that what does not amount to a justification may be pleaded in extenuation and mitigation of damages; and, while much of the matter contained in the answers could well have been omitted, we are not aware of any reason why the answers should have been stricken, but, on the contrary, are of opinion that the matter which they contained could properly be pleaded in extenuation or mitigation of damages under the Code section just cited. Those grounds of the demurrer not directed to the answers as pleas of justification do not raise issues of sufficient importance to cause the pleas to be stricken. Although much of the language and many of the expressions contained in the answers to which these grounds of the demurrer are directed are objectionable, and add no weight to the material averments of the plea, and should not have been set out, yet they can properly be treated as mere surplusage.

2. The motion for a new trial contains thirty-five grounds. A careful examination of each of these in connection with the brief of evidence and the charge given to the jury has resulted in the conclusion that the trial judge erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. The particular causes for a reversal of the judgment will be hereafter specifically set forth. In the meantime, however, a number of immaterial errors, set out in some of the grounds of the motion other than those particularly mentioned, appear to have been committed on the trial; but they are not of sufficient importance of themselves to work a new trial. These errors are found set out in the first, second, eighth, tenth, and other grounds, which are indicated in what will be hereafter said. The grounds not thus indicated or specifically set out do not show the commission of error. In the fourteenth ground of the motion error is assigned to the action of the court in instructing the jury as follows: "It is a rule of law in this state, laid down in the Code, that in all cases of assault and battery [and the charge in this case on the part of the plaintiff is that the defendants did commit an assault and battery upon him, and the plea of the defendants admits that an assault and battery was committed on the plaintiff] the law permits, wherever an assault and battery is made, and an effort is made on the part of the person inflicting that assault and battery to justify—that is to say, to show that the person who inflicted the assault and battery was justified in that battery—the law says that the jury trying the case may have shown to them by the testimony any opprobrious words used by the person beaten to the person beating, by the person who inflicts the injury or battery or beating, in order that the jury trying the case may pass upon the question of whether or not the battery inflicted was disproportionate to the opprobrious words, if they were insulting words and opprobrious words, whether the battery inflicted was disproportionate to the words used." The provisions of our Code to which undoubtedly the trial judge had reference in this part of his charge are to be found in Penal Code, § 103, which is in the following language: "On the trial of an indictment for an assault, or an assault and battery, the defendant may give in evidence to the jury any opprobrious words, or abusive language, used by the prosecutor, or person assaulted or beaten; and such words and language may or may not amount to a justification, according to the nature and extent of the battery, all of which shall be determined by the jury." In terms the provisions of this section are only applicable in the trial of one who is charged with the offense of assault, or assault and battery, and they have no applicability to a civil case, so far as they may be construed to allow the jury to find opprobrious words to be such a justification for an assault and battery as to prevent a recovery by the plaintiff. On the contrary, our Civil Code, § 3826, but declares the doctrine of the common law when it lays down the rule that "a physical injury done to another gives a right of action, whatever may be the intention of the actor, unless he is justified under some rule of law." The rule for measuring damages in such an action is stated (Civil Code, § 3905) in these words: "If the injury be small, or the mitigating circumstances be strong, nominal damages only are given." The suit here is to recover damages for physical injuries. The plaintiff is entitled, when he shows that these injuries were inflicted by the defendant, to recover nominal damages at least, unless the defendant on his part shows that he was justified, under the law, in the commission of the assault or battery, or both. As we have said, the rule that opprobrious words may, in the estimation of the jury, afford a justification of an assault and battery, is confined to the trial of one who is charged on the criminal side of the court with assault and battery as an offense against the laws of the state. At common law opprobrious words would never justify an assault or battery (Berry v. State, 105 Ga. 683, 31 S. E. 592), and we have no statute which makes such words a justification in a civil action. It must, therefore, be ruled that the charge complained of was error. While this is true, evidence of opprobrious words or abusive language may nevertheless properly go to the jury, not as proof of justification, but to be considered in extenuation and mitigation of damages which must be awarded, except in cases where the acts admitted or proved are justified. We know of no rule of law, when a physical injury is shown to have been intentionally inflicted, which bars the right of the injured person to at least recover nominal damages, when it appears that the only cause for the infliction of the injury was opprobrious words used by the person injured to him who caused the injury. We are, of course, dealing with the charge as set out in a ground of the motion, and cannot be understood as intimating anything in relation to the other claim made by the defendants that what they did was in consequence of a belief on their part that the plaintiff was about to draw and use a weapon. The evidence in relation to that and other circumstances is for the jury; but, inasmuch as opprobrious words and abusive language will not of themselves free a person who actually committed an assault and battery from liability in an action for damages, it is not, we think, necessary to discuss or pass upon the question of the mutual rights of the father, son, and son-in-law to protect each other.

3. Another ground of the motion complains that the court erred in charging the jury that they were not authorized to consider the question of punitive damages, and that they were not authorized to find punitive damages for the plaintiff, but, if they should find damages for the plaintiff, their verdict should be for such damages "as will compensate him for the injury inflicted upon him, if such injury has been inflicted upon him from which he still suffers, as well as such injuries suffered from time to time in the past, in the way of physical injury, as well as compensation for wounded feelings." We have not quoted in full the part of the charge complained of because of its length, but we gather from it that the charge instructed the jury that in a case like this they were not authorized to find punitive damages. So construed, we think the charge was error. In the case of Ratteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 574, 4 S. E. 684, it was ruled by this court that under the law of this state, in actions for torts, when there are aggravating circumstances, the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass or as compensation for wounded feelings. The action brought in that case was to recover damages for an assault and battery which the plaintiff alleged the defendant had inflicted on him; and in the case of Parker v. Lanier, 82 Ga. 216, 8 S. E. 57, which was an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff at the hands of the defendant in consequence of an assault and battery, this court expressly ruled that punitive damages, as well as compensatory damages, might be awarded. Under these authorities it must be ruled that this part of the charge was error. We, of course, do not mean to be understood as saying or intimating that under the evidence in this case the jury should or should not have awarded punitive or exemplary damages. The plaintiff contended that the defendants, without cause or any mitigating circumstances, committed an aggravated battery on him. Whether they did so or not, whether there were aggravating circumstances or not, are all questions for the jury; but in the charge excepted to the jury were instructed that they could not consider the question of punitive damages. As was said by Mr. Justice Simmons in Ratteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 580, 4 S. E. 684: "Whatever may have been the dispute amongst text-writers and courts heretofore as to this question, . . . the legislature has settled it in this state;" and he then proceeds to quote from the Civil Code, § 3906, which declares, in effect, that, where there are aggravating circumstances either in the act or in the intention in the commission of a tort, the jury may give additional damages, either to deter the wrongdoer from repeating the trespass, or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff. Under these rulings it must be held that the charge complained of was error.

4. It is further complained that the court erred in ruling, over the objection of the plaintiff, that the plea filed by the defendants in this case was a sufficient plea of justification to entitle the defendants to the opening and conclusion in the argument before the jury. It is not necessary for us to repeat what we have said above,—that, in our judgment, the answers filed were not pleas of justification, but from what has been said on that point it is clear that the defendant was not entitled to the opening and conclusion, which has been ruled by this court to be an important right. This right is only secured when the plea admits the commission of the acts as they are charged in the petition. Such an admission is necessary to characterize the plea as one of justification, which alone authorizes the defendant to have the opening and conclusion. It was ruled in the case of Ransone v. Christian, 49 Ga. 491, construing Civil Code, § 3891, which relates to pleas of justification, that under the law of this state a plea of justification filed in a case of libel admitted, not only the publication, but the manner of it as charged in the declaration. See also, to the same effect, Ocean S. S. Co. v. Williams, 69 Ga. 251. And in the case of Seymour v. Bailey, 76 Ga. 338, being a case wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages because the defendant "with an ax helve and with his fist gave and struck petitioner a great many violent blows," etc., it was held "that it was not a sufficient plea of justification to allege that the plaintiff made an assault upon the defendant, and would have beaten and ill treated him if he had not immediately defended himself against the plaintiff, and therefore he did a little beat, ill treat, and wound the plaintiff necessarily and unavoidably, and the plaintiff, by his assault, brought it upon himself;" and that the plea did not give the defendant the right to open and conclude before the jury. Under the plea filed in this case much of the matter alleged in the petition was not admitted, but was denied. The effect of a plea of this character is to still leave upon the plaintiff the burden of proving those allegations not admitted. Hence the plea was not one of justification, and did not give to the defendant the right to open and conclude.

We have not, for want of time, been able to take up the grounds of the motion seriatim, but it is believed that the rulings herein made, and the reasons assigned for the same, cover all the material points made in the record.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except Lumpkin, P. J., absent on account of sickness, and Candler, J., not presiding.

Fish, J., dissenting in part:

While I concur in the result reached by the court in this case upon the other grounds dealt with in the opinion of the majority of the court, I respectfully dissent from the proposition laid down in the second head-note. It is undoubtedly true that, under the common law, opprobrious words or abusive language could not be pleaded in justification of an alleged assault and battery, either upon a criminal prosecution for the alleged offense or in a civil suit for damages based upon the alleged tort; and it is also true that, unless this principle of the common law, as applied to such a civil action, has been abrogated in this state by the statute (Penal Code, § 163), it still prevails. In my opinion, however, there is no escape from the conclusion that this principle of the common law was abolished in this state, both as to criminal and civil actions, when that statute was enacted. Under the common law, whenever a person could plead justification to an indictment for assault and battery, he could plead justification in defense to an action for damages based upon the same act. To an indictment for assault and battery he could plead that the alleged battery was committed in self-defense, and to a civil suit, based upon the same act, he could enter the same plea; and if he sustained it in the latter case, he was as much entitled to a verdict in his favor as he would be if he sustained it in the former. The same principle of justification applied in each case. Civil Code, § 3891, provides: "In every case of tort, if the defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same as a justification." And § 3826 declares: "A physical injury done to another gives a right of action, whatever may be the intention of the actor, unless he is justified under some rule of law." Therefore, if, in a civil action for alleged assault and battery, "the defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same in justification;" and "a physical injury done to another" gives no right of action to the injured party if the person inflicting the injury was "justified under some rule of law." Penal Code, § 103, provides: "On the trial of an indictment for an assault, or an assault and battery, the defendant may give in evidence to the jury any opprobrious words, or abusive language, used by the prosecutor, or person assaulted or beaten; and such words and language may or may not amount to a justification, according to the nature and extent of the battery, all of which shall be determined by the jury." It seems to me clear that when, in a prosecution for assault and battery, opprobrious words or abusive language do amount to a justification of the beating, the person doing the beating "was authorized by law to do the act complained of," and that it therefore follows that in a suit for tort, based upon the same beating, he "may plead the same in justification." Clearly, if, in a given case, opprobrious words or abusive language would, in a prosecution for assault and battery, amount to a justification for the particular beating inflicted, the person doing the beating "was justified under some rule of law." He would be justified under the rule of law laid down in the above-quoted section of the Penal Code, and, being justified under this rule of law, the physical injury which he inflicted upon the other party would give no right of action to the latter. "Battery is the unlawful beating of another." Penal Code, § 102. Therefore a beating which is lawful is, in the legal sense, no battery. A beating which is justifiable is a lawful beating. A lawful beating affords no cause of action to the person beaten. Opprobrious words or abusive language may, as we have seen, justify a beating, if, in the opinion of the jury trying the case, the beating was not disproportioned to the provocation given by such words. Where opprobrious words or abusive language do justify a beating, the beating is lawful, and, being lawful, no right of action can flow therefrom to the person beaten. In my opinion, it will not do to say that a beating may be justifiable, and therefore lawful, when the state is prosecuting the beater for a violation of its criminal statute, and that the same beating is obliged to be unjustifiable, and therefore unlawful, when the person beaten is suing his assailant for damages alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the beating. It cannot be that the state, when it, by a prosecution for assault and battery, is seeking to protect the right of every law-abiding citizen to personal security, will justify one person for having beaten another, upon a ground which affords no justification whatever for the act complained of when the issue is between the person assaulted and beaten and his assailant. I cannot believe that the state in a criminal case has one standard by which to measure the right to personal security, and in a civil case has another standard by which to measure the same right. The right for the protection of which the state enacted its criminal statute, and in vindication of which it brings its criminal prosecution, is the same right for the alleged violation of which the person beaten brings his action for damages. And when the state, as the sovereign protector of the rights of its citizens, in a statute enacted for the purpose of protecting the right of personal security, provides that a given provocation may justify one person for assaulting and beating another, it impliedly declares that under such circumstances the right of the person assaulted and beaten to personal security has not been violated. When one person is justified in striking another, he has the right to do so. If he has the right to strike the blow, he cannot, by striking it, violate any right of the person whom he strikes, and, unless some right of the person struck is violated by the blow, no right of action for damages can accrue to him therefrom.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the charge of the trial court, dealt with in the second division of the opinion of the majority of this court, was not an erroneous statement of the law. I may add that, while the precise question which I have been considering may not have been directly involved in Tucker v. Walters, 78 Ga. 232, 2 S. E. 689, it is very clear that this court, as then constituted, was of opinion that the provisions of our statute in reference to opprobrious words or abusive language as a justification for an alleged assault and battery were applicable in a civil case. There Tucker sued Walters for damages, for having stabbed him with a pocketknife, and Walters' defense was that the stabbing was done in self-defense. The evidence showed that Tucker first assaulted and beat Walters. The plaintiff contended that the assault which he made on the defendant was justified by certain words which the latter used to him, which, in the manner and under the circumstances in which they were used, were opprobrious. The trial judge instructed the jury that the words in question, whether spoken in a mild, kind, or insulting manner, were not opprobrious words, and that the manner in which they were spoken could not make them so. The main ground of the motion for a new trial was that the court erred in this instruction, and this court held that the charge was erroneous, upon the ground that the question, whether the words were opprobrious or not, was one to be determined by the jury. Clearly, if the law in reference to opprobrious words as a justification for a beating does not apply in a civil suit for damages, the question whether the instruction to the jury was abstractly right or wrong was utterly immaterial; as, whether right or wrong, the plaintiff could not have been hurt by the charge given. Therefore the fact that this court gravely considered and determined the question presented shows that it was of opinion that the provision now contained in Penal Code, § 103, with reference to opprobrious words, is applicable in a civil case.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

STATE of New Jersey,
William O. ALLISON, Prosecutor, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Charles CORKER et al.

(67 N. J. L. 596.)

- *1. A statute so framed as to be wholly or in part unconstitutional, but having a title expressing a constitutional object, may, by amendatory legislation, be rendered constitutional, without having recourse to an enactment independent throughout its provisions.
2. Any power or powers of local government in townships may, at the discretion of the legislature, be exercised in districts; and the fixing of the number and boundaries of the districts may constitutionally be delegated to the township committee.
3. In order to effectuate such power or powers, the legislature, constitutionally, may authorize the legal voters of each district to make appropriations of money, to be raised by taxation and expended within the district. The district becomes, for the purposes of the legislation, a political division of the state.

4. "An Act Concerning Public Roads and Parks and Creating Boards for the Control and Management of the Same," approved March 1, 1893 (P. L. p. 69; 3 Gen. Stat. p. 2951), as amended and supplemented March 17, 1896 (P. L. p. 80), is constitutional as to roads, but ineffectual as to parks.
5. "An Act Authorizing the Division of Townships into Street Lighting Districts and the Erection and Maintenance of Street Lights Therein and the Election of Street Light Commissioners in Said District," passed May 25, 1894 (P. L. p. 540; 3 Gen. Stat. p. 3669), as amended March 25, 1896 (P. L. p. 132), is constitutional.

I. Introductory.

There are but few authorities bearing directly on the question as to whether a statute which violates a constitutional provision can be validly amended by a legislative act which removes the offending portions of the statute, but does not re-enact the entire statute. There can be but little question but that such a statute may be so amended where the defective provision is so separable from the rest of the statute as not to render it unconstitutional in its entirety. Such a statute is as though the defective portion had never been enacted, and the rest, being valid and operative, may be amended. A more difficult question is presented where the offending provision of the statute is so inseparably connected with its purpose and object as to bring the entire act within the condemnation of the Constitution. The premise from which it is argued that such a statute cannot be amended so as to cure the defect is that it is null and void, and that a null and void statute cannot be amended. In STATE, ALLISON, PROSECUTOR, v. CORKER the court held that such an act is not void, but merely inoperative, and that it becomes operative upon the removal of the defect by an amendment. It also held that, even though the act be considered null and void, it does not follow that it may not be imported into valid legislation by appropriate reference; that it is within the legislative power to give effect to documents without their full recital; that the matter is one purely of identification, and nothing is more definite than a reference to 60 L. R. A.

a document that has been regularly promulgated as a public statute.

II. Statutes only partially unconstitutional.

In Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774, it was held that a portion of a statute which is unconstitutional may be amended so as to cure the defect, the court saying that, where the act is valid, and only a portion of it violates the Constitution, an amendment may be made to any part of the defective section, or by substituting an entire new section in lieu thereof, provided that the act, when amended, does not embrace a purpose outside of its title and inconsistent with the provisions remaining un repealed.

In Sweet v. Syracuse, 120 N. Y. 337, 27 N. E. 1081, 29 N. E. 289, infra, where an amendment was attacked on the ground that the original statute was rendered entirely invalid by a constitutional defect, it was assumed that, if the unconstitutional portion did not invalidate the act in its entirety, it could be properly amended, and the court rested on this ground its decision sustaining the amendment.

In State, Trenton Iron Co., Prosecutor, v. Yard, 42 N. J. L. 357, the statute involved was an act concerning corporations, one section of which related to the taxation of corporations, and was complete within itself, but was claimed to be unconstitutional in that it applied only to corporations incorporated after the passage of the act. This section was amended for the purpose of curing the defect by a supplemental act likewise complete within itself, which applied to all corporations regardless of when incorporated; and the court held that such amendment was valid, even though the original statute may have been unconstitutional. It will be noted that the amendatory act, being complete within itself, might, as the court said in its opinion, have been enacted without referring to the old section, and that such reference was not detrimental to it as an act of legis-

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a tax assessment. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George R. Dutton, with Mr. William B. Mackay, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

No tax can be imposed upon a division or district less than a political district.

State, McClosky, Prosecutor, v. Chamberlin, 37 N. J. L. 388; State, Baldwin, Prosecutor, v. Fuller, 39 N. J. L. 576, 41 N. J. L. 615; State, Lydecker, Prosecutor, v. Englewood Twp. Drainage & Water Comrs. 41 N. J. L. 154; State, Bailey, Prosecutor, v. Brown, 53 N. J. L. 166, 20 Atl. 772; Howell v. Millville, 60 N. J. L. 97, 36 Atl. 691.

The road districts and the lamp districts have none of the characteristics specified in State, Lydecker, Prosecutor, v. Englewood Twp. Drainage & Water Comrs. 41 N. J. L.

lation; and that it was not necessary for the legislature to repeal the whole corporation act and re-enact it with the changed provision. This case, then, is clearly distinguishable from STATE, ALLISON, PROSECUTOR, v. CORKER, and like cases where the amendment relates to only a dependent portion of the statute, and standing by itself would not make a complete law.

In State, McLorinan, Prosecutor, v. Ryno, 49 N. J. L. 603, 10 Atl. 189, the court held, on the authority of the Yard Case, that the legislature could cure a defect in an unconstitutional statute by an enactment in the form of an amendment. The amendment involved in this case was also complete within itself, and, if it had been enacted without a reference to the original statute, which it purported in its title to amend, would have been valid, although the court in its decision did not refer to such fact, but contented itself with saying that "there is no impediment in the way of the legislature curing such defect by subsequent enactment in the form of an amendment or supplement," and cited the Yard Case.

III. Statutes unconstitutional in entirety.

a. In general.

In State ex rel. Richards v. Cincinnati, 52 Ohio St. 419, 27 L. R. A. 737, 40 N. E. 508, it was claimed that the statute involved was rendered unconstitutional in its entirety by the fact that, by the use of the word "present" in one of its sections, its application was limited to municipal corporations belonging to a specified class at the time of its passage, so as to infringe a constitutional provision forbidding the conferring of corporate power by special legislation. It was held that such statute, even though entirely obnoxious to the constitutional provision, was rendered valid by an amendment which re-enacted the offending section, but omitted the word "present;" and the court said that, where one or more sections of a statute are amended by a new act, and the amendatory act contains the entire section or sections amended, such sections must be construed as though introduced in the place of the repealed section or sections; and that the other sections are to be interpreted in connection with, and in view of, the amended section or sections; and, in its application to cases arising after the amendment has been made, the whole statute must have the same operation and effect as if it had been re-enacted in terms.

Dicta to the same effect, and based on similar reasoning, are found in Sweet v. Syracuse, 120 60 L. R. A.

157, necessary to make them political divisions.

Mr. Peter W. Stagg, for defendants in error:

This act as amended is constitutional.

Smith v. Howell, 60 N. J. L. 384, 38 Atl. 180; State, Auryansen, Prosecutor, v. Hackensack Improvement Commission, 45 N. J. L. 113.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the supreme court affirmed, upon certiorari, road and lamp taxes as-

N. Y. 337, 27 N. E. 1081, 20 N. E. 289, where it was claimed that an amendment attempting to remove a constitutional defect was ineffective by reason of the fact that the offending provision was a necessary part of the entire scheme of the act and rendered it void. The court, while holding that the unconstitutional provision did not have that effect, and that the balance of the act was good, and consequently could be amended, said that it was not, however, prepared to say that, even if the whole act was rendered invalid in consequence of the invalidity of the particular section involved, the defect could not be cured by an amendment which would eliminate the unconstitutional portion; that, as to all action taken under such an act subsequently to its amendment, it would have to be construed as if the section as amended had always been a part of it, and that it would then constitute an act of the legislature passed with all the form prescribed by the Constitution, and containing no provision obnoxious to it.

In Ferry v. Campbell, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L. R. A. 92, 81 N. W. 604, a collateral inheritance statute, which was unconstitutional as constituting a deprivation of property without due process of law by reason of its failure to provide for notice to the heirs, legatees, or devisees, of the appraisal of the property, was held to have been validly amended by an amendatory act which provided for such notice. The court, in so holding, said that the original act imposed a tax upon the property of a testator, and declared that it should be a lien upon the estate from the death of the decedent until paid; that the rate per cent was fixed, and the appraisement was necessary simply to fix the value of the property in order that the tax might be computed; that there was no objection to the levy of the tax; that the statute was invalid simply because the legislature did not provide for notice of the proceedings by which the amount of the tax was to be ascertained; that a re-enactment of the whole statute was unnecessary, as the amendatory act simply removed an impediment to the enforcement of the tax, and, when that impediment was removed, the original act was effectual and capable of enforcement.

This case is a close one, and differences of opinion may arise as to how far it goes in holding that all unconstitutional statutes may be validly amended without re-enactment, by a statute which removes the constitutional objection, regardless of whether or not the invalid portion was so interwoven with the purpose and object of the statute as to render it in-essed in 1897 and 1898 upon lands of the prosecutor in the township of Ridgefield, in the county of Bergen, and set aside a park tax assessed in 1897 upon the same lands. The present writ of error is in review of such affirmance.

The foundation of the road and park taxes is an act entitled "An Act Concerning Public Roads and Parks, and Creating Boards for the Control and Management of the Same," approved March 1, 1893 (P. L. p. 69, 3 Gen. Stat. p. 2951), as amended and supplemented by an act approved March 17, 1896 (P. L. p. 80), and accepted in said township. The act of 1893 provided that the township committee of any township in the state might cause it to be divided into convenient road districts, and in such case should submit the question of the acceptance or rejection of the act to the legal voters of the township, and that after acceptance such committee should call an assembly of the freeholders of each district to elect a suitable person, who should be a legal voter in the township and a freeholder and resident in such district, as a road commissioner of the district for a term of three years. The commissioners elected and their successors were constituted a board of commissioners, to be known as a "public road board," of the township. At the same meeting, and annually thereafter, the assembled freeholders were authorized to vote to raise money by taxation within the district for the making, maintaining, and repairing of the public highways within the district, and for keeping in repair and improving any public parks in the township. Each commissioner was given the powers, within the limits of his district, of the overseers of highways, and to the board was committed the duties of the township committee over highways and parks. Powers of condemnation and improvement, and assessment of consequent benefits, were also conferred by the act, but those are not involved in this case. The taxes voted in each district were to be assessed and collected by the township assessor and collector. This statute was by the supreme court, in 1894, held unconstitutional in State ex rel. Allison v. Blake, 57 N. J. L. 6, 25 L. R. A. 480, 29 Atl. 417, because the election of the commissioners was limited to the freeholders of the districts. The act of 1896 by amendment of certain sections vested the power to elect commissioners and to vote taxes in the legal voters of the respective districts, instead of in the freeholders of the districts, and authorized the township committee, with the consent of the public valid in its entirety. However, it will be noticed, as the court pointed out, that the objection did not go to the purpose or object of the statute itself, but merely to the lack of a provision which was essential to its enforcement. For this reason it cannot be said that this case goes any further than to hold that a statute having a constitutional object and purpose, and which does not violate any provision of the Constitution except in the proceedings that it provides for its enforcement, is not invalid and void, but is simply rendered inoperative and unenforceable by reason of the absence of the provision for its enforcement, and that such defect may be supplied by an amendatory statute which provides for a valid method of enforcement. It is a valid and constitutional statute creating rights and fixing liabilities, but omits to prescribe a method of enforcing it,—the fact that the proceeding for enforcement prescribed by it was invalid left it as though such provision had never been placed there,—and may be validly amended by adding a provision prescribing proceedings for its enforcement.

There are two Indiana cases (Igove v. State, 14 Ind. 239; Grubbs v. State, 24 Ind. 295) which have been sometimes cited as upholding the proposition that an unconstitutional statute cannot be amended; but these cases do not go that far. The portion of the statute to which the amendment involved in these cases related had been held unconstitutional on the ground that its subject was not expressed in the title of the act, and the amendment did not attempt to cure this defect. The most that can be said is that they hold that the amendatory act was void, not because it attempted to amend an unconstitutional statute, but because the amendment did not cure or remove the defect; and, consequently, the statute as amended remained subject to the same constitutional objection that adhered to the original act.

b. Curing defect in title of statute by amendment of title only.

There are two Pennsylvania cases which hold that a statute which is unconstitutional because 60 L. R. A.

its subject-matter is not expressed in its title cannot be rendered valid by an amendatory act which simply amends its title. Shear v. Potter County, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 289; Teeple v. Wayne County, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 361.

In the Shear Case the court said: "This is an attempt by the legislature of 1899 to make a void statute of 1897 legal and valid by simply amending its title. We do not think this can be done. It cannot be argued that the act of 1897 was not void. We have a class of cases upholding portions of acts of assembly and declaring other portions of the same acts void. This may be done where, by striking down the illegal part, a good and valid act capable of enforcement will remain." The court then went on to say that the act involved did not belong to this class, but must either stand or fall as a whole, and concluded by saying: "It is an alarming proposition that a legislature can pass an act, void because the subject of it is not expressed in the title, and then, after it has gone among the statutes of the commonwealth, a subsequent legislature impose its burdens upon the public by simply manufacturing for the void act a good title."

In the Teeple Case the court, after holding that the original act was unconstitutional, said: "The legislature has attempted to put life into this dead body by ingrafting it with a new head. If the main stock were alive, and only the top were affected, this ingrafting process might give it new life. A transfusion of blood may save a dying patient, but a dead one cannot be resurrected by such process. The original act never was a law. By reason of its constitutional infringement, it was void and dead and could not be revived in this manner." Whether the court based its decision in the Teeple Case solely upon the reasoning above quoted is rendered somewhat uncertain by the fact that such language is followed by a quotation from the Pennsylvania Constitution which declares that no law shall be revived, amended, or the provisions thereof extended or conferred by references to its title only.

road board, to increase or diminish the number or change the boundaries of the districts. The foundation of the lamp tax is an act entitled "An Act Authorizing the Division of Townships into Street Lighting Districts and the Erection and Maintenance of Street Lights Therein and the Election of Street Light Commissioners in Said District," passed May 25, 1894 (P. L. p. 540; 3 Gen. Stat. p. 3669), as amended March 25, 1896 (P. L. p. 132). The act of 1894 authorized the township committee of any township in any county of the second and third class in the state to set off and divide the said township into districts, to be designated by numbers, and to alter the same from time to time, and by resolution to define and declare the limits, boundaries, and numbers of the districts; and it was provided that the same, being so defined and declared, should be deemed and taken as street lighting districts, each of which should be a body corporate under the name of "Street Lighting District No.—," and have power to sue and be sued, make and use a common seal, and all other corporate powers necessary for carrying out the powers conferred by the act. It was further provided that on the first Tuesday of June of each year the legal voters of such district should be authorized to meet for the purpose of electing three commissioners of the district, and to determine by ballot, by the vote of the majority of those present and voting, a sum of money to be raised and expended within the district for the ensuing year for the erection and maintenance of street lights. It was further provided that the sum so appropriated should be certified to the commissioners, who should give notice to the township assessor to assess the same upon the taxable property within the district, and that the taxes so assessed should be collected by the township collector, and paid over to the commissioners of the district, who were empowered to expend the same for the purpose of lighting the streets within the district. The act of 1896 by amendment eliminated the restriction of the original act to townships in particular counties.

We agree that the act of 1893 was unconstitutional for the reason given in the supreme court in the case of State ex rel. Allison v. Blake, 57 N. J. L. 6, 25 L. R. A. 480, 29 Atl. 417. In Smith v. Howell, 60 N. J. L. 384, 38 Atl. 180, in an opinion in the supreme court upholding the act of 1894 as amended it was rightly conceded that the original act was unconstitutional; but we do not approve the reason given for that concession. Such reason was that the title of the act could not support legislation not extending to all townships. The case of Beverly v. Wahn, 57 N. J. L. 143, 30 Atl. 545, was cited as authority; but in that case the object expressed in the title of the statute involved was legislation respecting "the cities of this state,"—a phraseology necessarily extending to all such cities, while the enactment was not so extensive. The opinion delivered in the cause, which seems to have been misleading by reason of a terse ness otherwise admirable, has been properly explained in Johnson v. Asbury Park, 60 N. J. L. 427, 431, 39 Atl. 693, and Kennedy v. Belmar, 61 N. J. L. 20, 25, 38 Atl. 756. The real reason of unconstitutionality of the act of 1894 was that the townships of the specified counties had no characteristics to differentiate them from townships of other counties. The act, therefore, was in violation of article 4, § 7, ¶ 11, of the Constitution, prohibiting private, local, or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties.

It is contended for the plaintiff in error that, notwithstanding the amendments of 1896, the legislation recited is still unconstitutional. A preliminary question raised is of the validity of the two acts of 1896, independently considered. It is argued that, as the original statutes were void, they could not be amended. For the purposes of this case it may be conceded that the unconstitutional provisions referred to were inseparable from the legislative intent, so that in each case the entire statute was unconstitutional. The question raised, therefore, is fairly presented. The argument is that an unconstitutional statute is a nullity. Granting this, it does not follow that it may not be imported into valid legislation by appropriate reference. It is entirely within the legislative power to give effect to documents without their full recital. Statutes validating agreements of lease, merger, or consolidation of railroad corporations are usually cast in that form (e. g., P. L. 1871, pp. 946-1093; P. L. 1872, p. 567). The matter is one purely of identification. Surely nothing can be more definite than a reference to a document that has been regularly promulgated as a public statute. In Mortland v. State, 52 N. J. L. 521, 20 Atl. 673, it was held by this court that a statute providing for election of chosen freeholders of a county from assembly districts created under previous legislation was valid, whether such districts could be constitutionally created or not. But I am prepared to go farther, and hold that an unconstitutional statute is nevertheless a statute; that is, a legislative act. Such a statute is commonly spoken of as void. I should prefer to call it unenforceable, because in conflict with a paramount law. If properly to be called void, it is only so with reference to claims based upon it. Neither of the three great departments to which the Constitution has committed government by the people can encroach upon the domain of another. The function of the judicial department with respect to legislation deemed unconstitutional is not exercised in rem, but always in personam. The supreme court cannot set aside a statute as it can a municipal ordinance. It simply ignores statutes deemed unconstitutional. For many purposes an unconstitutional statute may influence judicial judgment, where, for example, under color of it private or public action has been taken. An unconstitutional statute is not merely blank paper. The solemn act of the legislature is a fact to be reckoned with. Nowhere has power been vested to expunge it or remove it from its proper place among statutes.

The plaintiff in error, in support of his contention, refers us to this injunction of the Constitution: "No law shall be revived or amended by reference to its title only, but the act revived, or the section or sections amended, shall be inserted at length." Art. 4, § 7, ¶ 4. The provision as to revival has no bearing on the present case. The claim is that under the provision as to amendment, where a statute is wholly unconstitutional, an amendment of the section or sections that make it so leaves the other sections unaffected, unless inserted at length in the new statute, and that they should be considered as if never enacted, so that the new legislation is incomplete and ineffectual. This is a strained and unnatural construction of the provision. To me it seems very plain that the two documents are to be read together, and if, when so read, a constitutional enactment appears, the courts must give it effect. Of course, the other provision of the same paragraph of the Constitution, that the object of every law shall be expressed in its title, must be considered; and I concede that a statute defective in that regard cannot be made constitutional, by an amendment of its title, in a statute similarly defective. For example, if "An Act Respecting Wills" should purport to treat of transactions inter vivos, it could not quoad hoc be given effect by legislation enacted simply under the title, "An Act to Amend an Act Respecting Wills," even though the enactment professed to amend the title of the original statute. But where the title of a statute is comprehensive of the legislation, both original and amendatory, I see no constitutional or other objection to perfecting by amendment that which was originally defective. It is absurd to say that inquirers need pay no attention to a bill introduced as an amendment to a cited act with such a comprehensive title, simply because they conceive that the original act was unconstitutional.

Inferentially the point has already been ruled in this court. In Union Twp. v. Rader, 39 N. J. L. 509, an act of the legislature was held unconstitutional because its object was not expressed in its title; but "An Act to Repeal" that statute was held efficacious to compel payment of claims incurred under it. The provisions for that purpose were adjudged to be incidental to an object expressed by a title of repealer alone, and were upheld, though intelligible only by reference back to the statute repealed. The opinion was by Chief Justice Beasley, and was delivered on demurrer to a declaration in a suit on such claims. In Union Twp. v. Rader, 41 N. J. L. 617, a judgment in the action, recovered on the merits, was unanimously affirmed. The opinion of this court was read by Chancellor Runyon, who said (p. 621): "The supreme court in Union Twp. v. Rader, 39 N. J. L. 509, passed upon all the questions which are presented here, except that which relates to the character of the debts. I concur in the views of that court in regard to the questions dealt with in the opinion in that case." If an unconstitutional statute is a nullity, no such legislation as that sustained in the case cited could have been constitutionally possible under a mere title of supererogative repeal. On the other hand, if, as adjudged, inquirers should infer, merely from a title of proposed repealer of an unconstitutional statute, that proper equitable relief to those who have relied upon it may be afforded in the repealing statute, a fortiori should it be held that they should infer from a title of amendment of such a statute that it is proposed to remove its defects. A view opposite to that now taken would lead to much confusion. Many statutes are of doubtful constitutionality. To require that the removal of such a doubt should, at the peril of those interested, require an entirely new enactment, involving an express or implied repealer of the doubtful legislation, would be most unreasonable. After careful consideration of the subject, I have reached the conclusion that a statute so framed as to be wholly or in part unconstitutional, but having a title expressing a constitutional object, may by amendatory legislation be rendered constitutional without having recourse to an enactment independent throughout its provisions.

I come, therefore, to the question of the validity of the amended legislation. Under our Constitution the power of the legislature over the administration of local government is unlimited, except by the inhibition, above cited, of private local or special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties. Road districts, like school districts, are well-recognized local governmental agencies, and may be either corporate or quasi corporate. Dill. Mun. Corp. 1st ed. § 10. Districts for street lighting purposes, though less common, are equally intra vires. Powers of local government may be divided and subdivided at the legislative will, and different agencies may exercise powers, separately committed, within the same territory. So far there can be no dispute. The requirement of generality is met in the legislation before us by its extension to all townships. Hermann v. Guttenberg, 63 N. J. L. 616, 44 Atl. 758. The condition of popular acceptance imposed as to road districts is valid. Re Cleveland, 52 N. J. L. 188, 7 L. R. A. 431, 19 Atl. 17, 20 Atl. 317. The only arguable objections are two, which are common to both statutory schemes and have been strongly urged upon us:

(1) That the vesting in the township committees of the function of dividing the township into districts for the respective legislative purposes is an unwarrantable delegation of power. It is assumed that authority to define the districts is tantamount to authority to create them. But this is clearly not so. The difference may be illustrated by familiar examples. The general act for the formation of boroughs, approved April 5, 1878 (1 Gen. Stat. p. 179), was declared constitutional by the supreme court in State v. Clayton, 53 N. J. L. 277, 21 Atl. 1026.

For nearly twenty years it formed the fundamental law under which scores of municipalities were organized, and is even yet the source of their existence, although now governed by a statute embracing all boroughs (P. L. 1897, p. 285). This act of 1878 on certain conditions gave authority to the owners of one tenth of the taxable real estate within limits fixed by themselves to set in motion proceedings for the erection of a borough embracing that territory by consent of the majority of the legal voters therein. "An Act Providing for the Incorporation of Cities," approved March 22, 1895 (1 Gen. Stat. p. 785), authorized township committees, on petition of fifty resident freeholders suggesting a district for a city, to enlarge or diminish its area and to submit the question of incorporation, as a city, of the district thus designated to the legal voters thereof. In Stout v. Glen Ridge, 59 N. J. L. 201, 35 Atl. 913, in this court, the validity of this legislation was taken for granted. The history of municipal creation in this state and elsewhere abounds in like instances of what may be termed delegation of legislative power to define territorial limits. The case is analogous to that presented by general laws providing for private corporations. The designated number of persons, by signing a certificate in compliance with the particular statute invoked, become a body corporate. The power to be a corporation is conferred by the legislature, but is inoperative until recipients are provided. The grant of power to commissioners appointed by mayors to fix the number and lines of city wards for general municipal purposes has been upheld by this court in State, McLaughlin, Prosecutor, v. Newark, 58 N. J. L. 202, 34 Atl. 13. There is no reason why a representative township committee should not be selected as an appropriate body to fix the number and lines of districts for legislative purposes more limited. In this state from a very early day the township committees have been authorized to divide the townships into road districts. Pat. Laws, p. 325; 3 Gen. Stat. p. 2817, § 52. In 1846 (P. L. p. 164) the right to divide townships into convenient school districts was vested in a town superintendent of schools, to be elected by the people, and a district composed of parts of two townships, even if in different counties, might be established by the joint action of their superintendents. This law subsisted until 1867 (P. L. p. 360), when the power was transferred to a county superintendent of schools, and thus continued until the school law of 1894 consolidated into one all the school districts of a township, except cities, boroughs, and incorporated towns, each of which was made a distinct district. 3 Gen. Stat. p. 3059, pl. 246; Id. p. 3061, pl. 257. The validity of this legislation, conformable as it was to that of many other states, has never been challenged, and in my judgment is unquestionable. The logical result of this train of reasoning is that the road districts and street lighting districts now in question were constitutionally established.

The other objection is: (2) That only to the political divisions of the state can the power to raise money by taxation be committed, and that the districts in question are not such. Granted the major premise, I cannot concede the minor one. Depue, J., speaking for this court in Bernards Twp. v. Allen, 61 N. J. L. 228, 236, 39 Atl. 716, 49 Atl. 722, said: "The legislature, in the exercise of its sovereign power, may confer upon the minor political subdivisions of the state (which are merely instrumentalities for the better administration of the government in matters of local concern) power to impose and levy local rates, taxes, and assessments to provide the revenue by which municipal expenses are borne and debts and liabilities paid, on the principle that for local purposes the local authorities are the representatives of the people. The powers conferred on boards of chosen freeholders in the counties, and upon other political subdivisions, such as cities, towns, townships, etc., are instances in which this legislative power has been conferred upon minor subdivisions of the state." It is plain that the learned judge never meant to limit the range of subdivision. That matter must be one of legislative discretion, as he himself declared in State ex rel. White House School Dist. No. 71 v. Readington Twp. 36 N. J. L. 66. A borough or other municipality may have its sphere of taxation, and yet be subject in other respects to the township, of which, for many purposes, it remains a part. State, Pancoast, Prosecutrix, v. Troth, 34 N. J. L. 377, 36 N. J. L. 422. Improvement commissioners may lawfully tax property. State, Hoey, Prosecutor, v. Ocean Twp. 30 N. J. L. 75; State, Auryansen, Prosecutor, v. Hackensack Improvement Commission, 45 N. J. L. 113. The narrowness of scope of the powers conferred on the governmental agency is not the test. Ibid. A single governmental power carries with it pro tanto all the essential elements of sovereignty. In State, Lydecker, Prosecutor, v. Englewood Twp. Drainage & Water Comrs. 41 N. J. L. 154, 157, Mr. Justice Dixon thus states the "distinctive marks" of political divisions: "That they embrace a certain territory and its inhabitants, organized for the public advantage, and not in the interest of particular individuals or classes; that their chief design is the exercise of governmental functions; and that to the electors residing within each is to some extent committed the power of local government, to be wielded either mediately or immediately within their territory for the peculiar benefit of the people there residing."

Applying the test suggested, which seems a proper one, the legislation in question amply fulfills it. The policy of multiplying governmental agencies and subdividing powers is, with much reason, attacked by the plaintiff in error; but that consideration has not been committed to the judicial department of our government. The courts in such matters can only look at the question of the legislative power. On the question of such power there is no decision of this court adverse to the views above expressed, and most of the rulings, if not the dicta, in the supreme court, are consistent with such views. In State ex rel. Allison v. Blake, 57 N. J. L. 6, 25 L. R. A. 480, 29 Atl. 417, Beasley, Ch. J., suggests a doubt of the legal feasibility of committing to freeholders the executive powers of the act; but he does not even remotely intimate any difficulty inhering in the creation of road districts or the vesting in them of the power of taxation. The doubt he does suggest must be resolved in favor of the power to require a property qualification in public officials. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 408. In State, McClosky, Prosecutor, v. Chamberlin, 37 N. J. L. 388, the essential element, in a sustainable political division, of the popular voice of the inhabitants of the territory, was lacking in the drainage districts designated by the statute held invalid, and the tax imposed was an arbitrary one. In State, Baldwin, Prosecutor, v. Fuller, 39 N. J. L. 576, Affirmed in 40 N. J. L. 615, in State, Lydecker, Prosecutor, v. Englewood Twp. Drainage & Water Comrs. 41 N. J. L. 154, in State, Morgan, Prosecutor, v. Elizabeth, 44 N. J. L. 57, and in Howell v. Millville, 60 N. J. L. 95, 36 Atl. 691,—there were the same substantial defects in the legislation involved or criticised. In State, Baldwin, Prosecutor, v. Fuller, Mr. Justice Van Syckel, in answer to the supposed parallel of a school district, very aptly distinguished that institution. He said: "It is a district incorporated for an object affecting only those residing in it. They have absolute control of the question whether money shall be raised, and the facilities it affords for acquiring an education are limited to those upon whom the burden is cast." All the considerations mentioned apply with full force to the road districts and lamp districts now in controversy. The deliverance of Mr. Justice Lippincott in State, Carter, Prosecutor, v. Wade, 59 N. J. L. 119, 35 Atl. 649, was mere dictum, for the decision of the cause was rightly rested on the implied repeal of the statute impugned. The only case that presents features at all like those now being considered is State, Peck, Prosecutor, v. Raritan Twp. 52 N. J. L. 319, 19 Atl. 610; but a critical examination will show that the statute there condemned is clearly distinguishable from those now sub judice. Mr. Justice Garrison, who participated in the decision, evidently found it no barrier to the result reached by the same court, speaking through him, in Smith v. Howell, 60 N. J. L. 384, 38 Atl. 180, where the amended street lighting district act now challenged was upheld, and in the judgment at present under review. It is true that the statute held unconstitutional in State, Peck, Prosecutor, v. Raritan Twp. did leave to the legal voters of the respective lamp districts authorized the fixing of the sum to be therein raised by taxation; but it was, nevertheless, held that they were not political divisions. Mr. Justice Magie, who spoke for the court, after conceding that dual government with distinct functions may coexist in the same territory, and that all that is necessary, in order to make an organization included within a township a political division, is that it shall have a public character and be endowed with some powers of local government, goes on to state the reasons that satisfy him that no such organization was designed to be established by the act then before the court. The difference from that now involved is very striking. He says: "The district is not given power to elect officers to act for it. It is not given a corporate name, nor corporate authority, even to contract for the erection and maintaining of the street lamps; and, while the voters therein are authorized to determine the amount to be raised for street lighting, the money voted is raised and expended by the township officers, who represent the township. It is clearly implied, from the terms of the act, that the township committee shall determine what streets shall be lighted, where the street lamps shall be erected, and how long they shall be maintained. In the disposition of the money raised the district has no voice. In respect, therefore, to this function of local government, the lighting of streets, the district is not given a separate and independent existence, nor endowed with any power except as a part of the township. It is not designed to become a political corporation or division of the state such as that considered in State, Auryansen, Prosecutor, v. Hackensack Improvement Commission, 45 N. J. L. 113.

The legislation now being considered presents most, if not all, of the features thus noted as absent from that there involved. I am satisfied that it was the legislative design to constitute the road districts and street lighting districts in question political divisions, for the purpose of the exercise therein of the governmental powers conferred and of incidental taxation, and that such design was thereby accomplished. The determination of the supreme court in the present case, therefore, was right; but, doubtless through inadvertence, there is an error in the judgment. The land of the prosecutor was sold for the taxes of 1897, and his writ directly attacked the sale. If the park tax was illegal, as declared by the court, the sale that included it was also illegal. Hopper v. Malleon, 16 N. J. Eq. 382; State, Dixon, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 37 N. J. L. 39, approved in this court in Pugh v. Sinking Fund Comrs. 53 N. J. L. 629, 631, 23 Atl. 270. It was admitted by counsel for the defendants in error that the park tax was illegal, and it plainly was so, for the reason that the provisions of the act of 1893 were too meager with respect to parks to be effectual, and the expenditure of money raised for parks was not limited to the road district voting it, but was made general for the township.

So much of the judgment of the Supreme Court as affirms the sale of the lands of the plaintiff in error for the taxes of 1897 should be reversed, and in all other respects such judgment should be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

FOLEY, Admr., etc., of Edmond Lynch,
Appt.,
v.
BROEKSMIT.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The allowance of $455 out of an undertaker's bill for $526 for the burial of an aged janitor, whose companions were laboring men, and whose most intimate friend was a street sweeper, and whose estate was less than $5,000, is excessive.
2. A witness's estimate of the reasonableness of the expenses of a funeral is binding on neither jury nor court, in an action to recover therefor from decedent's estate.

(February 4, 1903.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Linn County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to establish a claim for funeral expenses against the estate of Edmond Lynch, deceased. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

Proceedings to establish a claim for funeral expenses attending the burial of Edmond Lynch, deceased. The administrator pleaded that the expenses were extravagant and foolish, considering the condition of the decedent's estate and his social standing and station in life. Trial was had to a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $455. The administrator appeals.

Messrs. Smith & Smith for appellant.

Messrs. H. M. Troy and Redmond & Stewart for appellee.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Edmond Lynch was about eighty years of age at the time of his death. He had for a number of years been a janitor in the general offices of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids, & Northern Railroad Company at Cedar Rapids. He had no relatives in that city, and boarded with a Mrs. Weir, who received her pay from the paymaster of the railroad company. His associates were generally laboring men, and his most intimate friend was a street sweeper. He left an estate valued at not exceeding $5,000. When he died, plaintiff received a call to go to the place where the body was lying, and to take charge of the remains. He embalmed the body, dressed it, furnished the casket, hearse, five carriages, chairs, etc., for the funeral, and presented the following bill to the administrator for payment:

Oct. 31.	To washing and embalming body	$ 25 00
Oct. 31.	Shaving	5 00
Oct. 31.	Burial robe	20 00
Oct. 31.	Burial slippers	3 50
Nov. 1.	Casket	425 00
Nov. 2.	Use of candelabra	5 00
Nov. 2.	Chairs and candles	2 50
Nov. 2.	Hearse	10 00
Nov. 2.	Wagonette	4 00
Nov. 2.	2 landaus, at $4.00	8 00
Nov. 2.	2 three-seated carriages, at $4.00	8 00
Nov. 2.	Personal services rendered	10 00
		<hr/> $526 00

Payment was refused, and this action followed. The trial court instructed: "(3) You are instructed that the estate of deceased is liable for all reasonable and proper expenses necessary for decent interment of the deceased, and suitable for the station in life of deceased. Now, in this case you will satisfy yourselves from the evidence whether the items of charge are reasonable, and in conformity with the station in life of deceased, or otherwise; and if, from the evidence, you find that any of the charges in the account are not reasonable as necessary expenses attending the decent interment of deceased as funeral expenses, you will disallow the same, and allow plaintiff only what the evidence satisfies you the same are reasonably worth." Defendant contends that the verdict is contrary to these instructions, and entirely without support in the evidence. The law with reference to such matters is well settled, and generally understood. Such charges are not, strictly speaking, debts due from the deceased, but charges which the law out of decency imposes upon his estate. And, so far as these are reasonable in amount, they take legal priority of all such debts; as, likewise, do the administration charges. A decent burial should comport with the social condition of the deceased and the amount of his fortune. Justice to creditors, as well as to one's surviving family, demands, however, that there should be no extravagant outlay to their loss. If due regard to the character and social or public standing of the deceased requires a more costly funeral, public or private liberality should defray the additional cost. "Foolish and extravagant funerals, ordered by those not immediately concerned in the estate, are not to bind the representative and the immediate family of the deceased." Schouler, Exrs. & Admsrs. 2d ed. § 421. Of course, one who furnishes reasonable burial equipment should be allowed the value thereof from the estate of the deceased, although it was not ordered by the administrator, or authorized by him. But whatever is furnished should reasonably comport with the station in life of the de ceased and the amount of his property. The privilege thus granted should not be construed into a license to plunder the estate. Lynch was a Catholic, and his burial was in accord with the customs and rites of that denomination. This was, of course, perfectly legitimate; but it is not shown, nor will we infer, that such customs call for gold trimmings or silk and satin linings of the casket. Our observation has led us to believe that this Christian denomination requires no more expensive funeral corteges for its members than any other. Surely, one may die in this faith without being troubled by visions of the undertaker plundering his estate. Seriously, the matter of a man's faith has little to do with the expenses of his funeral. It may, of course, call for some additional properties, which the law, out of regard for its policy of religious freedom, will consider as necessities. But the mere religious faith of one deceased adds nothing to the value of what is or should be furnished. We may readily agree that all the items mentioned in the bill were of such a character that they should have been furnished without being bound to accept the prices affixed as reasonable. That is to say, the deceased needed embalming, he needed proper clothing for burial, candelabra, chairs, candles, carriages, and proper services. But his burial robe need not be of satin, nor his casket metallic. The only evidence from plaintiff as to the value of the items furnished was, "They are all reasonable." He admitted on cross-examination that he never heard of a more expensive robe than the one he furnished; that he never put as good a robe as this one on a corpse before or since; that he had sold caskets from $6 up to $200 and $250, and that he had never before or since sold one for $425; that the casket he furnished was made of oak, broadcloth, and glass, and covered with broadcloth, and that it was trimmed with what is known as silver and gold plated trimmings. It was shown in the evidence introduced by defendant that the customary price for the use of a hearse was $5; that plaintiff paid but $3 apiece for the landaus, $3 each for the carriages, $3 for the wagonette, and borrowed the candelabra, for the use of which he paid nothing. It was also shown that the usual price for embalming was $10, that the usual price of a casket for such cases was from $40 to $60, that $5 would buy a very nice robe, and that there was no charge for personal services when the body was embalmed. It was also shown that $40 or $50 is the medium price for a casket. The testimony leaves no doubt in our minds that plaintiff gave Lynch the best he had, without any regard for expense, thinking, perhaps, that, as there were no known relatives, there would be no one to object. He furnished the most expensive materials, and provided such a casket as he had never sold "before or since." Manifestly, this does not comport with a modest estate of less than $5,000, nor with the station the deceased had in business or society. The mere statement of the case condemns the claims more efficiently than any argument we can make. But it is said that plaintiff testified that the prices were reasonable, and the jury was justified in believing him; and it is also argued that the whole matter was for the jury in any event. Suffice it to say that neither court nor jury is bound by a witness's estimate as to values, and, while the issue presented in this case is ordinarily for the jury, the case may be so plain that it is the duty of the court to interfere. That is the situation here. The idea that a man dying leaving an estate of less than $5,000 should have a casket costing $425, and that his estate should be burdened with funeral expenses amounting to $526, is little short of ridiculous. Courts will not permit such an injustice to be tolerated, no matter what the finding of the jury. The case is reversed, and remanded for a new trial, or, at plaintiff's option, he may have judgment in this court for the sum of $150. This option is to be exercised within thirty days from the filing of this opinion. Plaintiff will, in any event, pay the costs of this appeal.

Reversed.

ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment refusing to vacate a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hayden & Hayden and Welch & Welch, for plaintiff in error:

Collins was, without fault or negligence on his part, deprived of the right of appeal.

Until the enactment of chap. 275, Sess. Laws 1901, a bill of exceptions, to be available, must have been settled, signed, and filed during the same term of court at which the rulings of the court complained of were made.

The ordinary motion for a new trial would not afford the proper remedy, because, whenever matters occurring either prior or subsequent to the rendition of a judgment are alleged as cause for the recalling or vacation thereof, an issue of fact is, or may be, presented, which is triable by jury.

The wrong which our client has suffered presents a case which must appeal so strongly to the conscience of the court that a denial of the relief prayed for must seem equivalent to a denial of justice. Under such circumstances it can never be the duty of a court to refuse the suitor's prayer upon the technical ground that none of the existing forms of remedy are exactly applicable to the case presented.

The office of a writ of coram nobis is to bring the attention of the court to, and obtain relief from, errors of fact, or a valid defense existing in the facts of the case, but which, without negligence on the part of the defendant, was not made either through duress or fraud or excusable mistake; these 60 L. Mr. A. A. Godard, Attorney General, also for defendant in error.

Doster, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding in error coram nobis, begun in the district court to vacate a judgment of conviction of John H. Collins of the crime of murder, and to secure for him a retrial. The court below denied the writ, and from its order of denial this proceeding in error has been instituted. The sole ground upon which a claim of right to the writ is based is that Collins was prevented from appealing his case to this court because of his inability to make up a record embodying his exceptions to the rulings of the court trying him, and showing the errors committed against him, within the time allowed by law for perfecting and filing such record. That, however grievous the hardship, does not constitute a reason for the issuance of the writ of error coram nobis. That writ lies only to correct the record of the trial itself in matters of fact existing at the time of the pronouncement of the judgment, but in respect of which the court was unadvised, but of which, had it been advised, the judgment would not have been pronounced. The unvarying test of the writ coram nobis is mistake or lack of knowledge of facts inhering in the judgment itself. It has never been granted to relieve from consequences arising subsequently to the judgment. In State v. Calhoun, 50 Kan. 523, 18 L. R. A. 838, 32 Pac. 38, it was allowed in order to relieve from the consequences of a plea of guilty made through duress of fears induced by threats of mob violence. In Asbell v. State, 62 Kan. 209, 61 Pac. 690, it was denied for the reason that the facts on which the application was predicated were known during the progress of the trial, or were available on motion for new trial, or, if not known in time for use on motion for new trial, would be merely cumulative upon facts which were known at that time. In that case it was held that "the office of the writ of error coram nobis is to bring to the attention of the court, for correction, an error of fact,—one not appearing on the face of the record, unknown to the court or the party affected, and which, if known in season, would have prevented the rendition of the judgment challenged." In Dobbs v. State, 63 Kan. 321, 65 Pac. 658, the writ was denied as a means of relief from prejudicial matters occurring before and on the trial, such as inability to learn and present facts entitling the party to a change of venue, ignorance, or unfaithful conduct of his attorney, etc. The court, among other things, held that "the application for a writ of error coram nobis must show that, if the facts upon which the error is predicated had been presented to the trial court, the judgment complained of could not have been entered." All the decisions are to the effect that the writ lies only to correct errors of fact, in ignorance or disregard of which the judgment was pronounced, to relieve from which no other remedy exists. None of the courts have used it to relieve from the misfortune of being unable to prosecute an appeal for the correction of errors of law. We cannot allow it to be used for such purpose. We cannot invent forms of procedure to relieve unfortunate suitors.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

W. B. DUDLEY, Appt.,
v.
City of FLEMINGSBURG.

(.....Ky.....)

A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries caused by failure to prevent coasting in its streets, since the duty of preventing such conduct rests on the officers as servants of the state.

(March 3, 1903.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fleming County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. A. Cassidy, J. D. Pumphrey, and J. F. Maher for appellant.

Messrs. W. G. Dearing and O. R. Bright for appellee.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant sued the city of Flemingsburg, alleging that in the month of February, 1902, a heavy sleet had fallen, and the streets of the city were covered with ice and snow, which remained on the streets for several days, during which time the mayor and the other officials of the city suffered, permitted, and encouraged men and boys to congregate on and coast down Main street, a distance of 400 or 500 yards, on sleds and slides, at the rate of about 75 miles per hour, to the great danger of persons using this street and other streets crossing it; "that this coasting was kept up almost throughout the entire day of the 7th of February, 1902, the day on which appellant was injured, and many complained to the authorities, the mayor, police judge, councilmen, and marshal, and they neglected and refused to prevent or stop the illegal usage and practice of coasting on the street, although the street was appropriated almost entirely to the use of boys and reckless men, white and black, who were boisterous and riotous in their behavior and manner, and the same was continued for several days, with the knowledge of the officials of the defendant, without protest from them, or any effort to prevent it, and that the officials could have prevented the illegal and dangerous use of the streets if they had made any effort to do so; that on the evening of the 7th day of February, 1902, about the hour of seven o'clock, appellant started to the business portion of the city, and in his effort to cross Main street, and when exercising ordinary care for his own safety, he was run against by one of the coasters with a sled, and was knocked down, and his head injured, his collar bone broken, and he was otherwise bruised and severely injured, and was put to great expense in the way of medical and doctor bills to effect a cure; and that he was permanently injured, to his damage in the sum of $2,000." The court below sustained a demurrer to that petition, and appellant is here on appeal.

There are two general principles underlying the administration of government of municipal corporations: The one is that a municipal corporation, in the preservation of peace, maintenance of good order, and the enforcement of the laws for the safety of the public, possesses governmental functions, and represents the state. The other is where the municipal corporation exercises those powers and privileges conferred for private, local, or merely corporate purposes, peculiarly for the benefit of the corporation. Under the former the city is not liable for the malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance of its officers. Under the latter, it is. Malfeasance is the unjust performance of some act which the party had no right, or which he had contracted not, to do. Misfeasance is the wrongful and injurious exercise of lawful authority, or the doing of a lawful act in an unlawful manner. Nonfeasance is the nonperformance of some act which ought to be performed. Appellant's petition is, in substance and effect, to recover damages from appellee for personal injuries by reason of the misfeasance or nonfeasance of its officials in authorizing and consenting to the coasting on its streets by disorderly persons and riotous assemblies, and failing to prohibit and prevent the same. In the case of Schultz v. Milwaukee, 49 Wis. 254, 35 Am. Rep. 779, 5 N. W. 342, the court said: "The coasting or sliding down Poplar street, in the manner and to the extent charged in the complaint, was, while being indulged in, a grievous public nuisance, which the city authorities ought to have prevented or suppressed. But this duty is a public or police, rather than a corporate, duty, in the performance of which the corporation, as such, has no particular interest, and from which it derives no special benefit or advantage in its corporate capacity, but which it is bound to see performed in pursuance of a duty imposed by law for the general welfare of the inhabitants or of the community." And the court in that case relieved the city from liability. In the case of Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 130, 44 Am. Rep. 9 (a case in which the facts are the same as those in the case at bar), the court said: "It is obvious that in the case before us the injury did not result from any defect in the highway. It was produced by the act of those improperly and unlawfully using the highway, which was at the time, and but for the unlawful acts of those improperly using the street, in a reasonably safe and convenient condition for public travel. The complaint is not that the appellant's son was injured because of defects in the street rendering it unsafe and unfit for public use, but because persons, while engaged in improperly using the street, ran their coasting sleds against his son, thereby injuring him. If the appellee is liable for the injury thus produced, it would follow, logically, that it would be liable for an injury caused by loafers lounging upon its streets, occurring in the presence of its officers, if it were known that such persons were accustomed to lounge and loaf upon its streets. To hold incorporated cities liable for such injuries would be unjust, and, we think, without the sanction of law." In the case of Norristown v. Fitzpatrick, 94 Pa. 121, 39 Am. Rep. 771, the court said: "The appellee could only arrest and stop the sport of coasting upon its streets through its officers and police force, but, as held in the same case, the appellee would not be responsible for the neglect or failure of its officers to stop those engaged in thus using its streets." [Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 130, 44 Am. Rep. 9.]

The appellant, in his petition, claims that the use and the manner of use of this street by the coasters amounted to an obstruction of the street for which the city was liable. In the case of Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 130, 44 Am. Rep. 9 "it is held . . . that anything in the condition of a highway which renders it unsafe or inconvenient for travel is a defect or want of repair. It may be a hole in the highway, or it may consist of a stone or log or other obstacle left on its surface, or a post standing within its limits, or a barrier stretched across it, though not touching it, or it may be trees or walls standing by or upon it, and liable to fall and injure travelers, or it may be an awning projecting over it." For injuries from such obstructions the city would be liable. Continuing, the court in that case said: "But we are not aware of any precedent for holding an illegal use of the highway by men, animals, vehicles, engines, or any other object, while movable and actually being moved by human will and direction, and neither fixed to, nor resting on, nor remaining in one position within the traveled part of, the highway, to be a defect or want of repair for which the city or town is liable." It is obvious that in the case before us the injury did not result from any defect or obstruction in the highway. It was produced by the acts of those improperly and unlawfully using the highway, and for which the city or corporation is not liable. To the same effect is the case of Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 563, 56 Am. Dec. 585, in which a mob destroyed property of Prather in the city of Lexington. The court, after discussing defects in the petition, used this language: "But we place the decision of the question arising upon the demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration upon broader grounds. The officers of a city are quasi civil officers of the government, although appointed by the corporation. They are personally liable for their malfeasance or nonfeasance in office, but for neither is the corporation responsible." To the same effect is the case of Ward v. Louisville, 16 B. Mon. 191. In the case of Jolly v. Hawesville, 89 Ky. 281, 12 S. W. 313, the facts were that numerous persons congregated on the streets of Hawesville, in the presence of and with the consent of the city officials, with guns and pistols, and engaged in sham battle, pursuing and shooting at each other in such close proximity as to endanger the lives of those who were not, as well as those who were, engaged; and this continued from early in the morning until late in the evening, without any effort on the part of the marshal, though aware of it, to stop it; and plaintiff's son, who was not engaged in this unlawful amusement, was shot in the eye with a wad and killed, and the plaintiff sued the city for damages. The court, applying the principles of law above named, dismissed her petition; and the court in that case, after referring to Pollock v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 221, 26 Am. Rep. 260, and Greenwood

v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 226, 26 Am. Rep. 263, and the two cases, Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 563, 56 Am. Dec. 585; Ward v. Louisville, 16 B. Mon. 191, as sustaining the court's position, used this language: "Such has been the uniform ruling of this court, and a different one would be not only perverse of the main design of creating municipal corporations, intended principally as auxiliary of the state government, but open the door for actions against cities on account of every personal injury in any degree attributable to misfeasance or nonfeasance of police officers, and thus impose burdens on taxpayers in no just sense at fault or liable. This long and well settled doctrine has not been modified by statute of this state, except to the extent that Gen. Stat. [now Ky. Stat. § 8], § 5, chap. 1, makes a city liable for damages done to property therein by riotous and tumultuous assemblages of people. But the care and particularity with which the conditions of such liability are set out in the statute, and the restriction of it in express terms to cases of injury to property, shows the legislature did not intend thereby to authorize a recovery against a city for personal injury resulting from the malfeasance or negligence of police officers." To the same effect is the case of Madisonville v. Bishop, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2363, 57 L. R. A. 130, 67 S. W. 269. These cases all rest on the ground that the municipal corporation represents the commonwealth, and municipal officers, while engaged in those duties which relate to the public safety and the preservation of public order, are the servants of the state.

Perceiving no error, the judgment is affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

OLD TOWN BANK of Baltimore,
Appt.,
v.

J. Lawrence McCORMICK et al.

(96 Md. 341.)

Since the national bankruptcy law contains no provision for involuntary proceedings against persons engaged chiefly in the tillage of the soil, it does not supersede the provision of the state law authorizing such proceedings.

(January 21, 1903.)

APPREAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Harford County overruling demurrers to the pleas in proceedings under the state insolvency law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. R. Gill & Sons, Dallam & Rouse, and Venable, Baetjer, & Howard, for appellant:

The enactment of the national bankrupt law suspends the operation of the state insolvent laws only so far as the state law conflicts with the national law; as to cases not provided for by the national law, the state law remains operative.

Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 104, 4 L. ed. 529; Tua v. Carriere, 117 U. S. 201, 210, 29 L. ed. 855, 858, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. ed. 606.

The uniformity required is only a geographical one. It is only necessary that the same national law apply to all states.

The involuntary feature of a bankrupt law is its most important feature.

Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 193-195, 4 L. ed. 548; Collier, Bankr. § 12, pp. 116, 117, note; 2 Kent, Com. 304; Sackett v. Andross, 5 Hill, 327.

Messrs. S. A. Williams and F. R. Williams, for appellees:

Congress, by the act of 1898, intended to legislate for "a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil," by including him within the scope of its voluntary provisions, and by expressly excluding him from its involuntary features.

Congress, by its exceptions, intends a national bankrupt scheme, which shall include farmers, but shall not subject them to the severity of its involuntary features.

Parmenter Mfg. Co. v. Hamilton, 172 Mass. 178, 51 N. E. 529.

Section 71, subs. b, act 1898, though not essential to complete the uniformity of the bankrupt system, clearly shows an intention to supersede existing systems, and to test by the requirement of this act all matters relating to bankruptcies.

Shryock v. Bashore, 13 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 486, Fed. Cas. No. 12,820; VanNostrand v. Carr, 30 Md. 129; Lavender v. Gosnell, 43 Md. 159.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the circuit court for Harford county. On the 22d May, 1901, the Old Town Bank of Baltimore filed a petition in insolvency against J. Lawrence McCormick and others under the provisions of article 47, §§ 22, 23, of our Code, relating to insolvents, as amended by the Acts of 1896, chap. 446. The defendants each pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court. Their pleas are identical. The plea is as follows: "(1) That this court has no jurisdiction in these proceedings, because the insolvency laws of the state of Maryland have been suspended, superseded, or rendered inoperative by the passage of a national bankrupt law by the Congress of the United States, and this defendant pleads the said bankrupt law in bar of the jurisdiction of this court in the premises." The plaintiff bank demurred to these pleas, but the learned judge below overruled the demurrers, and his certificate states the question raised and decided on the demurrers as follows: "That the enactment of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1898 [30 Stat. at L. 544; U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418], entitled 'An Act to Establish a Uniform System of Bankruptcy throughout the United States,' and supplements and additions thereto, suspended the operation of article 47 of the Code of Public General Laws of Maryland of 1888, entitled 'Insolvents,' and all amendments thereof, and especially suspended the operation of § 22, as repealed and amended by the act of 1896, chap. 446, and § 23 thereof, including the operation of said article on persons 'engaged chiefly in farming and tillage of the soil,' and the class of persons to which the defendant J. Lawrence McCormick is alleged in the petition to belong, and that this court is without jurisdiction to grant any of the relief prayed for in said petition." From the order dismissing its petition, the plaintiff has appealed. The issue thus presented is clear, and well defined. The defendants contend that the enactment of the national bankrupt act suspended the operation of the whole insolvent law of this state, while the plaintiff maintains the position that the passage of this national law by Congress suspends the operation of our insolvent law only so far as our law conflicts with the national law, and that, inasmuch as the present bankrupt law (act of Congress of 1898 [30 Stat. at L. 544; U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418]) contains no provision for involuntary bankruptcy of persons engaged chiefly in the tillage of the soil, the provisions of our state insolvent law, so far as they apply to that excepted class, remain in full force and effect. The 60 L. R. A.

question presented must depend, in the first place, upon the provisions of the bankrupt law applicable here. Section 4, "Who may become bankrupts" (subsection "a"), provides that "any person who owes debts, except a corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt." And by subsection "b" it is enacted that "any natural person, except a wage earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil . . . may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. . . ."

1. From the year 1819, when Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the leading case of Sturges v. Crowninshield, reported in 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529, it has been held that the provision of the Constitution of the United States (art. 1, § 8, subd. 4) providing that "Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy," does not in itself inhibit the states from passing valid insolvent laws. In the case just cited it was said: "It is not the mere existence of the power, but its exercise, which is incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the states." And so, also, there has been a uniform line of decisions to the effect that, so far as Congress has failed to legislate with reference to insolvents, state laws relating to them are operative. Thus, in Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 196, 4 L. ed. 548, it is said that if it is not the mere existence of the power, but its actual exercise by the Congress of the United States, which prevents the operation of state insolvent laws, it is obvious that much inconvenience would result from that construction of the Constitution which should deny to the legislatures of the states the power of acting on this subject in consequence of the grant to Congress. "It may be thought more convenient," continued the court, "that much of it should be regulated by state legislation, and Congress may purposely omit to provide for many cases to which its power extends. It does not appear to be a violent construction of the Constitution, and is certainly a convenient one, to consider the power of the states as existing over such cases as the laws of the land may not reach." But in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. ed. 606, the rule is explicitly laid down that the power of Congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy does not exclude the rights of the states to legislate on the same subject, except when the power has been actually exercised, and the state laws conflict with those of Congress. And to the same effect are Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. 229, 17 L. ed. 531; Tua v. Carriere, 117 U. S. 210, 29 L. ed. 855, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; Ex parte Eames, 2 Story, 322, Fed. Cas. No. 4,237. In the recent case of R. H. Herron Co. v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct., decided in April of last year by the supreme court of California, and reported in 136 Cal. 279, 68 Pac. 814, it was held that, "though the Federal bankruptcy acts suspend the operation of any state laws of insolvency where there is any conflict between the two, the state laws remain in full force in so far as there is no conflict; and, as the bankruptcy act of 1898 expressly exempts all corporations from voluntary bankruptcy, and only makes subject to involuntary bankruptcy 'corporations engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, or mercantile pursuits,' the provisions of the state law applicable to a corporation engaged principally in mining [as was the California corporation] are not suspended." In the course of its opinion the court said: "If the bankruptcy act excepts a class of cases from its operation, either in express terms or by necessary implication, it must be considered that it was the intention of Congress not to interfere in that class of cases with the laws of the several states in reference thereto." A number of cases are cited by Justice Harrison, who delivered the opinion of the court, and among them is that of Clarke v. Ray, 1 Harr. & J. 318, Chief Justice Chase delivering the opinion of the court. He said: "The legislatures of the several states have competent authority to pass laws for the relief of all persons who are not comprehended within the act of Congress." See also Van Nostrand v. Carr, 30 Md. 131. It should be remarked, however, that the situation in the California case just cited somewhat differs from the one here presented. For there the insolvent proceeded against under the California insolvent law was expressly excepted from the provisions relating to the voluntary system, and was not included within, and therefore excepted by implication from, the class of corporations made subject to the involuntary system, while here the defendant who is sought to be declared an insolvent under our insolvent law is included under the general terms of the voluntary system, and expressly excepted from the involuntary system. See also Shepardson's Appeal, 36 Conn. 23; Geery's Appeal, 43 Conn. 289, 21 Am. Rep. 653; Steelman v. Mattiz, 36 N. J. L. 344; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 642.

2. This brings us to the real question in the case, namely, Is there any conflict between our insolvent law and the Federal bankruptcy law? We have already transcribed the provisions of § 4, by which it appears that the defendant is expressly excepted from the provision of the act relating to involuntary bankruptcy, and therefore as to this class to which the defendant belongs (i. e., farmers or tillers of the soil) the Federal power has not been exercised. And it therefore follows that, if this class is not within the state law, there is no existing provision under which those embraced within it can be compelled to distribute their assets fairly and equally among their creditors. In Geery's Appeal, 43 Conn. 289, 21 Am. Rep. 653, it was said: The benefit of this principle [the equal distribution of a debtor's property without preference] cannot be denied to a creditor without doing him injustice. It is a remedy which he relied on in giving credit, and to which he is fairly entitled. If that remedy is not to be found in the bankrupt act, it will not be presumed that Congress intended to take away the remedy provided by the state. Congress having limited and restricted the operation of the bankrupt act, leaving a number of cases to which it does not apply, it will not be presumed that it was thereby intended to leave creditors in such cases entirely without remedy, as must be the case if the state law is entirely inoperative. But can it be properly or correctly said that any conflict can exist between the state and the Federal law so long as the latter by express terms excludes from its operation the subject or class of persons expressly provided for by the state law? The power to enact insolvent or bankrupt laws is vested in the states, and it cannot be extinguished except by the establishment of a Federal system in conflict with the state law. And this Federal system of bankruptcy must be a genuine bankrupt law (Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529), or, in other words, as expressed in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. ed. 606, the power to pass a uniform system of bankruptcy must be actually exercised, and the state law must be in conflict with it in order to render the latter inoperative. The question, therefore, logically arises, Does the present Federal bankrupt law actually provide for involuntary proceedings against farmers? And the answer must be that it does not, but the answer of the defendant goes further and necessarily must do so in order to save his case. He says it is true that while this class is not included in, and is expressly excepted from, the involuntary feature of the system, yet it is included in the voluntary feature, and therefore it is within the scope of the national system. We cannot approve of this method of reasoning, not only because it would seem to be a "contradiction in terms to say that cases excepted from the operation of the most important part of the act are included in its scope," but because it would seem to involve the proposition that the Federal power can render inoperative the state insolvent laws applicable to involuntary insolvency, without establishing a genuine bankrupt law to take the place of the state law. As we have already seen, it has been held from an early day that it is only to the extent that Congress has actually legislated upon the subject that the statutes of the several states are suspended by its legislation. How, then, can it be said that a failure to legislate—in other words, an express exclusion—raises a conflict? But without pursuing this question further, it seems to us that the position taken by the defendant must necessarily lead to the conclusion that if the Congress of the United States can, by including this class in the voluntary part of the system, and excepting it from the involuntary part, withdraw it from the operation of our state insolvent law, it can do the same in regard to any two or more classes (as, for instance, merchants, traders, and corporations); and the result would be that, in spite of the failure on the part of Congress to establish a bankrupt law (that is, to actually exercise the power conferred by the Constitution to pass a genuine bankrupt law), state legislation would become inoperative, and creditors would be deprived of a remedy to which, as was said in Gerry's Appeal, 43 Conn. 289, 21 Am. Rep. 653, they are fairly entitled.

But it was forcibly argued on the part of the defendants that § 70, subsec. "b," of the bankrupt act of 1898 [30 Stat. at L. 565, 566, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3452], shows that it was the intention of Congress to substitute that act for every provision of every insolvent law of the several states. It provides as follows: "Proceedings commenced under state insolvent laws before the passage of this act shall not be affected by it." To sustain their view, the case of Parmenter Mfg. Co. v. Hamilton, 172 Mass. 178, 51 N. E. 529, decided in 1898, was relied on. But all this case decides is that the Federal act deprives the state court of jurisdiction to entertain jurisdiction in insolvency proceedings filed after 1st July, 1898, when the Federal act went into force. Or as the court said: "The act is to go into full force and effect upon its passage. That is to say, the rights of all persons, in the particulars to which the act refers, are to be determined by the act from the time of its passage." After mentioning a number of the rights which are determined by the act, the opinion continues: "These various provisions affecting the rights and conduct of debtors and creditors are different from those previously existing in most of the states, and perhaps different from those found in the laws of any state, and they supersede all conflicting provisions." In the concluding part of the opinion the distinguished judge who has recently been appointed chief justice of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts said that the language of § 70, subsec. "b," "was chosen to make clear the purpose of Congress that the new system of bankruptcy should supersede all state laws in regard to insolvency from the date of the passage of the act;" but necessarily this language means only that all conflicting provisions of the state law were thus superseded, for this is the well-settled proposition which he had just announced in a preceding sentence, and which we have quoted above. If, therefore, we are correct in the conclusion already reached, that there is no conflict between the provisions of our insolvent law and the present bankrupt law, it follows that the language of § 70 relied on by the defendant can have no influence upon our conclusion in this case.

But again, it was urged that there is a distinction between this case and cases which arose under laws which did not include the class within its scope,—as, for instance, where the bankrupt act applied only to debtors whose debts exceeded $300. It was held in Shepardson's Appeal, 36 Conn. 23, that in cases where the debts were less than $300 the state law was not suspended, and debtors of that class could be proceeded against under state laws. But the true rule was laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529, that the power of the state continues to exist over such cases as the Federal law does not reach. And therefore, if cases involving involuntary proceedings against a class are not provided for by the Federal law, such cases are within the reach of the state law, in spite of the fact that the members of this same class may avail themselves of the voluntary feature; otherwise the rule laid down by Chief Justice Marshall would have to be changed so as to read that the power of the state exists only over such cases as are against natural persons or corporations not within any class provided for by any provision of the Federal law. If this were the rule, then, of course, it would follow, as contended, that the defendant being of the class called "farmers," and the bankrupt act having provided that he may avail himself of the voluntary feature, no case against him could be reached by the state law. But in our opinion, this is not the proper view, for, as we have already said, it is not within the power of Congress to render inoperative the involuntary feature of state insolvent laws as to any particular class by excepting that class from the involuntary part of the national law. Otherwise the result would be that the state laws as to involuntary insolvency would become inoperative by the mere existence of the power of the United States to establish a system of involuntary bankruptcy. We have seen, however, that it is not the mere existence, but the exercise of the power to establish a genuine bankrupt law in conflict with the state laws, which renders the latter inoperative. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529.

In conclusion, it may be proper to say that if it is the policy of our state to render farmers and tillers of the soil like other persons subject to the involuntary system of our insolvent laws, as it is declared to be by the provisions of our Code (article 47, §§ 22, 23), we should not by any strained construction of an act of Congress, or by a course of ingenious reasoning, attempt to thwart this purpose.

From what we have said, it will be seen that we are of opinion that the order appealed from should be reversed.

Order reversed and new trial awarded.

v.

Augustus D. CLEMENS, Jr.

(96 Md. 196.)

1. Mere failure of a landlord to comply with his agreement to make repairs on the leased premises will not render him

NOTE.—As to liability of landlord for injury to tenant or his family from defects in premises, see also, in this series, Hines v. Willcox (Tenn.)

liable for personal injuries suffered by a member of the tenant's family because of want of repair.

2. Failure of a landlord who has agreed to make repairs, to send a carpenter to repair a porch, for a week after receiving notice that some boards in it were bulging, is not such negligence as to charge him with liability for injury to a member of the tenant's family by the giving away of boards in another place, which were not known to be defective, merely because the latter defect might have been discovered while the repairs were in progress, where the known defect was not of such a nature as to call for such speedy action.

(January 15, 1903.)

APPEAL, by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gans & Haman, W. Calvin Chesnut, and Stuart S. Janney, for appellant:

To justify the court in taking the case from the jury, it must present some feature of recklessness, leaving no room for difference of opinion as to its imprudence in the minds of ordinarily prudent men.

Even with knowledge that the whole porch was in a dangerous condition, plaintiff's action would not per se be contributory negligence. It would be a question for the jury.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant sued the appellee for injuries sustained by her in falling through the floor of a porch attached to a house rented by her husband from the appellee. The declaration alleges that the defendant had promised "to keep and maintain the premises in good, safe, and perfect condition," and that the porch, on account of its defective condition, known to the defendant, and of which he had been specifically notified, and which he had, in consideration of further payment of rent, promised to repair, but negligently failed to do so, gave way, so that the plaintiff fell through the opening and sustained serious injuries. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the court granted a prayer that there was no evidence legally sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover under the pleadings.

In the case of Smith v. State, 92 Md. 518, 51 L. R. A. 772, 48 Atl. 92, we had occasion to determine how far a landlord, as a general rule, was liable to a subtenant, and incidentally to a tenant, for injuries sustained by reason of the defective condition of the property; and we held that the landlord was not responsible under the circumstances of that case. From what we there said, it can be seen that a member of a family of the tenant would occupy no better position; but it is sought to distinguish this case from that by reason of the fact that there was no contract to repair in that case, while in this it is claimed there was, and in considering that question it will be well to at once see what the record discloses on that subject. The husband of the plaintiff testified that he rented the premises on May 21, 1901, and paid one month's rent; that before doing so he and the appellee went through the house and yard; that he objected to the fence being down, and to some banisters being out of the front porch; that the appellee said: "All is right, but I will fix the fence for you immediately,—next week,—and the front porch; and any necessary repairs I will do." He remained in the property during that month, but no repairs were made. On the 28th of June he told the appellee he was not going to stay there, as he had not fixed the fence, the door had fallen off the hinges, and the back porch was opening. They then went out to the back porch, and he showed him "where the loose place was," and he promised to send a man there the next morning to fix it, and said he would put in a bathtub and fix the fence the following week. He then paid the second month's rent. The porch where the injury occurred was at the kitchen door, and "was about 4 or 5 feet square, and elevated about 1½ feet from the ground." It had a railing on two sides, "four or five steps going down to the yard," and the other side was against the house, about 10 inches below the level of the kitchen floor. The platform consisted of boards about 4 inches wide, laid from a joist on the outside to the house, where they were supported under the weatherboarding by another joist fastened to the house. He said that the defect in the porch he pointed out to the appellee "was a swelling or bulging of two of the boards on the north end of the porch, which were loose, and when wet they would bulge up and open somewhat near the house, and that he told Mr. Clemens there was danger of some of the children getting hurt, or getting their legs through the opening; that the boards that actually went through with his wife were on the south side of the porch, just opposite the door, and were not the ones that were loose." The appellant testified substantially to the same effect, and added that the appellee said: "Those boards are dangerous, and I will send a man in the morning to fix it." On the 5th of July she was going into the yard, and as she stepped on the platform some of the boards on the south end gave way, and she went through, causing her serious injury; she being at the time in a delicate condition.

Having thus stated such of the facts as are necessary to show the undertaking of the appellee, we will determine what his responsibility to the appellant was. It is contended for her that he assumed the risk of damages sustained by the tenant or his family, due to the condition of this porch, while the appellee contends that "a landlord who has covenanted to repair is not liable in tort for personal injuries resulting from the want of repair." The appellant's attorneys, if we understand the position taken by them, concede that such damages are not recoverable in an action ex contractu, on the contract to repair, but say this is "an action on the case, founded on the negligent failure of the landlord to perform a duty which he had assumed by the terms of the letting. The fact that that duty has its foundation in the contract does not preclude the plaintiff from suing in tort." They contend that this court has, in the case of Smith v. State, impliedly recognized the right of the tenant, or a member of his family, to sue for such injuries, when by the terms of the lease there is a duty resting on the landlord to make repairs. In that case we held that the landlord was not liable to the tenant or the subtenant for personal injuries due to the want of repairs of the property; and after quoting from Taylor, Land. & T. § 175a, and referring to other authorities, we said: "The reason of the rule is perfectly apparent. If the lessee knows the condition of the premises, and rents it without requiring the owner to repair it, he takes it as he finds it, and has no right to complain of injuries sustained on account of its condition. The owner not being compelled to keep it in repair, if the tenant desires to require that of him he should so bind him by contract. In the absence of that, he must protect himself against dangers which are apparent to him." We were not called upon in that case to determine whether damages for personal injuries could be recovered by the tenant, or anyone on the premises under the tenant's right, when the landlord was under contract to make the repairs; but many of the decisions we there referred to, and others that might be cited, in announcing the general rule as to the landlord's liability to the tenant, do qualify it by referring to the absence of an agreement on the part of the landlord to repair, and imply that when there is such an agreement the landlord may be liable to damages for personal injuries, at least under some circumstances. In 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 216, it is said "that, in the absence of any agreement on the part of the landlord to repair, a tenant cannot recover from the landlord the costs of repairs made by him, nor can the tenant recover from the landlord for injuries to his property or person, or to the property or person of his family, caused by the defective condition of the demised premises;" but on page 234 of that volume it is stated that "damages for personal injuries to the tenant resulting from the failure of the landlord to repair are deemed too remote and consequential, and not in contemplation of the parties, and therefore not recoverable, though in an Illinois case a recovery for such injuries has been allowed." The case referred to is Sontag v. O'Hare, 73 Ill. App. 432; and the same view has been adopted in Schurundi v. Metzger Linseed Oil Co. 93 Ill. App. 365, and to some extent in Moore v. Steljes, 69 Fed. 518; Stillwell v. South Louisville Land Co. 22 Ky. L. Rep. 785, 52 L. R. A. 325, 58 S. W. 696; Perez v. Rabaud, 76 Tex. 191, 7 L. R. A. 620, 13 S. W. 177; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; and other cases. The doctrine stated by the Encyclopædia of Law has been announced in a number of cases cited in note 7 to the above quotation; and in McAdam, Land. & T. 438, it is said: "A landlord who has covenanted to repair is not liable in tort for personal injuries resulting from the want of repair;" citing Schick v. Fleischhauer, 26 App. Div. 210, 49 N. Y. Supp. 962; Flynn v. Hatton, 43 How. Pr. 333; Spellman v. Bannigan, 36 Hun, 174; Miller v. Rinaldo, 21 Misc. 470, 47 N. Y. Supp. 636; Sanders v. Smith, 5 Misc. 1, 25 N. Y. Supp. 125; Tuttle v. George H. Gilbert Mfg. Co. 145 Mass. 169, 13 N. E. 465. In the note to Hines v. Wilcox (Tenn.) 34 L. R. A. 824, there is a valuable collection of authorities on the "liability of landlord for injury to tenant from defect in the premises;" but it is impossible in an opinion of anything like a reasonable length to undertake to discuss 60 L. R. A.

the numerous cases on that subject, and it would be useless to attempt to reconcile the expressions used in many of them. We have no doubt, however, that no action, either in contract or in tort, by a tenant, or one of his family, against a landlord, to recover damages for personal injuries, should be sustained merely because the latter has been guilty of a breach of contract to make necessary repairs in the premises demised. It is not denied by counsel for the appellant that such damages are too remote, and not in contemplation of the parties, to be recovered in an action ex contractu; and to permit a recovery for such damages based on the contract, simply because it is in form an action of tort, would be making a distinction that could not be justified by reason or authority. There must be something more than a mere failure on the part of the landlord to make the repairs he has agreed to make. As was said in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Pumphrey, 59 Md. 398: "The suit was brought for a wrong, dependent upon a contract; and the first question we have to decide is, What is the true measure of damages in such a case? It makes no difference whether the form of the action is ex delicto or ex contractu. The real and substantial gravamen of the complaint is the alleged breach of the contract, and in such a case the same law is applicable to both classes of action. In actions like the present, against common carriers, the suit may be framed either ex contractu, upon the breach of the engagement, or ex delicto, upon the violation of the public duty; but whether the action be assumptit on the contract, or case for the violation of duty, the measure of damages is equally a question of law, and as much under the control of the court as if the right rested in agreement, merely." And in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Carr, 71 Md. 141, 17 Atl. 1052, relied on by the appellant, the same doctrine was, in effect, announced. That was a suit for the wrongful refusal of the admission of the appellee to the cars of the appellant. This court said: "But this is in form an action of tort. The contract, it is true, entitled the plaintiff to admission to the cars, and gave rise to the duty on the part of the defendant to allow such admission, under proper circumstances; but, in cases of the class to which this belongs, the refusal or neglect to perform that duty, as well as the negligent performance of it, furnishes a ground of action in tort. In such case, both the nonfeasance and the misfeasance constitute a wrongful act, for which the remedy may be either by action on the contract or in tort, at the option of the party injured." But in passing on the question of damages we said the rule by which damages are to be estimated is, as a general principle, a question of law, to be decided by the court; and "in a case like the present the rule for measuring the damages is fixed and determinate, and should be applied in all cases alike, except in those cases where there may be malice or circumstances of aggravation in the wrong complained of, for which the damages may be enhanced."

Without citing other authorities, it may be conceded that in this state, when a landlord has agreed to make repairs, there is a duty resting on him to do so, and upon his failure the tenant may either sue on his contract, or bring an action on the case, founded in tort, for neglect of that duty; but, as was said in Pumphrey's Case, 59 Md. 398: "There are many actions nominally in tort, which, in respect to the measure of relief, are treated as virtually ex contractu, and in these cases a fixed rule of damages is adhered to." The familiar cases of United States Tel. Co. v. Gildersleve, 29 Md. 232, 96 Am. Dec. 519, and Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, were cited as furnishing the true measure of damages. So it seems to us that the correct rule in a case such as the one under consideration is that the mere failure of the landlord to make repairs which he had agreed to make cannot make him responsible to the tenant, or a member of his family, for damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of the defective condition of the premises, whether such suit be in assumpsit or in case, but, in order to recover such damages, there must be shown some clear act of negligence or misfeasance on the part of the landlord, beyond the mere breach of contract. The declaration seems to have adopted that theory, as it alleges that the defendant "had negligently failed" to repair the porch. Assuming, as we must as the case is presented, that the appellee had agreed to make all necessary repairs, and that this porch was out of repair, and in consequence of that the appellant was injured, that, of course, would not be sufficient to hold the appellee responsible for such injuries. In the first place, it is well settled that, as a general rule, there must be a notice by the tenant to the landlord of the need of repairs, in order to put the latter in default. 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 229, where a number of cases are cited, including Cooke v. England, 27 Md. 14, 92 Am. Dec. 618. And after the landlord is notified, he has a reasonable time in which to make them. Id. 230. As to what is a reasonable time, must depend upon circumstances. Not only the extent of repairs to be made must be considered, but, what is a much more material question in this case, the apparent necessity for prompt action; and that brings us to what we deem the crucial point in this case, as reflecting upon the question of negligence vel non of the appellee, which must determine the right of recovery for the injuries sued for.

If the appellee knew of the defect in this porch that caused the injuries, and had reason to believe that it was likely to produce such results if not repaired, then it was negligence on his part, in view of his agreement to repair, not to do so promptly, or at least to take some steps to protect the tenant and his family from injury. Of course, whether there could be a recovery, on account of the contributory negligence or other default of the party injured, would present another question, which is not now being considered. But although it is alleged in the first part of the declaration that the defect was "known to the defendant, and of which he had specifically been notified theretofore by the plaintiff and her husband," it is subsequently alleged that it was "entirely unknown to the plaintiff and her husband." If the latter was the fact, it was impossible for either of them to have so notified the defendant, and the testimony which we have already stated shows that it was not known to the plaintiff or her husband, and the only notice they or either of them gave the defendant was as to the condition of the north end of the porch, where two of the boards were bulging. The plaintiff was injured by the boards at the south end giving way, and there was probably no reason for the defendant to suppose that any serious injury was likely to result from the two boards which had been called to his attention; and, if there was, the injury complained of was in fact not so caused. If the use of that part of the porch was dangerous, the plaintiff knew it, and, if she had been injured in the use of that, would clearly have been guilty of contributory negligence. But although she and her husband had better opportunity to know the real condition of the porch than the defendant had, as they had been living on the premises for more than a month, she seeks to hold the appellee responsible because he promised to send a carpenter there the day after the two boards were called to his attention (June 28th), but had not done so on July 5th, when the accident happened. It was argued that, if the appellee had sent the carpenter there, he could have discovered the dangerous condition of the part of the porch that caused the injury. He might or might not, but that is not the test we deem proper to apply in such cases. The question is whether the appellee had reason to believe from the information he received from the plaintiff and her husband, and what he saw himself, that there was such imminent danger in the condition of the porch as to make him responsible for negligence in not having it repaired within the week (including a Sunday and a legal holiday), and we think the plaintiff's proof fell far short of establishing that. If there was reason to suppose that the porch was in such a dangerous condition as to call upon the appellee to take immediate action, why did not the plaintiff and her husband know it? If she did know its condition, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, used it without any more necessity for doing so than is disclosed by this record, then, unquestionably, she would have been precluded from recovery on the ground of contributory negligence. But as she and her husband disclaim all knowledge of the defect that caused the injury, why should the landlord have imputed to him such knowledge as would justify a court in declaring him guilty of negligence for not sending a carpenter there at once to repair it? It will not do to say that as he had agreed to make necessary repairs, and had had the defective condition of the other end of the porch called to his attention, which he had promised to have repaired the next day, a duty rested on him to have it repaired, and, having violated that duty, therefore he is responsible. That would be equivalent to saying that he was liable for such damages as are sought to be recovered in this case simply because he had violated his contract, which we have said was not sufficient. There is no reason for holding landlords to such a harsh rule of law as that. The tenant has the right to make repairs, and charge his landlord with the cost of them, when he is under obligation to keep the premises in repair; and, when the expense is as trivial as this would likely have been, it is his duty to do so, rather than risk the life or limb of his family. Middlekauff v. Smith, 1 Md. 343; Biggs v. McCurley, 76 Md. 415, 25 Atl. 466; Lawson v. Price, 45 Md. 136; McGinn v. French, 107 Wis. 54, 82 N. W. 724. If the landlord is under contract to keep the premises in repair, and, although notified of the need of them, he fails to make them, if the property cannot be safely occupied the tenant can ordinarily abandon it. If, with knowledge of such condition, he still remains in the property, he, and others having such knowledge, would, as a general rule, be denied the right to recover, on the ground of contributory negligence, even if the landlord was negligent.

So, although we are of opinion that a landlord, under contract to repair, may, under some circumstances, be liable for damages for personal injuries by reason of a negligent failure to make repairs, his negligence must be clearly established as the foundation for such liability, and, under the facts disclosed by this record, there was not such legally sufficient evidence of it as would have justified the court below in submitting the case to the jury; and therefore, without discussing the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, we will affirm the judgment.

Judgment affirmed; the appellant to pay the costs.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

W. D. KUHN, Resp.,

v.

SOL HEAVENRICH COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. No implied contract obligation rests upon the owner of a building leased in separate sections to keep the portion remaining in his possession in repair, so that damages resulting to property through breach of it can be set up as a counterclaim in an action for rent.
2. On a motion for judgment, where plaintiff's claim is admitted, and no facts are stated to defeat it, the court is not required to permit an amendment of the answer.

(October 21, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ashland County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid, in which defendant sought to set off injuries alleged to have been caused by want of repair of portions of the property remaining in possession of the landlord. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action by a landlord to recover $225, past-due rent, from his tenant. The leased premises consisted of the ground floor and part of the basement of a three-story building, the rest of the room therein being leased to various tenants, each having a specific portion thereof. There was no express covenant to keep the building or any part thereof in repair. The complaint was in the usual form. Defendant admitted the indebtedness, and counterclaimed for damages to the amount of $378 upon the following alleged facts in addition to those before stated: In the building there was a shaft reaching from the surface of the roof to the ceiling above the first floor. The top, bottom, and sides of the shaft were of glass. The purpose thereof was to light the various parts of the building. When defendant entered upon the enjoyment of his lease, the roof of the shaft was in a good state of repair. It was the landlord's duty to keep it so. May 25th, in the nighttime, there was a severe rain storm, and, because of the then defective condition of the lighting shaft, a large quantity of water was admitted into the building, and found its way to defendant's stock of clothing on the first floor, damaging the same to the amount of $378. The roof of the shaft where the water entered was out of repair, to the knowledge of plaintiff, before such occurrence. He endeavored to repair it, but failed to do so efficiently, by reason whereof the damage to defendant's property was caused.

Plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, and the motion was granted. Defendant duly excepted to the ruling.

Mr. B. Sleight, for appellant:

Krueger v. Ferrant, 29 Minn. 385, 43 Am. Rep. 223, 13 N. W. 158.

There is a marked distinction between these cases and cases where the premises were out of repair at the time of the leasing, and in which action was brought to impose a liability upon the theory that there was a breach of an implied covenant of fitness of the premises for the purposes intended.

Messrs. Sanborn & Sanborn, for respondent:

In the absence of any secret defect, or deceit, or warranty, or agreement on the part of the landlord to repair, the tenant takes the leased premises in the condition in which they happen to be at the time of the leasing; and in such a case the landlord is not liable to the tenant for an injury caused by their being out of repair during the term.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial court granted the motion, supposing the common law that, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, a landlord is under no obligation at all to his tenant to keep the leased premises in repair, ruled the case. Appellant contends that the rule is not universal; that it does not apply where there are several tenants in a building, each having a distinct part thereof, except as to each tenant for his particular part; that as to those portions of the building necessary for the protection or convenience of all of the tenants in the enjoyment of their respective holdings and used by them in common, such as the stairways, the halls, and the roof,—portions which do not pass under the control of any particular tenant,—the landlord is bound by an implied promise, forming part of the leasehold contract, to keep the same in repair; and that such exception entitled appellant to recover on its counterclaim.

The position urged upon our attention is not entirely without authority to support it, though counsel is in error, we think, in the idea that the weight of authority is that way. The question is interesting and important. It has not been decided here, that we are aware of, in a case exactly like this, though it has been in principle, as we shall see later. That there is a duty resting on the landlord in such a situation, not to cause injury to his tenant, and to prevent such injury, has been held in many jurisdictions in actions grounded on negligence. But there is no authority, worthy of our consideration, to support the idea that the duty is one resting in contract. The distinction between the obligations of a contract and the obligation which one owes to another respecting that other's personal safety and the safety of his property has been many times lost sight of in considering this question, as what follows will demonstrate.

This language from 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 220, is called to our attention: "The rule laid down by the weight of authority is that, where the landlord leases separate portions of the same building to different tenants, and reserves under his control those parts of the building or premises used in common by all the tenants, he is under an implied obligation to use reasonable diligence to keep in a safe condition the parts over which he so reserves control."

The writer of that text, as is indicated, not only by the language used, but by the authorities cited, did not use the term "obligation" in a contractual sense, but in that of the duty which, in certain situations, one owes to avoid injuring another, a violation of which constitutes a tort, and is actionable as such. In one of the leading cases referred to it was expressly stated that the responsibility of the landlord "cannot be based upon any contract obligation, but must rest entirely upon the element of delictum." Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 245, 50 Am. Rep. 659. In speaking of the contract relations between landlord and tenant, the writer of the quoted language, at page 218, vol. 18, says: "The general rule that the landlord is under no implied obligation to keep the demised premises in repair is, in most jurisdictions, held equally applicable where only a part of a building is demised; and the landlord is held to be under no implied obligation to keep the portion of the building not demised to the tenant in repair, so as to render tenantable and secure the portion demised to the tenant."

The writer, like many courts that have treated the subject, failed to bring out clearly the distinction before mentioned,—that between implied covenant springing from the lease, and liability for a tortious violation of that duty one person owes to another as regards safety of his person and property.

The cases cited in support of the declaration that, in the circumstances under discussion, the landlord owes his tenant a duty, went, it will be discovered, as a rule, upon the doctrine of Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, though there is reason to say that in some of them the legitimate scope of the maxim was misconceived. There can be no reasonable controversy but that it cannot properly be applied to an obligation resting merely in contract. The idea of it is that no one has a legal right to so use his own property as to injure, in a physical sense, the property of another.

Toole v. Beckett, 67 Me. 544, 24 Am. Rep. 54, is confidently referred to by appellant's counsel. It is sufficient for this case to say of that one that the action was not to recover on contract, but for a tortious act. True, the nature of the wrong complained of was failure to repair a roof under very much the same circumstances as those we have before us; and if this were an action for damages for negligent inattention to the roof, Toole v. Beckett would be in point for what it is worth, though it has been pronounced unsound by most courts that have considered it. Certainly, none of the authorities cited by the learned court in support of its decision involved an implied contract as between landlord and tenant, or any other obligation especially applicable to that relation. To illustrate: Kirby v. Boylston Market Asso. 14 Gray, 249, 74 Am. Dec. 682, was an action for personal injuries caused by a sidewalk being unsafe for travel by reason of an accumulation of snow and ice thereon. It was claimed that such unsafe condition was produced by the improper discharge of water upon the walk from the defendant's building, the rooms in which were occupied by numerous tenants, each having a specific part thereof. The defendant retaining charge of the passageways and roof and general care of all parts of the building necessary for the common use of the tenants. The court held that, if the defendant's structure produced the nuisance which caused the injury, he was liable. It will be easily seen that the principle involved is familiar, and has nothing to do with the contractual duties of the owner of a building to his tenants. Priest v. Nichols, 116 Mass. 401, was an action sounding in tort. It did not involve any question whatever as to the duty of a landlord specially to his tenant to repair. The wrong complained of would have been actionable had it been committed to another tenant in the building or by a stranger. The landlord used a part of the structure as an engine room. He operated the engine in such a negligent manner as to permit water from the waste pipe thereof to escape and reach the plaintiff's property. In Gray v. Boston Gas-light Co. 114 Mass. 149, 19 Am. Rep. 324, the controversy was between the landlord and a stranger, the latter being a sufferer from the negligence of the former in permitting a chimney to fall from his building. In Norcross v. Thomas, 51 Me. 503, 81 Am. Dec. 588, defendant was held guilty of maintaining a nuisance to the injury of the plaintiff in that he so conducted a blacksmith shop as to cause dust and ashes to pass therefrom to the plaintiff's property to its injury. The relation of landlord and tenant was not involved directly or indirectly.

Where there is any support in the cases above referred to for the decision in Toole v. Beckett, we are unable to understand. Many courts have expressed the same views. Jones v. Millsaps, 71 Miss. 10, 23 L. R. A. 155, 14 So. 440; Krueger v. Ferrant, 29 Minn. 385, 43 Am. Rep. 223, 13 N. W. 158; Ward v. Fugin, 101 Mo. 669, 10 L. R. A. 147, 14 S. W. 738; Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 34, 44 Am. Rep. 255. In Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295, like the other cases upon which counsel relies, the landlord was held liable to his tenant for negligence upon the same principle that he would have been to a stranger for inducing a tenant to use a portion of the building which he undertook to keep in order, knowing that it was unsafe.

Argument seems unnecessary to show that, if we were to concede that Toole v. Beckett, and Looney v. McLean were correctly decided, they are not authority for a recovery by a tenant upon an implied contract to repair. In Tuttle v. George H. Gilbert Mfg. Co. 145 Mass. 169, 13 N. E. 465, Looney v. McLean was considered, it being particularly pointed out that it went on negligence, not on contract. Text writers generally do not recognize the exception for which counsel contends. Chaplin, Land. & T. § 247; 1 McAdan, Land. & T. 436; Hall, Land. & T. (Mass.) § 25; Taylor, Land. & T. p. 316, note 2. In Woodfall, Land. & T. 173, 174, note, a misconception of principles and authorities is observable. The writer says there is no implied covenant on the part of a landlord to repair where the whole building is leased, while there is such a covenant where the building is leased to several tenants. Many cases are cited which turned on the general common-law rule under discussion, and others on liability for negligence, the writer failing to discover the distinction between the two classes. That confusion easily led to the error of supposing that the rule holding the landlord liable for negligence is necessarily an exception to the common-law exemption of the landlord from any liability by implied covenant or contract. No better illustration of the writer's confusion can be given than to call attention to the fact that Krueger v. Ferrant, 29 Minn. 385, 43 Am. Rep. 223, 13 N. W. 158; Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 34, 44 Am. Rep. 255; Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119, 6 Am. Rep. 47, and other cases expressly holding that there is no exception to the common-law rule as to liability upon implied contract, are cited in close connection with Scott v. Simons, 54 N. H. 426; Cole v. McKey, 66 Wis. 500, 57 Am. Rep. 293, 29 N. W. 279, and other cases where a recovery was sought for actionable negligence.

The only case of consequence that we are aware of, where an action to recover damages upon an implied contract to repair in circumstances similar to those here was sustained, is Rissell v. Lloyd, 100 Ill. 214. No authority is cited to support the decision. As said of it in Jones v. Millsaps, 71 Miss. 10, 23 L. R. A. 155, 14 So. 440, "it is the naked assertion of a court of last resort," that is all. Even as such it would, of course, be entitled to respect if the question treated was doubtful and the indications were that the court fully grasped the principles involved. The indications in the Illinois case are to the contrary. It is quite plain that the court confused liability resting purely on negligence and liability resting in contract. If there was doubt about that it would be solved by the later case of Payne v. Irvin, 144 Ill. 482, 33 N. E. 756, an action sounding in tort, where the former case, and the leading cases to which we have referred, grounded on negligence, were cited in support of the result reached.

Enough has been said, even if the question were entirely new in this state, to demonstrate that the common-law rule, that there is no implied covenant on the part of a landlord of fitness, present or future, of leased premises, forming a part of the contract between him and his tenant, is universal; that it applies as well to a lease of part of a structure, other parts being let to others in severalty, and to parts thereof common to all, as to leased premises constituting an entire building. But it is not entirely a new question here. It was considered in Cole v. McKey, 66 Wis. 500, 57 Am. Rep. 293, 29 N. W. 279, and Douling v. Nuebling, 97 Wis. 350, 72 N. W. 871. Cole v. McKey, rightly understood, declares the law in perfect harmony with Krueger v. Ferrant, 29 Minn. 385, 43 Am. Rep. 223, 13 N. W. 158, and it is often referred to in connection with such case, as will be observed L. R. A.

served by referring to the authorities we have cited. We might have satisfactorily decided this case by the mere statement that it was ruled by Cole v. McKey, were it not for the fact that it seems to be misunderstood by counsel for appellant. That probably comes from the fact that the action was grounded on negligence, and the court, in disposing of it, said there might be a liability in case of the breach of a positive duty to the tenant, without any extended discussion of the matter to render it plain that the duty spoken of was not of a contractual nature. However, why the position of the court on the subject should be misunderstood, when the opinion is read with proper attention to the subject under discussion, is not easily perceived. While it is recognized that a person standing in the relation of landlord to another may be liable to such other for a wrong done to him in respect to the subject of the tenancy, in the opening lines of the opinion it was in effect stated that there was no contract liability on the facts presented by the record, a situation similar to the one before us. This language was used:

"The rule seems to be well settled that, in the absence of any secret defect or deceit or warranty or agreement on the part of the landlord to repair, the tenant takes the leased premises in the condition they happen to be in at the time of the leasing, and that in such case the landlord is not liable to the tenant for an injury caused by the premises being out of repair during the term."

True, the court did not in terms say, in the circumstances mentioned, that there is no contractual liability, and, when it came to speak of liability growing out of a breach of duty on the part of the landlord, the term "duty" was not so used as to expressly negative any idea that an obligation resting in contract was meant; but that one, the violation of which constitutes a tort—actionable negligence—was in mind, seems perfectly plain. The relation of landlord and tenant is essential to render active the principle spoken of in the opening part of the opinion, while it is not as to the one which was later discussed, and the real vital principle in the case. If courts and text writers had been more careful in pointing out the distinction between breach of implied contract to repair and breach of duty involving a wrong of a tortious character, and not fallen into the error of confusing the two, many of the apparent conflicts to which we have referred, necessarily tending to useless litigation, would not exist.

Enough has been said to demonstrate that the trial court rightly decided that respondent failed to state in his answer a right to recover for breach of implied covenant to repair, which, it is conceded, is the sole ground for recovery pleaded. It is suggested that the court should have permitted an amendment, instead of rendering judgment after deciding that the pleading was insufficient. To that there are two satisfactory answers: First, there was nothing in the situation to render it probable that the counterclaim could have been made good by amendment. If facts exist, not pleaded, sufficient to make out, with those contained in the defective paper, a cause of action for negligence,—which, it seems, is doubtful,—it does not constitute “a cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff’s claim;” nor one “connected with the subject of the action,” within the meaning of subdivision 1, § 2050, Rev. Stat. 1898; nor one satisfying any other statutory definition of “counterclaim.” Looking at appellant’s claim from the standpoint of what constitutes a pleadable cause of action in his situation, we readily see that it is entirely independent of the respondent’s claim. If a person, while in the store of another by that other’s implied invitation, received an injury by the latter’s negligence, and sued to recover therefor, no one would claim, we apprehend, that such other could counterclaim for an indebtedness contracted by such person to him on the occasion of the injury. The two would have no necessary legal or equitable connection. They would constitute two entirely independent claims. Therefore, neither could be said to grow out of, or be connected with, the subject-matter of the other. The illustration fits the situation under consideration.

2. But the conclusive answer to the suggestion that the court erred in not permitting an amendment is that permission was not asked, and that on a motion for judgment, where the plaintiff’s claim is admitted by the answer and no facts are stated therein to defeat such claim, the court is not bound to permit an amendment, regardless of the defendant’s attitude in the matter.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff’s intestate. Affirmed.

Statement by Cassoday, Ch. J.:

This action was commenced August 21, 1901, to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff’s intestate July 7, 1900. The complaint alleges, in effect, that, prior to July 6, 1900, the deceased was in the employ of the defendant as a teamster; that on that day the defendant put him to work unloading logs, which were brought from the woods and hauled on cars by an engine to the mill of the defendant; that on the following day the deceased was engaged in unloading such logs, and, while in the act of so doing, he fell into a hole about 2 feet deep, and before he could get up the logs rolled against and over him, injuring him so that he died from the effects thereof on the same day; that for three months prior to the accident the hole had been there, and its existence was well known to the defendant and its servants; that there was slippery bark around the hole into which the deceased stepped; that it was the duty of the defendant to furnish the deceased with a reasonably safe place to work, and that the defendant was negligent in failing to do so, and that it was also negligent in failing to inform the deceased that the place was dangerous and unsafe. The complaint also alleges “that plaintiff’s intestate at the time of his death was an unmarried man, thirty-six years of age, and left him surviving, his mother as next of kin, who was entirely dependent upon him for her support; that plaintiff’s intestate at and prior to said injury was a strong, healthy, able-bodied, industrious man, earning and capable of earning $50 per month; that for many years prior to his death he was continuously employed, and, but for his death, he would have, out of his earnings, provided for the support of his mother during the remainder of her life; that, by reason of the aforesaid, plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of $2,000.” The defendant answered by way of admissions, denials, and counter allegations, and, among others, that the plaintiff was injured by, through, and on account of his own negligence or the negligence of his fellow servants. At the close of the testimony on the part of the plaintiff the court granted a nonsuit, and dismissed the complaint, with costs. From the judgment entered thereon accordingly, the plaintiff brings this appeal.

The fact that the beneficiary is a nonresident alien does not defeat the recovery.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the record, and is undisputed, that the deceased was thirty-six years of age, and a strong, healthy man, and had worked in the woods for about sixteen years, and had been in the employ of the defendant in the logging business as a teamster for a year. On the morning of July 6, 1900, he was set at work unloading logs from the cars upon the landing, and continued such work until he was killed in the forenoon of July 7, 1900. During that time he had assisted in unloading something like a dozen train loads of logs. The cars were 20 feet or more long, and the logs were about the same length. The facts attending the accident, as stated by the plaintiff's counsel, are to the effect that at the time of the accident four cars were brought in the train; and that, as the train was being pulled onto the banking ground, the deceased hooked the trip line onto the fit hook so as to unfasten the wrapper chain, and then when the car was pulled ahead and set in place to be unloaded, he walked forward, and took hold of the trip line, and, while standing near the end of the car next to the engine, he gave the trip line a jerk, unfastening the wrapper chain, and, while stepping back to get out of the way, he stepped into a hole about 3 or 4 feet deep, and fell to the ground, and before he could get up the logs rolled off the car and over him, and injured him so that he died about three hours afterwards. The soil appears to have been a sandy slope from the railroad track back to the mill pond. The hole was 3 or 4 feet across the top, and 3 or 4 feet deep, and about 2 feet wide at the bottom. A brother of the deceased, who was sworn as a witness in behalf of the plaintiff, testified to the effect that anybody who looked at the hole could see it; that it was at least 2 feet down to the bark, and that anybody could see that who looked at it. The law applicable to such a state of facts is too well settled to require discussion. Sladky v. Marinette Lumber Co. 107 Wis. 250, 260, 261, 83 N. W. 514, and cases there cited; Williams v. J. G. Wagner Co. 110 Wis. 456, 86 N. W. 157; Kreider v. Wisconsin River Paper & Pulp Co. 110 Wis. 645, 657-659, 86 N. W. 662. We must hold that the deceased assumed the risk. Ibid.

2. It also appears from the testimony of the deceased's brother that the deceased left no issue, and was unmarried, and that his father was dead; that his mother was still living in Canada, where she had lived for many years; that she had no property; that the deceased had been accustomed to send his mother $10 a month, when he could spare it; that she never lived in, nor became a citizen of, the United States; that his father lived nearly all his life at the same place where his mother did, and that he did not think he was ever a citizen of the United States. Upon such undisputed evidence it is claimed on the part of the defendant that, under our statute, this action cannot be maintained for the benefit of the mother of the deceased, a nonresident alien. The plaintiff claims the right to recover under §§ 4255, 4256, of the statute. The true meaning of those sections has been so fully and so recently considered by this court as to require nothing further to be here said, except to state the result and the application to the case at bar. Thus it has been held that "the right of action given by" those sections "to certain beneficiaries therein named is personal, and the damages are limited to a mere indemnity for the pecuniary injury resulting therefrom to such beneficiary, and the action therefor does not survive the death of such beneficiary, but abates upon his death, and cannot be revived in favor of his administrator." Schmidt v. Menasha Woodware Co. 99 Wis. 300, 74 N. W. 797. So, it has been held that "the liability created by § 4255, Rev. Stat. 1898, in case of the death of a person by an actionable injury for which such person could have recovered damages if death had not ensued, is for the benefit of certain relatives of the decedent mentioned in § 4256, Rev. Stat. 1898, and in default of such relatives there is no liability." Brown v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 137, 44 L. R. A. 579, 77 N. W. 748, 78 N. W. 771. In that case it was further held that such right of action is separate and distinct from "the right of action for an injury to the person which survives under § 4253," even though death ensue from the injury. Ibid. See also Hubbard v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Wis. 160, 80 N. W. 454; Staefler v. Menasha Woodware Co. 111 Wis. 483, 487, 87 N. W. 480. Here the contention is that the plaintiff, as the personal representative of the deceased, has the right to recover damages for the pecuniary loss which his mother sustained by reason of his death, notwithstanding such right of action did not survive under § 4253. Did the sections of the statutes thus relied upon give such right of action for the benefit of such nonresident alien? The question is not whether the legislature had power to give such right of action, but whether the sections relied upon did give such right of action. It is claimed that the right "to maintain an action and recover damages" is given by the statute in general terms, and is broad enough to include aliens. The Constitution declares that "no distinction shall ever be made by law between resident aliens and citizens, in reference to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property." § 15, art. 1. As indicated, the sections in question have no reference to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property, nor the rights of property, where the death is instantaneous or without conscious pain, but simply give a new right of action, outside and independent of property. It has been held in England that "prima facie, and unless the contrary be expressed, or be implied from the absolute necessity of the case . . . [every legislature must be presumed to have] intended by its enactments to regulate the rights which should subsist between its own subjects, and not in any way to affect the rights of foreigners, whether by way of restricting or augmenting their natural rights." Cope v. Doherty, 4 Kay & J. 367. To the same effect is The Zollverein, Swabey, Adm. 96; Jefferys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. Cas. 815. "It is conceded," said Marshall, Ch. J., "that the legislation of every country is territorial; that beyond its own territory it can only affect its own subjects or citizens." Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch, 279, 2 L. ed. 620. Mr. Story states the same rule thus: "It is plain that the laws of one country can have no intrinsic force, proprio vigore, except within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of that country. They can bind only its own subjects, and others who are within its jurisdictional limits, and the latter only while they remain therein." Story, Conf. L. §§ 7, 20, 98, 278. The general rule is that statutes are "presumed to have no extraterritorial force." Endlich Interpretation of Statutes, § 169. The same author says that, "in general, statutes must be understood as applying to those only who owe obedience to the legislature which enacts them, and 60 L. R. A.

whose interests it is the duty of that legislature to protect; that is, its own subjects, including in that expression, not only natural born and naturalized subjects, but also all persons actually within its territorial jurisdiction; but that, as regards aliens resident abroad, the legislature has no concern to protect their interests, any more than it has a legitimate power to control their rights. In this view it would be presumed, in interpreting a statute, that the legislature did not intend to legislate either as to their rights or liabilities; and to warrant a different conclusion the words of the statute ought to be express, or the context of it very clear." Id. § 176. Upon this principle, and under a statute similar to ours, it was held in Pennsylvania that "a nonresident alien mother has no standing to maintain an action against a citizen of Pennsylvania to recover damages for the death of her son." Deni v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 525, 37 Atl. 558. In that case the court used this language: "Our statute was not intended to confer upon nonresident aliens rights of action not conceded to them or to us by their own country, or to put burdens on our own citizens to be discharged for their benefit. It has no extraterritorial force, and the plaintiff is not within the purview of it. While it is possible that the language of the statute may admit of a construction which would include nonresident alien husbands, widows, children, and parents of the deceased, it is a construction so obviously opposed to the spirit and policy of the statute that we cannot adopt it." Id. pp. 528, 529, 181 Pa., p. 559, 37 Atl. So, it has been held in a case arising in Colorado that "nonresident aliens are not entitled to the benefit of the Colorado statute giving a right of action for death by wrongful act to the next of kin of the deceased, and cannot maintain an action thereunder." Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164. Counsel for the plaintiff cite and rely upon Mulhall v. Fallon, 176 Mass. 266, 64 L. R. A. 934, 57 N. E. 386; Kellyville Coal Co. v. Petraytis, 195 Ill. 215, 63 N. E. 94; Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Vetaloro v. Perkins, 101 Fed. 393. In the first of these cases it was held that "a statute cannot impose duties upon a nonresident alien, but it may confer rights upon him." It is conceded by all that the legislature may confer such right of action upon nonresident aliens, but the question is, Has it done so by the general language employed in the statutes relied upon? In that case, Holmes, Ch. J., uses this language: "Under the statute the action for death without conscious suffering takes the place of an action that would have been brought by the employee himself if the harm had been less, and by his representative if it had been equally great, but the death had been attended with pain. . . . In the latter case there would be no exception to the right of recovery if the next of kin were nonresident aliens. It would be strange to read an exception into general words when the wrong is so nearly identical, and when the different provisions are part of one scheme." Id. p. 269, 176 Mass., 54 L. R. A. 939, and p. 387, 57 N. E. In other words, that learned court puts such right of action in favor of the surviving relative, having no reference to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property, upon the same footing with a right of action for damages which the deceased might have maintained had death not ensued, and which would have survived his death for the benefit of his estate; and hence has reference to the enjoyment or descent of property. As indicated, this is in direct conflict with the ruling of this court, where it is held that the right of action which survives the death for the benefit of the estate of the deceased is separate and distinct from the right of action for the loss to surviving relatives. The one has reference to property, or the rights of property, of the deceased. The other has reference only to the loss sustained by the surviving relatives. The Illinois case cited follows and adopts the reasoning of the Massachusetts case cited. In Vetaloro v. Perkins, 101 Fed. 393, the right of action arose under the statute of Massachusetts, one section of which is quoted, from which it appears that the two rights of action are put upon the same footing. That statute declares, in substance, that, "where an employee is instantly killed or dies without conscious suffering, as the result of the negligence of an employer," the surviving relative "may maintain an action for damages therefor, and may recover in the same manner, to the same extent as if the death of the deceased had not been instantaneous, or as if the deceased had consciously suffered." Vetaloro v. Perkins, 101 Fed. 394. This broad difference between our statutes and the statutes of Massachusetts makes the adjudication in cases arising under that or any similar statute inapplicable to the case at bar. The cause of action in Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439, arose under a statute of New Jersey, and the action was brought in New York, and removed to the Federal court, and was otherwise distinguishable. The precise question here involved was not there considered; but it was held that the plaintiff could recover. There are, however, numerous cases to the contrary. A few only are cited. Woodward v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 121; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Richards, 68 Tex. 375, 4 S. W. 627; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McCormick, 71 Tex. 660, 1 L. R. A. 804, 9 S. W. 540; De Harn v. Mexican Nat. R. Co. 86 Tex. 68, 23 S. W. 381; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson, 89 Tex. 107, 31 L. R. A. 276, 33 S. W. 857.

We must hold that the sections of the statutes relied upon do not give to nonresident alien relatives of one who is instantly killed, or who dies without conscious pain, a right of action for the loss sustained by reason of such death.

The judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Re MUNICIPAL FUEL PLANTS.

(.....Mass.....)

Municipalities have authority to provide fuel for paupers; but they cannot be given power by the legislature to buy and sell fuel in competition with private enterprise, although it is scarce and high in price and the cost to consumers may be thereby reduced, unless there is such a scarcity as to create a general and wide-spread distress in the community, which cannot be met by private enterprise.

legislature to authorize municipal corporations to establish and operate fuel plants. Power denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

In reply to your order of January 14, 1903, a copy of which is annexed, the justices of the supreme judicial court respectfully give the following opinion:

The first three questions submitted to us are substantially the same as the three submitted to the justices on April 12, 1892, the answers to which appear in 155 Mass. 601, 15 L. R. A. 809, 30 N. E. 1142. We adopt and reaffirm the doctrines stated in the first of the opinions then submitted to the house of representatives. A separate opinion, then submitted by another of the justices, rests upon the same principles as the first. We do not deem it necessary to restate the reasons and arguments which have led legislatures and courts to nearly, if not quite, uniform conclusions in regard to the attitude which the government should maintain, under existing constitutions, towards the transaction of common kinds of business which can be conducted successfully by individuals without the use of any governmental function. These can be found in numerous published opinions of the courts, some of which are cited in the opinion first above mentioned.

It is established that under our Constitution private property cannot be taken from its owner except for a public use. This is equally true whether the property is a dwelling house, taken by right of eminent domain, or money demanded by the tax collector. The establishment of a business like the buying and selling of fuel requires the expenditure of money. If this is done by an agency of the government, there is no way to obtain the money except by taxation. Money cannot be raised by taxation except for a public use. Until within a few years, it generally has been conceded, not only that it would not be a public use of money for the government to expend it in the establishment of stores and shops for the purpose of carrying on a business of manufacturing or selling goods in competition with individuals, but also that it would be a perversion of the function of government for the state to enter as a competitor into the field of industrial enterprise with a view either to the profit that could be made through the income to be derived from the business or to the indirect gain that might result to purchasers if prices were reduced by governmental competition. There may be some now who believe it would be well if business was conducted by the people collectively, living as a community, and represented by the government in the management of ordinary industrial affairs. But nobody contends that such a system is possible under our Constitution. It is plain, however, that taxation of the people to establish a city or town in the proprietorship of an ordinary mercantile or manufacturing business would be a long step towards it. If men of property, owning coal and wood yards, should be compelled to pay taxes for the establishment of a rival coal yard by a city or town, to furnish fuel at cost, they would thus be forced to make contributions of money for their own impoverishment; for, if the coal yard of the city or town was conducted economically, they would be driven out of business. A similar result would follow if the business of furnishing provisions and clothing, and other necessities of life, were taken up by the government; and men who now earn a livelihood as proprietors would be forced to work as employees in stores and shops conducted by the public authorities. Except for the severely onerous conditions from which we are now suffering, the causes of which arose outside of this state, beyond the reach of our legislative enactments, there is nothing materially different between the proposed establishment of a governmental agency for the sale of fuel and the establishment of a like agency for the sale of other articles of daily use. The business of selling fuel can be conducted easily by individuals in competition. It does not require the exercise of any governmental function, as does the distribution of water, gas, and electricity, which involves the use of the public streets and the exercise of the right of eminent domain. It is not important that it should be conducted as a single large enterprise, with supplies emanating from a single source, as is required for the economical management of the kinds of business last mentioned. It does not even call for the investment of a large capital, but it can be conducted profitably by a single individual of ordinary means. We therefore have no hesitation in answering the first three questions in the negative.

The fourth question presents greater difficulties. Evidently it is suggested by the painful experiences in attempting to procure fuel, from which we have lately been suffering. The questions are accompanied by copies of bills and resolves pending before the general court, one of which is entitled "An Act to Authorize Cities and Towns to Buy and Sell Fuel in Certain Emergencies." This question must be interpreted in reference to the conditions to which it refers and in reference to the remedy which it suggests. The only proposed remedy to which it relates is the establishment by a city or town of fuel or coal yards, or the purchase of coal, wood, or other fuel for the purpose of selling it to the inhabitants of the city or town, or to others: The only condition referred to in the question is "an extraordinary emergency," and the conditions referred to in the accompanying bill are "a scarcity of fuel, and a pressing need thereof," and "a reasonable ground of belief that such a condition will occur in the near future." It hardly can be contended that the remedy suggested by the question can have any effect upon the primary cause of all our troubles in this particular. That cause relates to sources of supply beyond the boundaries of this state. There is no reason to expect that any similar cause will arise within this state to affect such small sources of supply as exist here. If it is possible to conceive of the existence of such a cause arising hereafter in this commonwealth, it can be dealt with effectually, not by the establishment of municipal yards for the sale of fuel at retail, but by some different kind of legislation which will make it impossible for either of two parties to a controversy like that which lately existed in a neighboring state to refuse all proposals for an equitable determination of the rights of the parties, and thus to bring both to the verge of ruin, and to imperil the industries, and to some extent the lives and health, of communities far away from the neighborhood of the conflict.

Looking to the possible consequences of the emergency for which a remedy is desired, they can be divided into four classes: First, an increase of the number of those who fall into distress and are in need of relief from the public authorities, because they have no means to buy fuel at a greatly increased price; secondly, increased expenditure, to their serious detriment, by those who have the means to buy; thirdly, a pos-ability of a famine in fuel, such as to make it impossible reasonably to supply the needs of the community for comfortable living; fourthly, a scarcity falling short of a famine, but yet so great as to create widespread and general distress in the community, which cannot be met by private enterprise. The first of these possible consequences does not call for legislation. Cities and towns now have ample power to provide in any reasonable way for paupers, whether it be by furnishing out of door relief or by support in almshouses, and whether their need of relief is permanent or caused by a temporary condition. It is equally true that the second of these consequences does not justify taxation of those who do not have occasion to buy coal for the benefit of those who do. The use of the money of taxpayers for such a purpose would not be a public use, but a use for the special pecuniary benefit of those who happen to be affected by the state of the coal market. The third possibility—that of an absolute famine in fuel because of the lack of a supply and the impossibility of obtaining a sufficient quantity reasonably to satisfy the needs of the community—would be a condition which would warrant the expenditure of the public money under appropriate legislation, if the legislature could discover a way through public agencies to supply the people. But it is difficult to see how the method referred to in the question could produce this result. If at any time there was an impossibility of obtaining supplies because the supplies were not here, and could not be bought elsewhere, the opening of a city coal yard would furnish no relief. Such an establishment could not work a miracle of creation. In reference to an anticipated possible famine, the procurement and storage of a supply in time of plenty might be a remedy or an alleviation if the dread anticipation should become a reality, but the maintenance of a city fuel yard to conduct the business of buying and selling in a time of plenty would have no tendency to avert a famine, or to relieve from its consequences if one should come. We are not called upon to consider whether the legislature would deem it advisable, if it has the power, to authorize cities and towns to build storehouses in which to keep large quantities of fuel in anticipation of a possible famine. In regard to the fourth of the possible consequences,—a condition in which the supply of fuel would be so small, and the difficulty of obtaining so great, that persons desiring to purchase it would be unable to supply themselves through private enterprise,—it is conceivable that agencies of government might be able to obtain fuel when citizens generally could not. Under such circumstances we are of opinion that the government might constitute itself an agent for the relief of the community, and that money expended for the purpose would be expended for public use.

We do not think that we are expected to determine whether there might be any other conceivable emergency which would call for an affirmative answer to this question. Considering the question only in reference to the accompanying bills and the conditions to which we suppose it relates, our answer is in the negative, except in reference to the fourth of the above-mentioned possible consequences. As to that we are of opinion that, if the supposed conditions exist in any city or town, it may be authorized, under proper legislation, to sell fuel, with the limitations above stated, so long as these conditions continue.

To the Honorable the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

I concur with my brethren in the above opinion, excepting only in the answer given in case of the fourth possible consequence of a scarcity of fuel therein described. I have not been able to persuade myself that, under the circumstances there supposed, a city or town could get any fuel to sell, if action were taken in the way in which, in the opinion of my brethren, it is permissible to proceed. The question is the question of the absence of heat to support life in this latitude without a readjustment of the means of heating now generally in use. Coal in cities and wood or coal in towns may be taken to be a necessity of existence at the present time. Oil, or electricity developed by water power, until time for readjustment has come, cannot be taken to be an adequate method of heating. Were Massachusetts a coal-producing state, it may well be that to prevent such a scarcity of fuel as is described in the supposed case the state could intervene by regulating the business of mining coal, or other similar action, and thereby get coal for its inhabitants. But where there is such a scarcity of coal that individual enterprise is not able to buy it, with all the powers which are attendant on organizations of individuals and with the foresight in buying before the event which prospective profits and a due consideration for their fellows would dictate, it is inconceivable that any coal could be got by cities or towns, which could be sold by them, if the course of action were taken which my brethren are of opinion is open to the legislature to take. I understand that in the opinion of my brethren the authority cannot be given until the scarcity referred to has been found by the legislature to exist, and that the legislature cannot authorize a city or town to buy the fuel which it is to sell when the city or town is of opinion that the scarcity referred to exists, or is likely to exist. In my opinion, such a remedy is purely theoretical, and for that reason should not be considered in answering the questions which have been submitted to us. Necessity is the only ground for justifying the government in entering upon the business enterprise of buying and selling coal. It is said that that necessity does not arise until it has been ascertained by the legislature that the situation is so desperate that individual enterprise has failed to provide coal for the public to buy. Where the situation is so desperate, I cannot conceive how the interference of government, which is not to exercise any governmental function, can hope to be successful.

In answer to the third possibility, my brethren have demonstrated that establishing a coal yard will not meet the necessity produced by a famine. The same argument applies to the remedy of the government's setting up a coal yard in case of the fourth possibility. The only other thing the government can do in that contingency is to pay the difference between the price which has to be paid to the dealers and the reasonable price which is within the means of some members of the public. Such a payment is not, in my opinion, a payment for a public use, unless made in the exercise of the right to care for paupers. I concur with my brethren that, fuel being a necessity, the state can provide its inhabitants with it in case of a famine, in the exercise of the power which makes it its duty to take care of paupers. I also concur in their opinion that the state cannot authorize its cities or towns to go into the coal business because the price of fuel is likely to be high. Practically, the question must, in my opinion, be one of these two, and there is no middle course open.

The fourth question submitted is "pounded with a view to legislation upon the subjects therein mentioned, and in respect of divers bills and resolves pending before the general court, copies whereof are hereby ordered to be transmitted herewith." The bills and resolves transmitted with the question do not contemplate a famine in fuel, or a reasonable apprehension of a famine in fuel. For that reason the fourth question does not call for the expression of an opinion upon what can be done by the state under the power of assisting paupers in case of a famine in fuel, or an apprehension thereof. And, answering the fourth question as it was put, I answer it in the negative.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

581 DIAMONDS (Charles B. VAN ANTWERPEN et al., Claimants, Pliffs. in Err.)

v.

UNITED STATES of America.

(119 Fed. 556.)

The attempted smuggling of goods into the United States will justify their forfeiture, as against the claims of one from whom they were obtained by the smuggler by a fraudulent purchase, which remains unrescinded.

(January 6, 1903.)

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan to review a judgment condemning certain diamonds which were alleged to have been fraudulently imported without entry in the customhouse. Affirmed.

Statement by Day, Circuit Judge:

On the 6th of July, 1899, the district attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan filed an information seeking to condemn 581 diamonds, alleged to have been forfeited. The record discloses that these goods were seized when about to be unlawfully imported and smuggled into the United States on June 28, 1899, at Detroit, Michigan, by one Louis Bush. Proceedings were duly had resulting in a judgment of forfeiture, which, so far as Bush is concerned, is not now contested. On the 22d of January, 1900, the firm of Van Antwerpen & Van Den Bosch were allowed to intervene and plead in the case. These parties claimed the diamonds as against the right of the government to forfeit the same, and after further proceedings (not necessary to set out), were allowed to file an amended answer in the case, setting up their claim, which is as follows:

The amended answer of Charles B. Van Antwerpen and Jean C. Van Den Bosch, the respondents to the above action, and intervening therein, now and at all times hereinafter saving to themselves any and all manner of benefit and exception that can or may be had or taken to the errors, uncertainties, and imperfections in the libel of information filed herein, for answer thereto, or to so much thereof as these defendants are advised is material and necessary to make answer to, answering say:

First. That they are now, and were at all times hereinafter set forth, copartners doing business in the city of Antwerp, Kingdom of Belgium, under the firm name and style of Van Antwerpen & Van Den Bosch, dealing in diamonds, cut and uncut.

Second. That on or about the 6th day of June, in the year 1899, one Max Hurvich called upon respondents and stated that he desired to purchase diamonds from respondents.

Third. Said Hurvich represented to respondents that he had been theretofore engaged in the clothing business in the city of New York, United States of America, but had given up said business and was about to engage in the purchase and sale of diamonds in said city of New York, and would make his office and place of business at the premises number nine (9) Maiden Lane, in said city; that he had considerable means, and was worth over and above all liabilities upwards of the sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000), and desired to purchase from respondents diamonds on credit, and was making these representations as to his financial standing for the purpose of inducing respondents to give him a line of credit.

Fourth. That for the purpose of inducing respondents to give him a line of credit he did then and there further represent to respondents that he had theretofore had business dealings with certain persons residing in the city of New York, and that all his dealings with such persons had been satisfactory to such persons; that so far as respondents can remember the persons so referred to by said Hurvich are Roseman, Maiden Lane, New York.

Fifth. As a further inducement why respondents should sell diamonds to said Hurvich, he represented to respondents that, in order to prepare to conduct and carry on the business in which he was about to engage, he needed large sums of cash, and therefore was not able to pay cash to respondents for all the goods which he at that time desired to purchase.

Sixth. Said Hurvich further represented to respondents that within six or seven months he would realize cash from some of his other property, and would be in a position to pay whatever there might be due on the unpaid purchase price of whatever diamonds he might purchase of respondents, and that his property was amply sufficient to enable him to raise all the funds that he might need for that purpose.

Seventh. Respondents, further answering, show that they believed each and every of said representations so made by said Hurvich to be true, and in reliance thereon, did on said 6th day of June, 1899, sell and deliver to said Hurvich, at said city of Antwerp, a large number of diamonds, to wit, upwards of five hundred and twenty-five (525) diamonds of various weights and measurements, to the value of four thousand two hundred and seventy-seven (4,277) pounds, twelve (12) shillings, and six (6) pence in English money, and in reliance upon the truth of said statements so made as aforesaid by said Hurvich did give said Hurvich credit on the purchase price of said diamonds to the extent of two thousand two hundred and seventy-seven (2,277) pounds, twelve (12) shillings, and six (6) pence in English money, and did agree to allow said Hurvich until the 18th day of December, 1899, to pay said last-mentioned sum, which said last-mentioned sum it was agreed said Hurvich should pay at London, England.

Eighth. Respondents, further answering, show that since the aforesaid purchase from respondents said Hurvich has admitted that at the time of said purchase he had formed the purpose of obtaining said diamonds without paying therefor the said sum of two thousand two hundred and seventy-seven

(2,277) pounds, twelve (12) shillings, and six (6) pence so remaining unpaid as aforesaid on the purchase price; and, further, that prior to the purchase of said diamonds, and at the time of the purchase thereof, he had formed the purpose of obtaining said diamonds without paying the full purchase price thereof, and with the intention and purpose of raising money on them by pledging or selling them to pawnbrokers or other persons who might be found willing to lend money thereon, or to purchase them at prices below their market value.

Ninth. Respondents, further answering, show that in furtherance of said fraudulent purpose and design said Hurvich did not pay said sum of two thousand two hundred and seventy-seven (2,277) pounds, twelve (12) shillings, and six (6) pence when the same became due as aforesaid, at the city of London, England, on the said 18th day of December, 1899.

Tenth. Respondents, further answering, say that they are advised and believe, and upon such information and belief they charge the fact to be, that said Hurvich, with said diamonds in his possession, proceeded directly from said city of Antwerp to the Dominion of Canada, and there met one Louis Bush, who, your respondents charge, was a confederate of said Hurvich, and did then and there turn over and deliver to said Bush the said diamonds so as aforesaid obtained from respondents.

Eleventh. Respondents, further answering, say that since their former answer herein said Hurvich has admitted that the said diamonds now in the possession of the said court are a portion of those so obtained as aforesaid from respondents.

Twelfth. Respondents, further answering, say that, had they known at the time said representations so made as aforesaid by said Hurvich to them to be untrue, they (said respondents) would not have surrendered and delivered up said diamonds to said Hurvich.

Thirteenth. Respondents, further answering, say that the said representations made by the said Hurvich to said respondents, and upon which said respondents relied in making the sale and delivery of said diamonds, were each and every of them false and untrue, and respondents show that said Hurvich was not on said 6th day of June, 1899, worth over and above all liabilities upwards of the sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000); and respondents further show that the dealings of said Hurvich with the persons mentioned in the fourth paragraph of this answer had not been satisfactory to said persons; and respondents, further answering, deny that said Hurvich on said 6th day of June, 1899, had any property whatsoever from which he could realize cash within six or seven months after said last-mentioned date, as he told respondents he would be able to do; and respondents deny that he had any property sufficient to enable him to raise all the funds that he might need for the purpose of paying these respondents.

Fourteenth. Respondents, further answering, show that said representations so made as aforesaid by said Hurvich were false and untrue, and made for the purpose of inducing these respondents to part with said diamonds to said Hurvich without receiving full payment therefor, and in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme and purpose theretofore entered into by and between said Hurvich, one Louis Bush, and one Louis Rosenberg of said city of New York, wherein and whereby it was agreed that said Hurvich should obtain said diamonds of your respondents by fraud and deceit, and when obtained he, with said Bush and said Rosenberg, should dispose of the same and the proceeds therefrom share with said Bush and Rosenberg.

Fifteenth. Respondents, further answering, say that they have been told that said Louis Rosenberg, named in the answer filed by said Louis Bush herein, is a pawnbroker in the city of New York, and they deny that said Louis Rosenberg is the owner of said diamonds, or any or either of them.

Sixteenth. Respondents, further answering, show that said five hundred and eighty-one (581) diamonds seized by the officers of the United States government, and which are the diamonds now being proceeded against in this honorable court, are some of the same diamonds so fraudulently obtained from them by said Hurvich.

Seventeenth. Respondents, further answering, show that they are prepared to repay, and do now tender, to this honorable court, or to such person as this court may determine to be entitled thereto, the said sum of two thousand (2,000) pounds, so paid as aforesaid by said Hurvich to respondents as a part of the purchase price of said diamonds.

Wherefore respondents pray that upon the final hearing herein this honorable court may order and decree that the diamonds seized herein be, and are, the rightful property of the respondents, and that the same be restored to them free of duty; and they pray for such other and further relief as this honorable court may deem just and proper under the circumstances.

The district attorney filed exceptions raising the question of the sufficiency of this answer to entitle the claimants to the relief prayed for. These exceptions were sustained by the district judge, who found that Van Antwerpen & Van Den Bosch were not entitled to the goods, but the same were adjudged forfeited to the United States. From this order and judgment a writ of error is taken to this court.

Argued before Lurton, Day, and Severens, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Peter Zucker, with Messrs. Bowen, Douglas, & Whiting, for plaintiffs in error:

Van Antwerpen & Van Den Bosch claim the right to rescind the sale and recover the diamonds.

Claimants had a right to rely upon the express statements made by Hurvich, and they were under no obligation to investigate and verify his statements.

Mead v. Bunn, 32 N. Y. 275; McBeth v. Craddock, 28 Mo. App. 380.

It will not do to insist that these representations must have been such as to deceive a man of ordinary care and prudence.

Chamberlin v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 247, 9 Atl. 832.

As these false statements were matters peculiarly within the knowledge of Hurvich and were positive affirmations, plaintiffs in error had the right to rely upon them.

A person who buys goods upon credit impliedly, if not expressly, represents that he intends to pay for them. If, therefore, he has then no such intention, and, a fortiori, if he has then a present intention not to pay for them, and conceals this fact from the seller, there is such a misrepresentation of a material fact as will entitle the seller, either to avoid the sale, or to maintain an action for deceit.

The condition of insolvency does not seem, upon principle, to be necessary.

Even though the United States might be said to have acquired title without notice of the defects in Hurvich's title to the diamonds, it can hardly be said that the United States has parted with value upon the faith of Hurvich's title, and upon the faith of his right to dispose of the diamonds.

The United States had seized the goods, and the title thereto had become vested in the United States, before the claimants had even attempted a rescission of the contract of sale. The United States had, therefore, on June 28, 1899, as an innocent third party, acquired an interest in and a complete title to the diamonds, and the interest and title of the United States so acquired were and are superior to those of a bona fide purchaser.

Claimants sold the diamonds to Hurvich, and intrusted him with the possession of them for the purpose of bringing the same into the United States, and his relation to the claimants while proceeding to and into the United States with the diamonds in his possession would be that of an agent for the claimants for that purpose.

Day, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

As between the government and Bush there can be no question that the right to forfeit the goods seized has been fully and clearly made out. Bush was caught with the diamonds concealed in his shoes. He denied all knowledge of how he came to be thus possessed of the gems when entering the port of Detroit. On his way to the prison he practically confessed his offense in saying to the officer: "Now, if you have got all that you are looking for, let me go." The only question of importance in the case is as to the sufficiency of the amended answer of Van Antwerpen & Van Den Bosch to require the diamonds to be returned to them, instead of forfeited to the government. If the diamonds were imported in violation of the statute, it is established law that the forfeiture dates from the time of the commission of the wrongful act, and binds the goods from that date. Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 14 Wall. 44, sub nom.

United States v. 100 Barrels Distilled Spirits, 20 L. ed. 815. For the purposes of this inquiry we may regard the amended answer of the claimants as true. Thus treated, it makes allegations sufficient to establish the fraudulent character of the purchase of the diamonds by Hurvich. It is distinctly averred that not only did Hurvich make false statements to induce the sale as to his financial responsibility, but it is alleged that the goods were purchased in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme not to pay for them. In such case there can be no doubt of the right of the vendor to rescind the sale and recover the goods in the hands of the vendee, or from others than innocent purchasers for value. The rule is thus tersely stated by Mr. Justice Davis, in Donaldson v. Farrell, 93 U. S. 631, 23 L. ed. 993; "The doctrine is now established by a preponderance of authority that a party not intending to pay, who, as in this instance, induces the owner to sell him goods on credit by fraudulently concealing his insolvency and his intent not to pay for them, is guilty of a fraud which entitles the vendor, if no innocent third party has acquired an interest in them, to disaffirm the contract and recover the goods. Byrd v. Hall, 2 Keyes, 647; Johnson v. Monell, 2 Keyes, 655; Noble v. Adams, 7 Taunt. 59; Kilby v. Wilson, Ryan & M. 178; Bristol v. Wilsmore, 1 Barn. & C. 514; Stewart v. Emerson, 52 N. H. 301; Benjamin, Sales, § 440, note of the American editor, and cases there cited."

In Morrow Shoe Mfg. Co. v. New England Shoe Co. 24 L. R. A. 417, 6 C. C. A. 515, 18 U. S. App. 256, 57 Fed. 693, it is said: "The seller, on discovering the fraud, may affirm the sale and sue for the price, or he may disaffirm it and reclaim the goods, or he may proceed criminally."

Notwithstanding the fraud, if there is an intention to part with the title, as well as the possession, the title passes subject to the right of the vendor to rescind the sale and reclaim the property. Benjamin, Sales, § 517. It is the intent of the law, so far as the forfeiture feature is concerned, to work that result only in cases where the owner, or some of those named in the statute, in his interest, are guilty of the attempt to defraud the revenue. Origet v. United States, 125 U. S. 240, 31 L. ed. 743, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846; United States v. 1,150½ Pounds of Celluloid, 27 C. C. A. 231, 54 U. S. App. 273, 82 Fed. 627. The contention in this case is that neither Hurvich nor Bush were the owners of the goods, and that the real ownership as against the government's claim was in the claimants. When the goods were delivered to Hurvich under the circumstances detailed in the amended answer, he became the owner of them. He had the unqualified right to the possession thereof. He might lawfully remove them. That he intended to import them into the United States was well known to the vendors; not, it is true, with authority of the sellers to smuggle them into the country, but the control and possession of the property was delivered up, leaving the vendors to the right 60 L. R. A.

to rescind if they chose and recover the property. But there was always the chance that before the vendor became acquainted with the facts, or after knowledge and before action was determined upon, the one who had the ownership and control of the property might change its status so as to render ineffectual the right to rescind. The authorities agree that this would be the result of a sale to an innocent purchaser. It might be encumbered in favor of one who dealt in good faith on the strength of the apparent ownership and title.

The question made is: Can the vendor assert this right against the right of the United States to forfeit the goods, when the one thus clothed with title and possession has attempted to smuggle them into the country in violation of its revenue laws? The statute under which forfeiture is claimed by the government is as follows: "That if any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person shall make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or by means of any false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatsoever, or shall be guilty of any wilful act or omission by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties, or any portion thereof, accruing upon the merchandise, or any portion thereof, embraced or referred to in such invoice, affidavit, letter, paper, or statement, or affected by such act or omission, such merchandise, or the value thereof, to be recovered from the person making the entry, shall be forfeited, which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise, or the value thereof, in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which such fraud or false paper or statement relates. And such person shall, upon conviction, be fined for each offense a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned for a time not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court." Act June 10, 1890, § 9, 1 Rev. Stat. Supp. p. 749 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1895].

Statutes to prevent frauds upon the revenue are considered to be enacted for the public good, and therefore, although they impose penalties or forfeitures, are not to be construed like penal laws generally, but are to be fairly and reasonably construed, so as to carry out the legislative intent. United States v. Stowell, 133 U. S. 1, 33 L. ed. 555, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 244. It will be observed that the wrongful act, in order to work the forfeiture, must be done by "the owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person." It is the attempt of this class of persons to evade the revenue laws of the United States; that is, to deprive the owner of his property as a punishment for such unlawful practice. In United States v. 1,150½ Pounds of Celluloid, 27 C. C. A. 231, 240, 54 U. S. App. 273, 82 Fed. 627, this court held that the descriptive words following the term "owner," to wit, "importer, consignee, agent," all describe some person having a relation to the owner, and for whose conduct in respect to his goods he may be responsible. It was further held that "other person," as here designated, meant some one of the same general class as those described in the associated terms used in the statute. It is, then, primarily the "owner" who is to be reached and punished by the forfeiture. When these goods were attempted to be smuggled in by Bush, it is directly averred that he was acting in collusion with Hurvich. If the averments of the amended answer are true, the latter, the legal owner of the goods, was deep in this scheme to defraud the revenue.

The statute is plain and clear in visiting the penalty of forfeiture upon the owner and his importer, consignee, or agent. Are we at liberty to so modify the statute as to qualify this right by reading into it an exemption of property, which, though fraudulently imported by the owner, is in such situation as to title that, because of the fraud of the owner, another might have claimed the property and divested the title? We cannot perceive on what principle we may do this. When an act comes within the terms of the statute, working a forfeiture which may entail a hardship, it is nevertheless to be enforced, not repealed or modified, by the courts. The right of Congress to pass suitable revenue laws is conceded. It is the business of the courts to enforce such as are constitutionally passed. "Congress possesses the power to levy taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and it is as clear that Congress may enact penalties and forfeitures for the violation of such laws as it is that Congress may levy the taxes or duties or pass laws for their collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement." Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 14 Wall. 44-59, sub nom. United States v. 100 Barrels Distilled Spirits, 20 L. ed. 815-817.

So frequent are attempted frauds upon revenue laws that the wisdom of Congress cannot be doubted in making strict regulations, which shall preserve the revenue of the government and prevent undue privileges to those who seek to enter the markets against the honest importer with the unlawful advantage of free goods gained by fraudulent acts and practices. When the owner has forfeited the goods by the unlawful acts shown in this case and admitted in the answer, the operation of the statute seems clear, and the only judicial function is to enforce the law. To permit secret claims of ownership to be asserted after forfeiture would be in plain violation of the written law.

We have been unable to find any reported case which goes the length asked by the plaintiffs in error here. Two of those relied upon were reviewed by this court in United State v. 1,150½ Pounds of Celluloid, 27 C. C. A. 231, 54 U. S. App. 273, 82 Fed. 627. Of them Judge Lurton said: "In United States v. 208 Bags of Kainit, 37 Fed. 326, there was no doubt of the intent with which the trespasser had made the unlawful removal of the merchandise involved in that case. The forfeiture was defeated because the owner had not done or authorized these acts, and could, therefore, have had no guilty intent; and the case was decided against the government because it was necessary to show an actual intent on the part of the owner, or some person acting under his authority, or under whom he derived title. So, in the case of The Lady Essex, 39 Fed. 765, there was no doubt of the intent of the master of the Lady Essex. But the owner of the merchandise had not attempted to smuggle the goods into the United States, nor authorized the acts of those who had made such an attempt, and therefore could have no intent to defraud; and the language of §§ 12 and 16 of the act of [June 22] 1874, was construed by Judge Brown to 'apply to the owner of the goods, or his authorized agent, and not to a mere trespasser.'"

In The Celluloid Case the claim was made that the act of June 10, 1890 [Rev. Stat. § 2839, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1886], was broad enough to require the forfeiture of the goods, although the owner was wholly guiltless of any participation in the attempted fraud. In that case the celluloid was stored in Windsor. It was attempted to be smuggled into Detroit by an employee, who was acting without authority and for his own unlawful gain. It was held that this did not forfeit the goods as against the innocent owner. In all the cases cited the goods were not given over by the owner, but were taken wholly without authority and by acts which practically amount to theft or trespass. In holding against the claim of forfeiture the courts have construed the statute as not intending to take the property of the owner for the wrongful or criminal acts of others wholly unauthorized in the premises. In the present case, while there may have been the right to rescind this sale for fraud, it was the act of the owner in attempting to defraud the revenue which brings the case within the terms of the statute.

We find no error in the proceedings in the District Court, and its judgment will be affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Fred J. FEWINGS, Respt.,

v.

Luther MENDENHALL, Receiver of Duluth Street Railway Company, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. A carrier of passengers is charged with the highest degree of care and foresight consistent with the orderly conduct of its business, in respect to the protection of its passengers from injuries resulting from its acts or omissions, from the acts or omissions of its servants, and from the acts of strangers, who are under its control or direction; but it is charged with ordinary care and prudence only to guard against the lawless acts of third persons not under its direction or control.

2. Defendant was engaged in operating a street-car system, and his employees had inaugurated a general strike, which was bitterly contested, and resulted in much violence on the part of the lawless element among the strikers and their sympathizers. Defendant continued to operate his cars, and plaintiff was injured, when a passenger on one of them, by being struck upon the head by a stone thrown from the street into the car by a strike sympathizer, a person in no way under the control or direction of defendant. In this action to recover damages for such injury, it is held: (1) That defendant was not guilty of negligence in attempting to operate his cars during the strike; and (2) that the evidence is insufficient to justify a finding of actionable negligence against defendant as respects the act resulting in plaintiff's injury.

3. The rule of ordinary care and prudence is not so exacting as to require the person charged with its exercise to take unreasonable or extremely doubtful precautions to guard against the wilful and lawless acts of strangers. The failure of defendant to pull down the blinds of the car in which plaintiff was riding, or stretch a heavy canvas over the windows outside the car, was not negligence justifying a recovery against him.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying a motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Greene & Wood, for appellant:

Contributory negligence in its legal significance is such an act or omission on the part of a plaintiff, amounting to a want of ordinary care, as, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is the proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of.

Mr. John Jenswold, Jr., for respondent:

Assumption of risk, properly speaking, exists where the plaintiff "consents to waive a duty or a breach of duty, and undertakes whatever risk there is, without hope of compensation if the risk results in loss; whereas contributory negligence is some careless act or omission which brings about, and is the proximate cause of, an injury.

of contributory negligence, the expressions being used interchangeably.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of defendant. Plaintiff had a verdict in the court below, and defendant appealed from an order denying his motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial. The case was here on a former appeal. 83 Minn. 237, 55 L. R. A. 713, 86 N. W. 96. The facts are there fully stated, but for an understanding of the questions presented at this time a restatement is necessary; but in doing so we follow substantially the statement there made. Defendant, as receiver of the Duluth Street Railway Company, has operated its street-car system since July, 1898. On May 2, 1899, a general strike was inaugurated by the employees of the company, which was maintained until after the plaintiff was injured as hereinafter stated. Defendant procured other men to take the place of the strikers, and continued to operate the street-car lines. On Sunday evening, May 7th, plaintiff took passage in a car operated by defendant, at Superior, in the state of Wisconsin, for Duluth. While the car was going northerly along Garfield avenue in Duluth, and as it approached Michigan street, a young man, not in any way connected with the company as an employee or otherwise, not a passenger, nor in any way under the control or direction of defendant, threw a stone at the car in which plaintiff was so riding, which passed through the window thereof, and struck plaintiff on the head, whereby he was seriously injured. He brought this action to recover damages because of such injury, basing his claim to a right of recovery on the alleged negligence of defendant in failing to take proper precautions to prevent injuries from acts of this kind. The complaint alleges, among other things, that plaintiff, as a passenger, was exposed to imminent danger by reason of the violent and unlawful acts of the strikers and their sympathizers; and that defendant, in the exercise of due care and prudence, could have prevented the same and protected plaintiff and the other passengers in the car from injury; but, notwithstanding this, that he carelessly failed and omitted to warn the plaintiff of any danger, or to make any effort or take any precautions to prevent injury to him, or to provide or make use of any barriers or other means to avert injury resulting from acts of the kind complained of. It was held on the former appeal that defendant was not guilty of negligence in attempting to operate the cars during the strike, and that the trial court erred in submitting that question to the jury. The cause was remanded, and again tried, resulting in a finding by the jury that defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to take proper precautions to avert and prevent accidents of the kind complained of, and returned a verdict for plaintiff for the sum of $10,383.33.

The principal question presented for consideration at this time is whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain a finding of actionable negligence against defendant. Other questions are discussed in the briefs of counsel, but the evidence upon this question appears to be substantially the same as on the former trial, and it is due to the parties that the question be now met and determined, that the litigation may be brought to an end, and further expense obviated. In the consideration of this question it is proper to inquire, first, the degree of care required of defendant under circumstances like those shown, for, in determining whether he was guilty of negligence, which was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, we must be guided by the rules of duty and care necessary to be exercised in such cases. Though no exceptions were taken to the charge of the trial court, wherein the jury was instructed that defendant was charged with the highest degree of care and foresight for the protection of plaintiff while a passenger, the question is properly presented by the errors assigned on the motion for a new trial and by the assignments of error in this court. The strike which the employees of the street railway company inaugurated was bitterly and stubbornly contested, and resulted in much lawlessness and acts of violence on the part of the strikers and their sympathizers towards the property of the company, with the purpose in view of preventing the operation of the cars and forcing a submission to their terms. The act which resulted in plaintiff's injury was not committed by an employee, a fellow passenger, or by one having any connection or relation whatever with the company, but by a boy who was in no way under the control of the company or any of its agents. He was a sympathizer with the strikers, and by his act of lawlessness no doubt thought he was aiding their cause. The question as to the extent of responsibility of a carrier of passengers and the degree of care essential to be exercised for their protection as to acts committed by strangers to the carrier has never, prior to this case, been presented to this court for its decision. The general rule that such carrier is required to exercise the highest degree of care and foresight consistent with the orderly conduct of its business is one that has very uniformly been applied by all the courts in cases where the act or omission complained of as negligence was in respect to a matter under the control of the carrier. A carrier of passengers is required to exercise the highest care in respect to the equipment of its road and transportation facilities, in providing suitable machinery for the operation of its cars, in the employment of competent and faithful servants and agents, and generally, as to all acts pertaining in any way to the conduct of its affairs in furtherance of its undertaking as a carrier; and in respect to such matters the rule has always been very strict. It is insisted by plaintiff that the rule applies to this case, and that it was the duty of defendant, in view of the condition surrounding the strike, to exercise the utmost care and vigilance to guard and protect plaintiff, while a passenger, from acts of violence at the hands of persons, whether under the control of defendant or not, and from dangers from whatever source arising. It is insisted that the act of the boy who threw the stone in question was such as the defendant might, from the circumstances and conditions of the strike, reasonably have anticipated, and could have been guarded against and prevented. We have been cited to no case where the high degree of care essential as to matters within the control of the carrier has been extended and applied with all its force and strictness to acts of persons beyond its control, and for which it was in no way responsible, directly or indirectly. Some cases cited and relied upon by plaintiff do not sustain his position. Easton v. Central R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 7, 56 L. R. A. 508, 42 Atl. 486, was a case where the company had permitted hackmen to occupy its premises in soliciting trade, and a passenger was injured by their misconduct. The company was held liable; but the decision is placed upon the ground that the company had the right to control its depot grounds and buildings, and, as it permitted hackmen to occupy the same, was responsible to passengers for injuries resulting from their misconduct, if it failed to exercise proper care to protect them. Wright v. Chicago, B. & I. R. Co. 4 Colo. App. 102, 35 Pac. 196, was a case where the company permitted disorderly persons to become and remain passengers, and is not in point. It was the clear duty of the company in that case to exercise the highest care to prevent injury to passengers from the acts of disorderly passengers, and the strict rule was clearly applicable to the facts there shown. It is well settled that a carrier of passengers is bound to exercise the utmost care to maintain order and guard and protect passengers from violence and insult at the hands of fellow passengers, from such injury and insult as might reasonably have been anticipated or naturally expected to occur, in view of all the circumstances and the number and character of passengers on board. Lucy v. Chicago, G. W. R. Co. 64 Minn. 7, 31 L. R. A. 551, 65 N. W. 944; Mullan v. Wisconsin Central Co. 46 Minn. 474, 49 N. W. 249. The rule is founded upon the fact that the company has control of its cars and premises, a police supervision to prevent violations of the law, and may lawfully eject and remove disorderly persons therefrom, or arrest or otherwise suppress and control them. In Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Boyle, 115 Ga. 836, 59 L. R. A. 104, 42 S. E. 242, the employees of the company had taken two tramps, who were concealed about the train, and trespassers thereon, and placed them in the express car, tying them there with a rope about their wrists. During their struggle to escape one of them shot the express agent in charge of the car. The general principle of law was applied, and it was held that it was the duty of the railway company to protect its passengers from insult or injury at the hands of a fellow passenger, or third person, when the circumstances are such that a person in the exercise of that degree of diligence known to the law as extraordinary care would see and apprehend that the passenger was in danger of injury. It was accordingly held that, as the company had placed the tramps in the car, and assumed charge and control of them, the strict rule of care essential in such cases applied, and protected the express agent to the same extent as a passenger. Empire Transp. Co. v. Philadelphia & R. Coal & I. Co. 35 L. R. A. 623, 23 C. C. A. 564, 40 U. S. App. 157, 77 Fed. 919, and Huas v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 81 Ga. 792, 7 S. E. 629, were cases involving the liability of carriers of freight, and are not in point, for a different rule of responsibility exists as to such carriers. In respect to goods, a carrier is an insurer for the safe transportation and delivery of the property intrusted to it for carriage, and is relieved from liability only by the act of God or the public enemy. A carrier of passengers is not an insurer of their safety, and is liable to them for such injuries as result from its failure to exercise proper care for their protection. A number of other cases are cited and relied upon by counsel, wherein the general rule is stated substantially as contended for by him, namely, that a carrier of passengers is required to exercise the utmost vigilance to protect passengers from insult and injury from whatever cause arising; but an examination of them shows that they are all cases where the carrier had permitted third persons to enter upon its premises or cars, and thereafter failed to exercise a proper degree of care to restrain them from acts of lawlessness; and there can be no question as to their soundness. The question before us is whether this strict rule applies to the act of a stranger, such as here shown. That it does not is sustained by some very respectable authorities. Tall v. Baltimore Steam Packet Co. 90 Md. 248, 47 L. R. A. 120, 44 Atl. 1007; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinnon, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L. R. A. 820, 17 Atl. 14; Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 148 Pa. 180, 15 L. R. A. 416, 23 Atl. 989; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 123 Ill. 21, 14 N. E. 22. In our opinion, it would be unjust to require a carrier of passengers, either a steam or a street railway company, to exercise the utmost care and vigilance to guard and protect passengers from criminal acts of strangers, persons not under its control or subject to its orders, and for whose acts it is in no way responsible. And we hold, without further discussion, as respects the acts of such strangers, that carriers of passengers are liable to the exercise of ordinary care and prudence only. Such carrier is liable for all injuries resulting from the acts of strangers which are reasonably to be anticipated under the particular circumstances, and which ordinary care and prudence, had it been exercised, would have prevented.

It remains to consider whether, within this rule, the evidence is sufficient to sustain the charge against defendant of actionable negligence, the burden to show which was upon the plaintiff. The familiar rule that evidence of an accident is prima facie proof of negligence against the carrier can have no application to this case, because the act resulting in the injury did not arise from any act or omission of defendant. The presumption of negligence in such cases arises only where the thing causing the injury complained of was under the exclusive control of the carrier or its servants or employees. The act complained of here being that of a stranger, it was incumbent upon plaintiff affirmatively to prove that defendant failed to exercise proper care to prevent it. The question arises whether the evidence was sufficient to charge defendant with negligence in this respect. What, if anything, should he have done, which he did not do, to protect plaintiff and other passengers from acts of this kind? It is claimed that he should have pulled down the blinds of the car in which plaintiff was riding. It appears that the material of the blinds inside the windows was leather, and the contention is that, had they been pulled down, the stone thrown by the boy would not have passed into the car, or in any way injured the plaintiff. It is also contended that the defendant might have protected plaintiff from this injury by stretching a heavy can-was over the windows outside the car; and, lastly, that he should have informed plaintiff of the conditions existing during the strike, the fact that violent and lawless acts were being committed by the strikers and their sympathizers. As to the first two theories of plaintiff,—pulling down the inside blinds and stretching a heavy canvas outside the car over the windows,—we are of the opinion that the failure to do this is not sufficient on which to base a recovery. It would be unreasonable to require of defendant so to act, and though, perhaps, the suggested precaution would have prevented such an injury as that here complained of, and conceding that defendant was bound to anticipate an unlawful act of this kind, the rule of ordinary care and prudence is not so exacting as to require one charged with its exercise to take doubtful or unreasonable precautions to guard against the lawless acts of strangers. And, besides, it is reasonably clear that, had defendant pulled down the blinds of the car in question, or covered the outside of the windows with a heavy canvas, it would have provoked the strikers and their sympathizers to acts of greater violence. They would naturally have assumed, on seeing a car pass in that condition, that either the officials of the road or nonunion or scab employees were aboard, and it would have incited the lawless element to greater efforts to prevent the operation of the cars. As to the third proposition,—that defendant was in duty bound to notify plaintiff of the violent conduct of some of the strikers and their sympathizers,—we are unable to concur with plaintiff, for these reasons: He was a resident of Duluth, and had occasion daily to use the cars of defendant in passing to and from his home to his place of business. He knew that a strike had been inaugurated by the street-car employees, and the conditions surrounding it were so notorious and generally known as to preclude the possibility, even, that he was not fully aware of the lawlessness of the strikers. He was in as good a position as was defendant to anticipate dangers of this kind. Whatever defendant knew concerning the acts of the strikers was obvious and apparent to all persons of ordinary intelligence. Defendant exercised the precaution of inducing the city authorities to swear in a large force of extra policemen to prevent criminal acts of the strikers and their sympathizers. If they were unable to control the mob and prevent acts of this kind, we are at a loss to know what defendant could have done to prevent them, short of armoring his cars, and this, of course, would be so unreasonable a requirement as not to be thought of for a moment. It is not reasonable to suppose that, had defendant giving this warning to plaintiff, it would have had the effect claimed for it,—protected him.

Our conclusions upon the whole record are that the evidence relied upon is insufficient to charge defendant with actionable negligence. The questions on which we have disposed of the case at this time were not intended to be covered by the former decision. Some expressions in that opinion may be construed as announcing the law on certain phases of the case, but they were not so intended. But one question was there decided, and any expressions therein which may be inconsistent with the conclusions now arrived at must be regarded as obiter. Some members of the court, when the case was here before, were in some doubt upon the principal question now decided, but those doubts have been overcome fully by the further argument and consideration of the case, and we are all agreed upon the conclusions now reached.

The action has been tried several times. The facts are practically undisputed. The only claims of negligence relied upon by plaintiff in support of the verdict are those just pointed out, and for the reason that the failure of defendant in these respects is not sufficient to charge him with negligence within the rule of ordinary care and prudence, the case should be brought to an end, and further litigation and expense obviated by a final judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below, with directions to enter judgment for defendant.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel defendant to furnish her with maintenance and support, in which defendant, by way of cross bill, set up the nullity of the alleged marriage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. O. Dwyer, for appellant:

Appellee's cross bill did not pray for annulment of the marriage. The prayer was that he be divorced. Divorce and annulment of the marriage obligations are two separate and distinct reliefs. The one implies a valid marriage contract, the other just the opposite. It was necessary for appellee to pray for the relief he was seeking, and the court could not grant him another and different relief.

The prayer for relief determines the character of the action.

Keens v. Gaslin, 24 Neb. 310, 38 N. W. 797.

The judgment in this case should be reversed for the reason that § 45, chap. 25, Comp. Stat., does not contain words of nullity, and consequently the marriage was not void.

Even if the statute against divorced persons marrying again within six months was an impediment at the time the marriage in this case was entered into, the court having found that the parties to this action lived together as husband and wife for the period of six months after such impediment had ceased, consequently the marriage is good in law, and valid.

Mr. William Hayward, for appellee:

The trial judge, sitting as a court of equity, and having once acquired jurisdiction over the persons, as well as the subject-matter, in controversy, would have a perfect right to grant the relief found in the decree entered in this case.

Earle v. Earle, 27 Neb. 277, 43 N. W. 118; 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 804.

Specific words of nullity are in no sense essential. Our statute not only declares such remarriage unlawful, but subjects all violators thereof to all the penalties for bigamy.

(On petition for rehearing.)

This case is one where the marriage was meretricious and fraudulent in its inception. Where an illicit marriage is entered into by mutual consent of the parties, cohabitation after the removal of the impediment will not ratify the previous contract and thus constitute a valid marriage by consent.

Sullivan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 5th day of March, 1900, Harriet M. Eaton filed her amended petition in the district court of Cass county against Eli Eaton, alleging her marriage to him on March 21, 1899, alleging various acts of extreme cruelty on the part of the defendant toward her, the failure of her health in consequence thereof, and her enforced abandonment of her home; that she was without means of support; that defendant was possessed of valuable property, describing it; and concluding with a prayer for maintenance and support. The defendant answered, admitting the marriage as alleged by plaintiff, and denying generally all the other allegations of the petition, and in addition pleaded, by way of cross bill, two causes of action: (1) That the marriage between himself and the plaintiff was brought about through the solicitation of the plaintiff, who made various false representations regarding herself, upon the faith of which he married her; that she was guilty of many acts of cruelty, more or less specifically set out; and (2) it was alleged that plaintiff had imposed upon the defendant in inducing him to marry her when by an act of the legislature (Comp. Stat., § 45, chap. 25), she was under a disability, having obtained a decree of divorce from a former husband, Enis Goff, on the 2d day of December, 1898, in Johnson county, Nebraska. Defendant also alleged that he was illiterate, and knew nothing of the act of the legislature referred to at the time of his marriage; that plaintiff represented herself as having been for a long time divorced from her former husband, and that she was capable of entering into a valid contract of marriage with defendant; that he first learned of the time when said divorce was obtained on March 9, 1900, and that plaintiff's marriage with the defendant was in violation of law, and therefore void. The cross bill concluded with a prayer for divorce and for general relief, but subsequently, by leave of court, the prayer was amended. It now asks "that the said unlawful marriage between this defendant and said plaintiff be decreed a nullity, and that, should said court find said marriage lawful and valid, that said defendant be granted a divorce." Plaintiff denied generally the allegation of the cross bill, and pleaded that defendant had full knowledge of the divorce proceedings in Johnson county; that plaintiff knew nothing of the statute prohibiting remarriage until the filing of defendant's cross bill; that such act was unconstitutional and void; that her marriage with defendant was in good faith, and that, for a number of months after the expiration of six months from the decree of divorce, plaintiff and defendant continued to live and cohabit together as husband and wife, and thereby the marriage contract was ratified; that defendant, having had full knowledge of the divorce proceedings in Johnson county, was estopped from alleging such matters as ground for a divorce from plaintiff; and that the district court of Johnson county had jurisdiction to grant and did grant a divorce to plaintiff, without any limitations or conditions. A trial was had, which resulted in a finding that there was no equity in plaintiff's petition, and a finding against defendant on his first cause of action. Upon defendant's second cause of action the court found that the parties were married March 21, 1899; that plaintiff, Harriet M. 60 L. R. A.

Eaton, obtained a decree of divorce from Enis Goff in Johnson county December 2, 1898; that said decree of divorce was obtained without the knowledge of Eli Eaton; that the parties to this suit lived together until November 30, 1899; that the decree of divorce from Enis Goff, the former husband of plaintiff, was obtained less than six months prior to the marriage of plaintiff and defendant; that such marriage was in violation of law and a nullity; and that defendant had no knowledge of the time when the prior divorce was procured until just prior to the commencement of this action. The marriage between plaintiff and defendant was adjudged to be null and void, and was set aside, and defendant released from all marital obligations on account of such marriage. To secure a reversal of this decree, the case has been brought to this court by appeal.

The evidence taken at the trial not having been preserved, the only question presented by the record is whether, upon the pleadings and findings of fact, the decision in favor of defendant is right.

The force and effect of the marriage ceremony performed March 21, 1899, has been much discussed by counsel, and will be first considered. Sess. Laws 1885, §§ 1 and 2, chap. 49, are as follows:

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person who shall obtain a decree of divorce to marry again during the time allowed by law for commencing proceedings in error or by appeal for the reversal of such decree, and, in case such proceedings shall be instituted, it shall be unlawful for the defendant in error or appellee to marry again during the pendency of such proceedings, and a violation of this act shall subject the party violating it to all the penalties of other cases of bigamy.

"§ 2. No proceedings for reversing, vacating, or modifying any decree of divorce, except in so far as such proceedings shall affect only questions of alimony, property rights, custody of children, and other matters not affecting the marital relations of the parties, shall be commenced, unless within six months after the rendition of such decree, or in case the person entitled to such proceedings is an infant, a person of unsound mind, within six months, exclusive of the time of such disability."

The first section of this act, which is § 45 of the divorce law, has the effect, we think, of disqualifying a divorced person from marrying while the decree of divorce is subject to possible reversal. The will of the lawgiver is the law; and the avowed object of the legislature, as expressed in the title of the act of 1885, was "to prevent the marriage of divorced persons during the time allowed for proceedings to reverse the decree of divorce and during the pendency of such proceedings." As there can be no valid marriage without the consent of the state, the easy and obvious way for the state to prevent objectionable marriages is to withhold its consent. By the legislation we are considering, the state has said to divorced persons: "Thou shalt not;" and in this we are unable to discover any implication of consent. The legislature aimed at prevention. We know this, because it has said so. But it is contended that, while aiming at prevention, it fell short of its object, and achieved only repression, and that the law, instead of putting an end to obnoxious practice, acts as a mere deterrent,—a check and curb on the matrimonial impulse. Public policy no doubt favors the marriage contract, but it will not do to distort a plain statute in order to bring it into harmony with what the court may conceive to be the sound policy. The legislature determines the policy of the state, and, it having declared in express terms that it intended by the act of 1885 to stop an evil practice, the courts are not warranted in holding that the object of the law was, after all, not to stop the practice, but only to discourage it. The legislative intent is no less clearly expressed in the body of the act than in the title. "A violation of this act," it is declared, "shall subject the party violating it to all the penalties as in other cases of bigamy." The use of the word "other" in this clause is significant. It plainly implies that, notwithstanding the divorce, the former relation is regarded as still continuing. It implies that a divorced person, until his status becomes unalterably fixed, is to be considered and dealt with as though the decree of divorce had not been rendered. The statute, as we interpret it, is in harmony with the trend of modern legislation, and promotive of social order and sound morality. It is important—it is, indeed, of the highest importance—that the civil and social condition of every person be at all times fixed and certain. There should be no needless uncertainty about the status of any individual. Whether a person is capable or incapable of contracting a valid marriage should be clearly understood, and should not be made to depend upon a judicial decision to be rendered at some indefinite time in the future. The validity of a divorce depends ultimately, at the option of the defeated party, upon the decision of this court. Before the case is appealed, and while it is pending here, it is uncertain whether the parties are single or married. This being so, it would be manifestly unwise, when prevention is so easy, to permit a second marriage to be contracted during the time the case is appealable or while the appeal is pending. The intention of the legislature, as evidenced by the act of 1885, is not, we think, in doubt; but, if it were, we should, for the peace of society, and on considerations of morality and convenience, resolve the doubt against the capacity of a divorced person to marry during the proscribed period. The great importance of having the social status of every person fixed and certain at all times has induced some courts (Lucas v. Lucas, 3 Gray, 136; Bascom v. Bascom, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 125; Sheafe v. Sheafe, 29 N. H. 269) to hold that decrees of divorce are not reviewable. Others, for the same reason, have held, by strained constructions, that a statute providing for the opening of judgments rendered upon constructive service has no application to actions for divorce. O'Connell v. O'Connell, 10 Neb. 390, 6 N. W. 467; Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Kan. 181; McJunkin v. McJunkin, 3 Ind. 30; Gilruth v. Gilruth, 20 Iowa, 225. In Missouri there is an express statute providing that decrees of divorce shall not be subject to review. Richardson v. Stowe, 102 Mo. 33, 14 S. W. 810. Some states have statutes which declare that a divorced person shall be incapable of contracting marriage for a specified time, or while the case is appealable, and during the pendency of the appeal. Marriages contracted in violation of these statutes have been uniformly held to be null and void. Smith v. Fife, 4 Wash. 702, 17 L. R. A. 573, 30 Pac. 1059; McLennan v. McLennan, 31 Or. 480, 38 L. R. A. 863, 50 Pac. 802; Wilhite v. Wilhite, 41 Kan. 154, 21 Pac. 173. With respect to statutes which evidence the legislative intent only by a prohibition and a penalty, it may be said that two antithetical views find support in the adjudged cases. The supreme court of Mississippi recently reviewed these cases, and, while holding that a marriage contracted in violation of law is not void, felt constrained to admit that the weight of judicial authority was opposed to its conclusion. Crawford v. State, 73 Miss. 172, 35 L. R. A. 224, 18 So. 848. In reading the Mississippi case and other cases holding that the state impliedly consents to a marriage which it has forbidden, one cannot escape the conclusion that the hardship of the particular case exerted an undue influence on the decision, and that the hardships resulting from reversed sentences of divorce were altogether overlooked. It may seem harsh and cruel to render a decision which will involve an innocent person in guilt and bastardize after-begotten children, but these consequences are inevitable. They result from either interpretation of the law. A divorced person about to marry again should not be without positive knowledge of the legal consequence of his act. He should be given to understand that he is under absolute, and not under possible or probable, disability, and that any marriage which he may contract will be certainly null. He should not be encouraged to commit bigamy by being permitted to marry in the belief that the new union will be valid unless the decree by which he was divorced shall be reviewed and reversed. If we were to hold that marriages contracted in violation of the statute are valid, the decision would, in our judgment, be a powerful incentive to crime. Such marriages would be multiplied, and the evils resulting from reversed divorces would be incalculable. We have no disposition to construe the legislative interdiction as sovereign acquiescence in disguise, for, it seems to us, such a construction would be grounded neither on sound reason nor enlightened sentiment.

Another question to be determined is the legal effect of the cohabitation of the parties after the impediment to their marriage had been removed. In this state the only thing essential to a marriage is the consent of parties capable of contracting. Bailey v. State, 36 Neb. 808, 55 N. W. 241; Gibson v. Gibson, 24 Neb. 394, 39 N. W. 450. Even a license is not indispensable. Haggin v. Haggin, 35 Neb. 375, 53 N. W. 209. If the parties live together, and intend to sustain towards each other the relation of husband and wife, they are, in the absence of any impediment fatal to that relationship, legally married. The marriage between the plaintiff and defendant was an attempt made in good faith to form a legal union. Both intended to live in wedlock. In the absence of an impediment to the marriage, no ceremony would have been required; the mutual consent of the parties would have been sufficient. When the impediment was removed, why may not consent be inferred from continued cohabitation? This exact question arose in the House of Lords in the case of DeThoren v. Atty. Gen., reported in L. R. 1 App. Cas. 686, decided in 1876. The question turned upon the legitimacy of certain children born to a man and woman who were married in Scotland, going through a public ceremony in a church, believing the marriage a valid one. The man, however, had been divorced, and the time for appeal from the nisi decree had not expired at the time of the public marriage. In that case the contention was that the inference of marriage was rebutted, because the parties had commenced living together in pursuance of an invalid marriage, and that the consent deducible from cohabitation must be referred to the ineffectual ceremony. But it was there decided that "it must be inferred that the matrimonial consent was interchanged as soon as the parties were enabled by the removal of the impediment to enter into the contract;" and, further: "The ceremony which took place, although invalid, was undoubtedly a consent by the parties to live together as husband and wife. And their subsequent cohabitation was a proof of continued consent." In the case cited, Lord CLEMSWORTH said: "Taking the facts as they are stated in the case, and applying the law to them, the court of sessions is of opinion that, assuming the ignorance of the parties of the invalidity of the ceremony of marriage during the whole period of their cohabitation, yet, after the removal of the impediment to their marriage, and before the birth of their eldest son, they became married persons. I agree entirely with this opinion." In Rose v. Clark, 8 Paige, 574, Chancellor WALWORTH says: "It appears, however, from decisions in our own courts, as well as in England, that a subsequent marriage may be inferred from acts of recognition, continued matrimonial cohabitation, and general reputation, even where the parties originally came together under a void contract of marriage." Fenton v. Reed, 4 Johns. 52, 4 Am. Dec. 244; Blanchard v. Lambert, 43 Iowa, 229, 22 Am. Rep. 245. In the recent case of University of Michigan v. McGuckin, 62 Neb. 489, 57 L. R. A. 917, 89 N. W. 778, it was held, although the relations of the parties were originally meretricious, that marriage is a social status, the existence of which may be shown by conduct clearly indicating free consent and mutual intention to live in wedlock. Upon the conceded facts in this case, our conclusion is that the parties, by continuing to live together in the matrimonial relation, contracted a valid marriage.

The contention that § 45 of the divorce law is violative of the Constitution is overruled, on the authority of DeFrance v. Harmer (Neb.) 92 N. W. 159.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought upon an account for merchandise against one who claimed that he was exempt from service of process as a member of the legislature. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Broady and Clark & Allen, for plaintiff in error:

It is against public policy to permit an advantage to be taken of a person simply because he is in the public service.

Section 60 of the Code reads as follows: "Every other action must be brought in the county in which the defendant, or some one of the defendants, resides, or may be summoned."

A party can always "be found" where a sheriff can reach him to summon him, but he cannot always "be summoned" where he can be found. When the party is away from home in the public service, or in service only quasi public, as attending to his own cases in court, he cannot be sued and summoned so as to force him into some new litigation away from home.

This immunity does not depend upon statutory provisions.

Messrs. Love & Frampton, for defendant in error:

There is neither a rule of "public policy," nor any other rule, which exempts legislators from civil process in the absence of statute or constitutional exemption.

Lobingier, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was commenced in the district court of Lancaster county, December 31, 1900, on an account for merchandise alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendant. The latter filed objections to the jurisdiction and a motion to quash the service, alleging that he was a member of the Nebraska state senate which convened on January 1, 1901, and that he was in Lancaster county on the day previous for the sole purpose of attending the legislative session. The motion and objections were overruled, and defendant then answered, again claiming privilege from service in Lancaster county, admitting the purchase of most of the merchandise, but not from plaintiff, alleging that the items charged in the account were "unreasonable, unjust, and exorbitantly high," and that part of the goods were damaged when received. The answer also contained a general denial. There was a trial to a jury, which found for the plaintiff; but the only evidence contained in the bill of exceptions relates to the matters set forth in the objections to jurisdiction and motion to quash, and the petition in error from the judgment rendered on the verdict is restricted in its assignments to the same matters.

Defendant contends that he was not voluntarily in Lancaster county on the day when he was served, but was there in pursuance of official duty; that his presence might have been compelled by a call of the house; and that, while he might have been served at his home in Nemaha county, the service in Lancaster county was unauthorized and invalid. This contention calls for an investigation as to the extent of a legislator's immunity from judicial process. It is conceded that there are no constitutional or statutory provisions in this state which exempt a legislator from the service of civil process, and the exemption here claimed, if it exists at all, must be derived from the common law. We are first to inquire, then, What was the common-law rule? From time immemorial members of Parliament were privileged from arrest during the sessions of that body and for a reasonable period before and after, so as to permit them to attend and return home. The privilege appears to have originated in the necessity of maintaining the independence of the legislature as against the aggressions of the Crown, and of preventing the coercion of members by the use or abuse of criminal process. The privilege was not, however, restricted to such process, but extended to all cases where the member's person might be taken into custody. So long, therefore, as imprisonment for debt was in vogue, the peers and commons were exempt from this also, and from such of the civil writs as were executed by seizing and confining the person of the defendant. Thus, as late as 1841, it was held to be irregular to issue a capias ad satisfaciendum (which was executed by imprisoning the defendant until the debt and costs were paid) against a member of the house of commons in an action of assumpsit. Cassidy v. Stewart, 2 Mann. & G. 437.

The freedom of members from process of this kind, whether criminal or civil, rests upon the highest grounds of public policy. As was said by Lord Denman, Ch. J., in Stockdale v. Hansard, 9 Ad. & El. 115: "The proceedings of Parliament would be liable to continual interruption at the pleasure of individuals, if everyone who claimed to be a creditor could restrain the liberty of the members." Another ground, as pointed out by a learned constitutional historian, is "the supreme necessity of attending to the business of Parliament, the King's highest court." Stubbs, Const. Hist. Eng. § 452. But this immunity and the reasons therefor appear to have existed only as to process which required the detention of the person. After a diligent search we have been unable to find a single English case which decides that a member of Parliament or other legislative officer is exempt from the service of a mere summons at any time. That such exemption was sometimes claimed by the members themselves is true, but we find no instance where it was recognized and enforced by the courts. And, as was said by the eminent chief justice in the case last cited: "When this privilege was strained to the intolerable length of preventing the service of legal process, or the progress of a cause once commenced, against any member during the sitting of Parliament, or of threatening any who should commit the smallest trespass upon a member's land, though in assertion of the clear right, as breakers of the privileges of Parliament, these monstrous abuses might have called for the interference of the law, and compelled the courts of justice to take a part." Mr. Justice Wylie, in his learned and exhaustive opinion in Merrick v. Giddings, MacArth. & M. 55, mentions two cases (Doane v. Welsh and Ryver v. Cosins) in the reign of Edw. IV. (1461-1483) where "it was held that the privilege from arrest during the session of Parliament did not protect him from being impleaded, but only that he should not be arrested." In Benyon v. Evelyn, O. Bridg. 324, decided about the middle of the seventeenth century, it was declared to be "lawful to sue out an original against a member of the House of Commons, although Parliament is sitting." It is true that some of the text writers appear to announce a different rule as applicable to this period. In 4 Co. Inst. 24, there is a passage where the author, in speaking of a member of Parliament, says: "The serving of the said citation did not arrest or restrain his body, and the same privilege holdeth in case of subpoena." This passage, however, has been much criticized and declared to be unwarranted from the record on which the author relies. "The truth is," observed Chief Justice Bridgman in Benyon v. Evelyn, O. Bridg. 324, "my Lord Coke's treatise of the jurisdiction of Parliament is a posthumous work and, though I shall attribute as much to his learning in the law as to any sages in the law whatsoever, yet there not being that freedom in former times of having copies of the records at large as hath been since, when he comes to cite them he is guided by abstracts, which occasions miserable mistakes and by the modus tenendi parliamentum, which, as to the time of making it, was most certainly a counterfeit piece; so that there are a multitude of errors in his chapter concerning Parliaments, and in particular both these records are grossly mistaken." See also Hatsell, Precedents, p. 6; Merrick v. Giddings, MacArth. & M. 59. So, in 3 Stubbs, Const. Hist. Eng. §§ 452 et seq., the author speaks of members of Parliament as being privileged "from being impleaded in civil suits, from being summoned by subpoena or to serve on juries," etc.; but, while he mentions many cases of exemption from criminal process, he refers to no instance of immunity from the mere service of civil process, and it is evident that he is here speaking of privileges claimed by the members, rather than those recognized and enforced by the courts.

But whatever may have been the law at this time, and whatever the claims of the members, Parliament itself at an early period undertook to restrict the exemption process which restrained the liberty of the member. In 1649 the house of commons ordered that in case of a legal proceeding against a member he should receive written notice of its pendency, and that then "the member is enjoined to give appearance and proceed as other defendants in case of like suits or actions ought to do, or, in default thereof, both their estates and persons shall be liable to any proceedings in law or equity as other members of the commonwealth." See Journal of House of Commons quoted in Hoppin v. Jenckes, 8 R. I. 457, 5 Am. Rep. 597. In 1700 Parliament passed an act providing for the commencement of actions and the issue and service of process against members of Parliament, "at any time from and immediately after the dissolution or prorogation of any Parliament until a new Parliament shall meet or the same be reassembled, and from and immediately after any adjournment of both houses of Parliament for above the space of fourteen days, until both houses shall meet or reassemble." In 1709 a statute was enacted which provided that "any person or persons shall and may, at any time, commence and prosecute any action or suit in any court of record, or court of equity, or of admiralty, and in all causes matrimonial and testamentary, in any court having cognizance of causes matrimonial and testamentary, against any peer or lord of Parliament of Great Britain, or against any of the knights, citizens, and burgesses, and the commissioners for shires and burghs of the House of Commons of Great Britain for the time being, or against their or any of their menial or any other servants, or any other persons entitled to the privilege of Parliament of Great Britain; and no such action, suit, or any other process or proceeding thereupon, shall at any time be impeached, stayed, or delayed, by or under colour or pretence of any privilege of Parliament."

Thus the law stood at the separation of the colonies from the mother country. If, as has been declared in some jurisdictions, the English statutes enacted prior to the separation are to be treated as part of the common law (6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 279; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. Law, p. 18; Ex parte Blanchard, 9 Nev. 101), it is plain that the common law of the United States affords no immunity to legislators from the service of ordinary civil process. This, at least, appears to be recognized in the authorities. In Peters v. League, 12 Md. 58, 71 Am. Dec. 622, where a member of the Baltimore city council claimed exemption from the service of an attachment while in the discharge of his duties, the court said: "It is worthy of remark that peers and members of Parliament were liable at common law to be sued, though they could not be arrested on writs of capias. Here the process was an attachment, with a summons to the party as garnishee. Therefore the supposed analogy between members of the Baltimore city councils and of Parliament would not aid the appellant." Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed., p. 161, says: "By common parliamentary law, the members of the legislature are privileged from arrest on civil process during the session of that body, and for a reasonable time before and after, to enable them to go to and return from the same. By the Constitutions of some of the states, this privilege has been enlarged, so as to exempt the persons of legislators from any service of civil process." It was the view of this eminent commentator, therefore, that the common-law privilege needed to be "enlarged" before it could include exemption from the service of ordinary civil process. Among the states in which the privilege was thus "enlarged" were Connecticut, South Carolina, and Virginia, and under these remedial statutes were decided the cases of King v. Coit, 4 Day, 129, Tillinghast v. Carr, 4 McCord L. 162, and M'Pherson v. Nesmith, 3 Gratt. 237, though in the last named it was held that an exemption from all other process whatsoever would not prevent the issue of the writ, but merely suspend the service during the privilege. Under the Constitutions of most of the other states, as well as of the Federal government, however, the common-law rule, as Parliament had left it by the statute of 1769, was re-enacted. See 1 Stimson, Am. Stat. Law, p. 68. From the earliest Constitutions of the older states it has been carried forward until it has reached our own, where it appears as § 12 of article 3. And in State ex rel. Benton v. Elder, 31 Neb. 184, 10 L. R. A. 796, 47 N. W. 710, this court, in construing and commenting on that clause, declares that "the provision of the Constitution is merely a re-enactment of the common law."

We are cited to Bolton v. Martin, 1 Dall. 296, 1 L. ed. 144, where the court of common pleas of Philadelphia county held that a member of the convention called for the purpose of ratifying the Federal Constitution was exempt from the service of a summons during the session of that body. The opinion does not profess to follow any English case, but relies upon a passage in Blackstone's Commentaries, the status of which is thus explained in the instructive opinion heretofore quoted in Merrick v. Giddings, MacArth. & M. 63: "At that time seven, perhaps eight, editions of Blackstone's Commentaries had been issued. The two first editions were issued prior to the year 1770. The first was issued in 1765 from the Clarendon Press, Oxford. So, also, was the second. Both of these contain the passage as cited by Judge Shippen and quoted above; but after the passage by Parliament of the act of 10th of George III., chap. 50, in the year 1770, Mr. Justice Blackstone with his own hand struck out that passage and changed its reading to the present form, which is as follows: 'Neither can any member of either house be arrested and taken into custody, unless for some indictable offense, without a breach of the privilege of Parliament,' omitting the words 'or served with any process,' on which Chief Justice Shippen relied for his decision in Bolton v. Martin, eighteen years after the change had been made, and after numerous large editions of the work with the passage corrected had been given to the world. Nor was this the whole of the charge made by the eminent commentator at that time, for, immediately succeeding the sentence on which we have been remarking, he inserted an additional paragraph which is too long to quote.

. . . It is but a reasonable exercise of charity, however, to presume that Chief Justice Shippen, in making up his decision in that case, relied upon a copy from one of the early editions of the Commentaries, which he had probably studied in his youth and believed to be as unchanged and unchangeable as the Koran."

We are also referred to a statement in the opinion in Geyer v. Irwin, 4 Dall. 107, 1 L. ed. 762, that "a member of the general assembly is undoubtedly privileged from arrest, summons, citation, or other civil process during his attendance on the public business confided to him." Upon examination it will be found that this passage is a mere dictum, for no such question is present in the case. A legislator's attorney had confessed judgment in an action pending in the former's home county, and the supreme court of Pennsylvania, on appeal, said that the action could not have been forced to trial in the member's absence, but that his attorney, by confessing judgment, had waived the privilege. No other point was involved in the case. The court nowhere referred to Bolton v. Martin, 1 Dall. 296, 1 L. ed. 144, and even the dictum that the member's absence entitled him, as a matter of right, to a continuance was disapproved in Nones v. Edsall, 1 Wall, Jr. 189, Fed. Cas. No. 10,290. The doctrine of Bolton v. Martin, above referred to, was, however, applied to members of the legislature in the subsequent nisi prius case of Gray v. Sill, 13 W. N. C. 59, and in Ross v. Brown, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 142.

In 1840, the territorial supreme court of Wisconsin decided, in Doty v. Strong, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 84, that the immunity from arrest guaranteed to members of Congress by the Federal Constitution, included also exemption from service of ordinary civil process, and applied to a delegate from that territory. The writer of the opinion states that the only "authority" which he has been able to find on the subject is Geyer v. Irwin, 4 Dall. 107, 1 L. ed. 762, which, as we have seen, did not involve or decide the question at all. There was a dissenting opinion by the chief justice. The following year, in Anderson v. Rountree, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 115, the same court announced the same construction of the territorial statute which exempted members of the legislature from arrest. The opinion is written by the same judge (Miller) as in Doty v. Strong, and in the interval he seems to have found a reference to Bolton v. Martin, 1 Dall. 296, 1 L. ed. 144, which, as we have seen, was based upon a misapprehension of Blackstone. Judge Miller does not appear even to have seen a report of the case, but merely to have read a reference to it in Story's Commentaries on the Constitution. The construction of the word "arrest," so as to include the service of summons, seems to be peculiar to this territorial court, and to be without support elsewhere. Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed. p. 161, note, says: "Exemption from arrest is not violated by the service of citations or declarations in civil cases." That the construction was strained and an unnatural one, not likely to endure the test of time, seems to have been recognized even then in Wisconsin; for when the state was admitted, seven years later, the framers of its Constitution appear to have thought it necessary, in order to make it the law of that jurisdiction, to insert in that instrument an express provision that members of the legislature should not "be subject to any civil process during the session." Wis. Const. art. 4, § 15. In Miner v. Markham, 28 Fed. 387, the circuit court sitting in Wisconsin decided that a member of Congress was privileged from service of a summons while en route to the seat of government. The court conceded that the cases were not harmonious, but adopted the state court's construction, which had existed from territorial times, and which, as we have just seen, was embodied in the first Constitution.

The foregoing are all of the cases which we have been able to find, either from the aid of the briefs of counsel or otherwise, which lend any support to the doctrine that a legislator is privileged from the service of a summons. It will be seen that there is among them only one court (and that a territorial one) of last resort which has actually so decided, that its conclusion was reached with little or no opportunity for investigation of the authorities, and that its construction of the word "arrest" is unprecedented and unsound. On the other hand, the doctrine that a member of the legislature, like other citizens, is amenable to the service of a summons, finds ample support in the authorities. In Catlett v. Morton, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 122, the court held that, despite the constitutional guaranty of privilege from arrest, members of the legislature "are subject to the execution of any other process, as other citizens are." This case was decided nearly eighteen years before the Wisconsin cases above referred to, and, though directly opposed to their conclusions, is not noticed in either of them. The doctrine was reaffirmed in Johnson v. Offutt, 4 Met. (Ky.) 19, though there had meanwhile been a change in the statutes. In Gentry v. Griffith, 27 Tex. 461, a similar constitutional guaranty was construed with similar conclusions, and the court used the following language, which might well be applied to the reasoning of the Wisconsin case: "It would be difficult to distort any of these definitions so as to make them applicable to the simple service of citation, or giving notice to answer in a civil action." Rhodes v. Walsh, 55 Minn. 542, 23 L. R. A. 632, 57 N. W. 212, is also an instructive case, where the court, in an able opinion, holds that there is no exemption from ordinary process for members of the legislature. The Wisconsin decisions as to the immunity of members of Congress also seem to stand alone. The contrary was held in Merrick v. Giddings, McArthur. & M. 55, and Howard v. Citizens' Bank & T. Co. 12 App. D. C. 222, and exhaustive opinions are written in both. In Bartlett v. Blair, 68 N. H. 232, 38 Atl. 1004, the court, while declining to construe 60 L. R. A.

the Federal Constitution in advance of an adjudication by the supreme court, refused to quash the service of a writ at the residence of a member of Congress who was absent in attendance upon a session of that body.

But if the weight of authority were not so pronounced as it thus appears to be, and we felt at liberty to adopt the rule announced in the Pennsylvania and Wisconsin cases, we would not even then find sufficient support for plaintiff in error's contention that, though amenable to civil process, it could only be served upon him in his home county. None of the cases relied upon by him, and none of those above reviewed, so hold; nor do they, in our view, lend any support to this theory of the case. So far as they touch the question at all, they decide that the legislator is absolutely privileged from service,—not that he is privileged in one place and amenable in another. Thus, in Gray v. Sill, 13 W. N. C. 59, the member was served while at home during the recess of the legislature. Under the rule contended for by plaintiff in error, this would have been a valid service; but it was not so held. We see no room for any middle ground between the Pennsylvania and Wisconsin cases on the one hand and the authorities elsewhere on the other. Either the member is exempt from service or he is not. And, if he is not exempt, he is amenable to the provisions of § 60 of the Code, which, as always construed, authorizes him to be summoned in any county where he may be found. Moreover, we think that not only do the authorities relied on by plaintiff in error fail to assist him in his precise contention, but that also some of the authorities above referred to decide the exact point against him. Johnson v. Offutt, 4 Met. (Ky.) 19, is declared in plaintiff in error's reply brief to involve "nothing but whether the Constitution prevents any suit anywhere against a member of the legislature." But, as we read the case, it involves an additional point, and that the precise one which plaintiff in error urges here. The defendant in that case was served in Franklin county, wherein is situated Frankfort, the seat of government, and defendant, in the language of the opinion, "moved to quash the service of the summons, upon proof that he was a citizen and resident of Scott county, and representing that county as a member of the house of representatives, when the suit was brought and the summons served, and at the time of said motion, and that the legislature was then in session." This was the identical course pursued by plaintiff in error in the case before us, except that he could not show, as did the defendant in the case cited, that the legislature was in session at the time of the service. The overruling of his motion seems to us to determine the question which plaintiff in error raises here. Again, in Rhodes v. Walsh, 55 Minn. 542, 23 L. R. A. 632, 57 N. W. 212, the defendants were members of the legislature from various counties in Minnesota. The action was brought against them at St. Paul, in Ramsey county, during the session of the legislature, and each defendant sought to quash the service. It is true that it does not appear that any of these defendants conceded that they might have been served in their home counties; but there was quite as much room for the contention as exists here, and, if there had been any support in the authorities for such a distinction, it seems not a little singular that the point was not suggested either in argument or opinion.

In all our search we have found but one jurisdiction where the precise rule contended for by plaintiff in error obtains, and that is in Ohio, where it exists by virtue of the following section of the Code: "A member of the senate or house of representatives, or an officer of either branch of the general assembly, shall be privileged from answering to any suit which may be instituted against him in a county other than the one in which he resides, upon a cause of action which accrued ten days before the first day of the session of the general assembly of which he is an officer or a member; and all proceedings in actions to which any such person is a party shall be stayed during such session, and during the time necessarily employed in going thereto and returning therefrom." Bates's Anno. Stat. (Ohio) § 5031. In pursuance of an earlier, but similar statute, one of the nisi prius courts of Ohio held, in Orth v. McCook, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 624, that a member of the legislature could not be served at the seat of government, even though joined with other defendants who were served at their homes. As our own Code was borrowed from Ohio, the omission of the section above quoted seems doubly significant. We cannot here establish by judicial decision a rule which appears to have required legislative enactment in Ohio, especially when our own legislature has failed to adopt it.

But it is urged in plaintiff in error's briefs that the exemption of legislators rests upon grounds analogous to those which afford immunity to witnesses and suitors while in attendance upon judicial proceedings, and that considerations of public policy require us to adopt the same rule as to legislators. The immunity of witnesses in such cases is, in this state, expressly provided by statute. Code, § 363. So the immunity of suitors constitutes an ancient and well-recognized rule of the common law. In Cole v. Hawkins, 2 Strange, 1094, decided in 1738, it was held to be contempt to serve a suitor with process while he was in attendance upon a cause, and the court said: "The privilege was designed . . . to prevent any interruption of the business of the court." This is probably not the earliest case on the subject; but it illustrates the antiquity of the rule, which appears to prevail in all jurisdictions where the common law is in force. Palmer v. Rowan, 21 Neb. 452, 59 Am. Rep. 844, 32 N. W. 210. But the doctrine has never, so far as we are able to find, been extended to legislators. Even in the two jurisdictions where the immunity of legislators from the service of summons has been declared, it rests upon grounds entirely different from their supposed analogy to parties and witnesses. Indeed, while we are cited to Jacobson v. Hosmer, 76 Mich. 234, 42 N. W. 1110, on the point that a party has a right to be sued at his own domicile, if we were to adopt strictly the Michigan rule, and construe plaintiff in error's rights according to the analogy of parties, we would be obliged to hold that he was not in any event exempt from service while merely waiting for the legislative session to begin; for in that state a party is amenable to service while waiting for his case to be called. Case v. Rorabacher, 15 Mich. 537. Moreover, if we were, by judicial legislation, to extend to senators and representatives that exemption from the service of summons which is enjoyed by parties and witnesses, we would be logically bound by the same reasons and arguments to extend it, also, to the executive branch. In this state that department consists of eight officers (Const. art. 5, § 1), who remain at the seat of government at least two, and often four, years. Are we to hold, then, that each of these officials is exempt from the service of summons in the county where he is usually found during all of this period? And, if we extend the doctrine at all, why should we stop with state officers? Why do not the arguments made as to legislators apply with equal force to local executive officers, like sheriffs? Are not such officials entitled, to the same extent as members of the legislature, to immunity from civil process while attending to the public business outside of their own counties?

We do not say that it would not be desirable to adopt such a rule for all public servants. We are simply pointing out that no such rule exists, either at common law or by statute. But it may well be doubted whether the half-way doctrine contended for by plaintiff in error would at all meet the objection urged against the policy of allowing service upon legislators during the session. The objection usually made is that it diverts the attention of the member from legislative business to private matters. And this would be equally true if service were allowed at home. Indeed, the distraction would seem to be less in the case of an action pending at the seat of government, where the member could give it some attention without necessarily absenting himself from the legislative session. And as was well said in Catlett v. Morton, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 122: "It has been argued that considerable inconvenience might result from this doctrine to the members of the general assembly, because thereby they might be compelled to litigate their controversies at the capital, instead of in their proper counties. It may be replied that every citizen who visits Frankfort, and all the other officers of government who do not reside here, are liable to the same inconvenience." But, if the legislature deems it for the best interests of the state to exempt its members from the service of summons at the seat of government during its sessions, the remedy is entirely in its hands. It may enact into law the rule contended for by plaintiff in error without the aid or consent of either of the co-ordinate branches of the government, and its action in this regard would be legitimate and proper. But for us to announce that rule in advance of such action, and in the face of the authorities above reviewed, would, it seems to us, be little short of revolutionary. We therefore recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

Terms of policy will prevail over application.

Hunter v. Scott, 108 N. C. 213, 12 N. E. 1027.

Courts never favor giving a generic term, such as "children," a restricted meaning, but, on the contrary, they favor a liberal one.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 970, § e; Klotz v. Klotz, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 183, 22 S. W. 551.

A designation of "children" will include all of the children of insured.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 965, § b.

If a vested remainder to children will open to let in those after-born, without doing violence to the doctrine of vested rights, the rule ought to apply here.

Mr. Francis D. Winston also for appellants.

Mr. George Cowper, for appellee:

A policy, and the money to become due under it, belong, the moment it is issued, to the person or persons named in it as beneficiary or beneficiaries; and there is no power in the person procuring the insurance, by any act of his, by deed or will, to transfer to any other person the interest of the person named.

Bliss, Ins. 2d ed. 517; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 985, § 2, p. 980, 4.

Beneficiaries of the insured had a vested right of property of which they could not be divested without their consent.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to this court by appeal from the judgment of the court below upon a case agreed on by the parties. It appears that in the year 1809 a policy of insurance was issued by the defendant company to Mrs. Nannie Walton, widow of James Walton, by which her life was insured for the benefit of her children, she then having three children, the defendants Jimmie Flythe, Lily W. Scull, and Nannie Nichols, the testate of the defendant E. L. Smith. In the year 1870 Mrs. Nannie Walton married E. D. Scull, and the issue of that marriage were Bismark Scull, born in March, 1871, and Von Moltke Scull, born in the year 1874, who are plaintiffs in this case. On the 9th day of April, 1873, Mrs. Nannie Walton, then Mrs. Scull, surrendered the said policy, and received from the company in lieu thereof a paid-up policy for the sum of $712, which was issued in the name of Nannie Walton, although she was then Mrs. Scull, and was payable to her children within ninety days after due notice and proof of her death. She died in the month of March, 1902, her husband E. D. Scull having predeceased her. The company paid the money due upon the last policy into court, under its order and by agreement of the parties, to await the decision as to the distribution of the fund.

The plaintiffs contend upon the foregoing facts that they are each entitled to one fifth of this fund, and the defendants resist this contention and claim the whole, so that the question presented is whether the children of the first marriage are the sole beneficiaries under the policy, or are the children of the second marriage entitled to participate ratably with them in the fund now in court? The court below held that the children of the first marriage were entitled to the fund to the exclusion of the children of the second marriage, and entered judgment accordingly, and in this ruling we think there was error. It was contended by counsel for the plaintiffs, on the argument before us, that Bismark Scull was surely entitled to share in the avails of the policy, as he was born before the last policy was issued, but, in the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to consider this question. A policy of insurance is essentially like a gift by will, the only difference being that in the case of a policy of insurance the beneficiary acquires a vested interest when the policy is delivered, which becomes vested in possession or enjoyment at the death of the assured; while in the case of a gift by will the interest does not vest until the death of the testator. In other respects, and for all practical purposes, they are alike. If a bequest is made to A for life, with remainder to his children, those in esse at the death of the testator take a vested estate, which will open, however, and let in any after-born child during the life of A; and so it is with a policy of insurance payable to children, the interests of the beneficiaries become vested at the time of the delivery of the policy, or when it takes effect as a contract between the company and the assured, as to those then in esse, but will open and let in any after-born children, and, in this case, whether of the first or second marriage. If they come within the general description, they will share under the policy. The interests are said to be vested, but not in the sense that the children then in esse will take exclusively, but rather in the sense that the interest of any one of the children, already vested, shall not be divested by his or her subsequent death, and the share of such deceased child will go to his or her personal representative. The late Chief Justice Smith evidently had this distinction in mind when, in the case of Hooker v. Sugg, 102 N. C. 116, 3 L. R. A. 217, 8 S. E. 919, which is relied on by the defendant's counsel, he used the following language: "So, if children be designated in a life policy as beneficiaries, the interest vesting at once is in such as then meet the description, and is not divested in favor of survivors by a death afterwards." He certainly did not intend by that language to say that after-born children would be excluded and those in esse at the time of the delivery of the policy would be the sole beneficiaries. This is made perfectly clear by the following passage taken from the opinion: "It is unnecessary to consider the possible effect of a future marriage upon the interests of the children, since the event did not take place." 102 N. C. 129, 3 L. R. A. 218, 8 S. E. 921. So that the question presented in this case, and stated hypothetically by the chief justice in that case, was left open for consideration and adjudication when it should arise. It seems to us that the question has virtually been settled in favor of the plaintiffs by the 60 L. R. A.

case of Conigland v. Smith, 79 N. C. 303, in which it is held that a policy of insurance for the benefit of children, like a gift by will to them, will vest in interest in the children then in esse, at the time of the delivery of the policy or when the contract of insurance is complete, but will open and let in any after-born children during the life of the assured. As in the case of wills, a policy of insurance should receive a liberal construction, so as to take in as many of the objects of the assured's bounty as possible. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 961, 964. This, in our opinion, is the just and reasonable rule of interpretation. The question seems to have frequently been under consideration by the courts of some of the other states. In Koshler v. Centennial Mut. L. Ins. Co. 66 Iowa, 325, 23 N. W. 687, the policy upon which the suit was brought was payable to the assured's wife and children, there being at the time children by a former marriage; and it was held that the children of both marriages were entitled to share in the avails of the policy. Upon a substantially similar state of facts to those in this case it was held, McDermott v. Centennial Mut. Life Assn. 24 Mo. App. 73, that, in the absence of an expression of a purpose to limit the benefit to a particular class of children, it was clearly the intention of the assured to extend it to all his children, and that this intention should prevail. "It would be so held," says that court, "in the interpretation of a will; and a policy of life insurance, being a post mortem provision for persons dependent upon the assured, is to be interpreted upon similar principles." In Thomas v. Leake, 67 Tex. 471, 3 S. W. 703, the court held that, under the construction the law gives to the word "children" as used in policies of insurance, it does not mean certain named children then in existence, but these together with such as may thereafter be born to the assured. See also Stigler v. Stigler, 77 Va. 163; United States Trust Co. v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 115 N. Y. 152, 21 N. E. 1025; Ricker v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 27 Minn. 193, 38 Am. Rep. 289, 6 N. W. 771.

We have carefully examined the authorities cited by the learned counsel for the defendants, and are unable to see that they militate against the views we have expressed. In the case of Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Baldwin, 15 R. I. 106, 23 Atl. 105, so much relied on by him, the policy was payable to the wife and children of the assured, and the court held that the children living at the time the policy was delivered were entitled to the money due thereon to the exclusion of after-born children, but the court placed its decision upon the ground that the wife was a joint beneficiary with the children. We do not think this fact was sufficient to change the general rule of construction in its application to the facts of that case, but, however this may be, the court clearly intimates that the decision would have been different if the name of the wife had been omitted and the policy had been payable to the children as a class.

"Possibly," says the court, "if the policy had been expressed to be for the benefit of the children only, the doctrine in respect of testamentary bequests to children payable in futuro, namely, that the bequests are payable to them as a class and that the class will open to let in after-born children to participate in the bequests, might be applied." This is a statement of our case, and a strong intimation that the rule of construction which we have laid down should apply to it. In Herring v. Sutton, 129 N. C. 107, 39 S. E. 772, also cited by defendant's counsel, the beneficiaries were designated by name, and it necessarily followed that those children who were thus named took a vested interest in the policy to the exclusion of all other children, for the intention to restrict the benefit of the policy to them was clearly expressed.

It was suggested that the assured had no legal right to surrender the old policy for the new, but we do not think that this should change the rule of construction. Indeed, if the second policy had not been issued, and the money had been paid under the first, the result would be the same. The first policy was payable to the children, and this, as we have already shown, includes after-born children. The change, therefore, from the one policy to the other, whether it was in law a continuation of the old policy or a substitution of the new one for it, is immaterial.

Upon a review of the whole matter, we think there was error in the ruling and judgment of the court below, and that judgment should be entered in that court for the plaintiffs in accordance with the agreement of the parties.

Judgment reversed.

KAOLIN MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
App't.

(131 N. C. 536.)

1. One who has given a deed of trust on property to secure a debt may maintain an action for an injury to it, if the security is ample for the debt, so that the loss from the injury will fall on him.
2. An allegation that plaintiff "became so nervous and frightened" by defendant's conduct "that she could not sleep at night, and was greatly disturbed in body and mind," sufficiently charges a physical injury to admit evidence that she became helpless, could not go about her duties, and suffered from uterine trouble, and to warrant the submission to the jury of an issue as to what compensation she was entitled to for her "personal injuries." In the absence of anything to show that defendant was misled, or of any steps on his part to have the pleading made more definite.

3. An action will lie for physical injury or disease resulting from fright or nervous shock caused by negligent acts, when defendant should have known that such acts would, with reasonable certainty, cause such result, or the negligence was gross, showing utter indifference to the consequences which should have been contemplated by him.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Jackson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries and for injuries to plaintiff's property, which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Killebreck v. Hines, 104 N. C. 182, 10 S. E. 159, 251; 1 Jones, Mortg. 11.

As the relation between fright and injury to the nerve and brain structures of the body is a matter which depends entirely upon scientific and medical testimony, it is impossible for any court to lay down, as a matter of law, that, if negligence causes fright, and such fright, in its turn, so affects such structures as to cause injury to health, such injury cannot be a consequence which, in the ordinary course of things, would flow from the negligence, unless such "injury accompany such negligence in point of time."

COOK, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The substantial questions raised by the defendant's assignments of error are: (1) Could the cause of action for damage done to the house and land be maintained by plaintiff, trustor? (2) Does the complaint state a cause of action for physical injury to plaintiff? (3) Does a cause of action lie for physical injury resulting from fright and nervousness caused by negligent acts?

As to the first question: It is clear that the plaintiff had the right to bring this action for damages done to the freehold. She owned the premises in fee, subject to a deed of trust executed thereon to secure a debt. The conveyance of the title to the trustee did not disturb her possession or ownership as to trespassers and tortfeasors. So long as the property was of sufficient value to secure the payment of the debt, the trustee and cestui que trust could sustain no loss or injury by reason of damage done to the premises. Therefore the loss by reason of the damage would fall upon the trustor, the equitable owner, and she, being the party really injured, had a right to maintain the action. She was in possession of the land, and, being the equitable owner, had the right to recover in an action of ejectment, although the legal title was in the trustee. Murray v. Blackledge, 71 N. C. 492; Farmer v. Daniel, 82 N. C. 152; Condry v. Cheshire, 60 L. R. A.

88 N. C. 375; Taylor v. Eatman, 92 N. C. 601; Graves v. Trueblood, 96 N. C. 495, 1 S. E. 918. The trustee, holding the legal title, might have been made a party to the action, but his recovery would have inured only to the benefit of the trustor, which could be of no concern to the trespasser or tortfeasor. A judgment in an action between the equitable owner in possession and the defendant for damages to the premises would be a bar to an action by the trustee. So no loss could befall the defendant. Had defendant deemed the trustee a necessary party to the action, it should have demurred (Code, § 239, subsec. 4), or answered (§ 241); otherwise it will be deemed to have been waived (§ 242).

As to the second question: Plaintiff alleges that she "became so nervous and frightened from the negligent and careless conduct and blasting of defendant that she could not sleep at night, and was greatly disturbed in body and mind, as well for herself and the safety of her children as the destruction of her property, to her great damage in the sum of $1,999." To sustain this allegation she was allowed to prove that the blasting rendered her almost helpless; that she could not go about her daily duties, and could not keep on her feet to attend to her children; that it has affected her ever since, and has caused her female trouble out of its regular course. Under the old system of pleading, this variance would be fatal, but under the provisions of the Code the rule is greatly modified, and pleadings must be liberally construed for the purpose of determining their effect with a view to substantial justice between the parties. Code, § 260. From a liberal construction of plaintiff's allegation, it appears that the alleged negligent blasting greatly disturbed her in body and mind, causing her to become so nervous and frightened that she could not sleep at night, causing her great damage; and, as the result, she proves that she was physically injured as above stated, to which defendant excepted, but did not allege that it was misled by such a variance. Therefore plaintiff was not called upon to amend her complaint so as to conform to the proof, and the variance is deemed immaterial. Code, § 260; Lilly v. Baker, 88 N. C. 151; Patrick v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 93 N. C. 422; Laurence v. Hester, 93 N. C. 79; Uery v. Suit, 91 N. C. 406; Commercial Bank v. Burgwyn, 116 N. C. 122, 21 S. E. 202. It appearing that the defendant was not misled, the variance between the allegation and proof must be deemed to have been immaterial. Gibbs v. Fuller, 66 N. C. 116. Plaintiff, in her complaint, did not allege that she had been rendered almost helpless in consequence of such fright and nervousness, or that she could not go about her daily duties, and has been afflicted ever since with female trouble out of its regular course. But if defendant had alleged that it had been misled by such proof, and had proved the same to the satisfaction of the court, the judge might have ordered that the complaint be amended (§ 260, Code), for amendments to pleadings which further justice, speed the trial of causes, or prevent circuity of action and unnecessary expense, are allowed on proper terms. Alamance v. Blair, 76 N. C. 136. It clearly appears from the language of the allegation that plaintiff intended to charge that physical injury was done to her,—“was greatly disturbed in body, . . . to her great damage,”—and we think it does state a cause of action for physical injury. If defendant was misled, and not put upon notice by it that plaintiff would offer evidence of injuries to her person resulting from fright, then it had its remedy under § 269 of the Code. Or, if defendant did not understand the precise nature of the charge made in the complaint, it had its remedy by applying to the court for an order to have it made more definite and certain. Clark's Code, § 261, and cases there cited. It does not appear from the record that any substantial rights of the defendant were affected by the failure to more fully set out plaintiff's cause of action, in which case the court properly disregarded the alleged defect in the pleadings. Code, § 276. Counsel having disagreed upon the issues, they were framed by the judge, and it is contended by the defendant that there was error in submitting the fourth and fifth issues, for that they were not raised by the pleadings (Miller v. Miller, 89 N. C. 209; Christmas v. Haywood, 119 N. C. 130, 25 S. E. 861); and that, where the pleadings do not distinctly and unequivocally raise an issue, it should not be submitted (Sprague v. Bond, 113 N. C. 552, 18 S. E. 701). But an issue was raised by the pleadings. Bearing in mind the requirement of the statute (§ 260) that “in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties,” this contention cannot be sustained. Plaintiff's allegation is that she was “greatly disturbed in body, . . . to her great damage. . . .” The fourth issue is, “Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint?” and the fifth, “What compensatory damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover for her personal injuries?” Instead of alleging that she was “injured,” she alleged that she was “disturbed in body,” to her great damage. “Disturbed,” says Webster, primarily means “to throw into disorder or confusion; to derange; to interrupt the settled state of; to excite from a state of rest.” So, substituting the word “injured” for “disturbed in body,” and the words “for her personal injuries” for “the disturbance in body,” did not change the issue with respect to the damage complained of in the sense in which the words “disturbed in body” coupled with “to her great damage” are used in the allegation, which we understand to be that her body was thrown into a state of disorder and thereby injured.

As to the third question: We are of the opinion that an action will lie for physical injury or disease resulting from fright or nervous shocks caused by negligent acts.

From common experience we know that serious consequences frequently follow violent nervous shocks caused by fright, often resulting in spells of sickness, and sometimes in sudden death. Whether the physical injury was the natural and proximate result of the fright or shock is a question to be determined by the jury upon the evidence, showing the condition, circumstances, occurrences, etc. But it must also appear that the defendant could or should have known that such negligent acts would, with reasonable certainty, cause such result, or that the injury resulted from gross carelessness or recklessness, showing utter indifference to the consequences, when they should have been contemplated by the party doing such acts. As a condition precedent to recovery in such cases, it must appear that defendant must or ought to have known of plaintiff's perilous position or condition, against which he should have to exercise care, otherwise such injury could not be within the contemplation of the actor, and put him upon notice as to this special care. In the case at bar defendant company's servants acted with utter indifference to the plaintiff's safety, and knew that plaintiff was a woman, and that she and her little children lived and were in her house only 60 steps away, and exposed to the danger; and, after being asked by her to direct the blasting so as not to throw the rocks upon her house, continued to blast, throwing the stones from the size of a gallon bucket down to small stones upon and through her house and into her yard and garden (depositing as much as a wagon load of rock in her yard and several wagon loads in her garden), making it necessary for her and her children to secrete themselves in the basement behind a stack chimney, and even there they were in danger. From the fright and nervous shocks received from such blasting she testified that she was rendered almost helpless, and could not go about her daily duties, and could not keep on her feet to attend to her children, and has been affected ever since; that it has caused her female trouble out of its regular course. They, knowing that plaintiff was a woman, and knowing (or ought to have known of) the weaknesses of a woman, should have contemplated the effects likely to be produced upon her by such danger and fright. We do not wish to be understood as holding that an action in a case like this would lie for mental suffering and anguish from which no physical injury or disease directly resulted, as that question is not squarely presented in this appeal. In Bell v. Great Northern R. Co. Ir. L. R. 26 C. L. 428,—the leading case in support of such action,—it is held that, if such bodily injury (serious impairment to health) might be a natural consequence of fright, it might be an element of damage for which a recovery might be had. Sedgwick, Damages, 8th ed. § 861, in commenting upon it, says: “The principle adopted in this case would seem to be the true one. The negligence of the company being admitted, any injury directly resulting should be compensated.” In Purcell

v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034, the plaintiff, a pregnant woman, was frightened by the negligent conduct of defendant in running its cars, miscarried, and suffered permanent injury. Held, that a cause of action would lie. In Mack v. South Bound R. Co. 52 S. C. 323, 40 L. R. A. 679, 29 S. E. 905, the plaintiff threw himself down between and along the cross-ties just outside of the rail, bruising and injuring his person, and barely escaped being struck by the locomotive, and was terribly frightened and shocked, his mind was affected and partially destroyed, his reason unbalanced, and for a long time was made ill and sick, and suffered great mental anguish and physical pain arising from the terrible nervous shock and fright. Held, that an action would lie. Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. 111 Cal. 668, 32 L. R. A. 193, 44 Pac. 320, is cited as an authority, but does not apply to the principle involved. There the recovery was had for mortification, nervous effects, and injuries suffered by reason of the plaintiff being put off the car by the conductor after having purchased a proper ticket, which was taken up by the conductor before reaching the station to change cars, and he failed to give her a check to be used on the connecting line. Those which hold contra are Haile v. Texas & P. R. Co. 23 L. R. A. 774, 9 C. C. A. 134, 23 U. S. App. 80, 60 Fed. 557, which holds that where a passenger on a railroad train receives no bodily injury from an accident caused by the company's negligence, but is made insane by the excitement and suffering resulting therefrom, the company is not liable in damages, since insanity is not a probable or ordinary result of exposure to railroad accidents. Ewing v. Pittsburgh, C. C.

& St. L. R. Co. 147 Pa. 40, 14 L. R. A. 666, 23 Atl. 340: By negligence of defendant's employees a car was derailed and thrown against plaintiff's house, subjecting her to fright and nervous excitement, permanently weakening and disabling her. Exhibits no cause of action. Mere fright, occasioned by accident, producing permanent injury to the nervous system is a result too remote to be actionable. Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 151 N. Y. 107, 34 L. R. A. 781, 45 N. E. 354: Plaintiff was frightened by defendant's negligence in allowing its horses to nearly strike her, from the fright of which she miscarried. Held, no action lies where there is no immediate personal injury. Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 222, held that damages for a nervous shock or mental injury, caused by fright at an impending negligent collision, are too remote. White v. Sander, 168 Mass. 298, 47 N. E. 90: Rock thrown through a window, and frightened a woman, who suffered greatly from nervousness. Held not to be actionable. Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 285, 38 L. R. A. 512, 47 N. E. 88: The conductor negligently put a drunken man off the car. Plaintiff became frightened by the row, and suffered mental and physical pain and anguish, and was put to great expense, but no physical injury or disease followed from it. Held, that the action would not lie. Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227, 36 Am. Rep. 303, is to the like effect; but the court adds that, "whether fright of sufficient severity to cause physical disease would support an action, we do not now inquire."

After a careful examination of all of the defendant's assignments of error, we find no substantial error, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. The mere fact that the verdict of a coroner's jury must be returned to and filed with the clerk of a court of record in a state where the coroner has no judicial functions does not make it judicial in character, so as to entitle it to admission, in an action at law, as evidence of the facts found by him.
2. The inclusion of an authenticated copy of a coroner's inquest in the proofs of death of a member of a mutual benefit society does not render it admissible in evidence against the beneficiary in an action on the certificate, where the proofs were furnished by the subordinate lodge of which deceased was a member.

3. To defeat recovery upon a mutual benefit certificate because of suicide of the member, the burden of establishing suicide is upon the society.
4. To warrant the direction of a verdict for defendant in an action on a mutual benefit certificate because the death was not the result of natural causes, the testimony adduced tending to establish that fact must be such that there cannot reasonably be two opinions touching the result.
5. Words used by the court in instructing the jury must, in determining whether or not they were erroneous, be construed in the sense in which they were used.
6. The presumption of death from natural causes may be considered by the jury in determining the cause of death of a member of a mutual benefit society, who was found dead in the water, where the evidence is not such as to explain or indicate how the body came to be there.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Affirmed.

Statement by Wolverton, J.:

This is an action to recover upon a beneficiary certificate for $2,000, issued by the defendant to Capitola Blanche Cox, a married woman, in favor of the plaintiff, her daughter. Immediately prior to the death of Mrs. Cox, which occurred July 1, 1899, she was engaged in conducting a restaurant at No. 206 Madison street, between First and Front, in the city of Portland. She had been engaged in the business some six weeks or more, and lived in a room adjoining or over the restaurant. Early in May she had a severe attack of la grippe, was attended by a physician, and found to be suffering from intense pain in the head, and was at times, as described by the physician, "nearly wild." She apparently recovered from this trouble by the last of the month, except that it left her in a nervous condition. It was her habit to rise at 5 o'clock in the morning, or earlier, and do her marketing. On the evening of June 30th, about 9 o'clock, her daughter, who was making her home with J. P. Finley, some two and a half blocks distant, was with her at the restaurant, and testified that her mother walked part of the way home with her; that she said she did not feel like going, had to stop and rest on the way, and was so tired that the witness requested her to return, which she did; that she was with her mother the second day before her decease, and that she was light-hearted; that shortly before her death she had a slight stroke of paralysis, but that it did not amount to anything; that her financial condition was such that she had to call upon some of her friends for assistance, among whom were Miss Anna Finley and Mrs. Green, the latter living at Hamilton avenue, South Portland, from whom she borrowed something like $100; that Mrs. Green lived south of where deceased was found, and that she could have conveniently gone that way in going to her place of residence; and that she went to see Mrs. Green frequently, going both in the daytime and the evening. Inez Jenkins testified that she had a rooming house adjoining the restaurant, and that Mrs. Cox roomed with her occasionally; that witness saw her and talked to her about 10 o'clock, after she had retired, on the evening before her death; that she said she had a great deal of trouble in her restaurant, and had just employed a married man and his wife to cook for her; that she spoke of being tired, and complained of the top of her head hurting her, and said that when she laid down at night she wrung a towel out of ice water and put it on her head; that she had been complaining of her head for about three weeks; that she said she thought her business would be prosperous if she only had the means to get ahead, and remarked 60 L. R. A.

that she had but little means with which to obtain provisions for breakfast; that she left the room about 5 o'clock in the morning; that at one time previous witness heard her say she had a notion to take a revolver and blow out her brains, but laughed when she said it, and witness thought little about the incident; that she was in the habit of carrying a revolver for self-protection, and, as a rule, she went in the morning to Duffy's market, on the corner of Front and Madison; that on the morning in question the meat was sent over to the restaurant, and that witness found her purse, after her death at the restaurant, with a little money in it. It is further shown that at 7:15 o'clock in the morning of July 1st her body was found floating in an eddy of the river at the foot of Mead street, about a mile south of her place of business. The river was high, and at the place referred to the water was from 4 to 8 or 10 feet deep. It was near the railroad track, along which the old macadamized road ran, which was usually traveled by persons going to and from parts of South Portland. When first seen, her body was 10 or 15 feet from shore, face upward, and her hair loose, and gathered about her face. On the shore, and within a few feet of the water's edge, was found her straw hat, underneath which were deposited her pistol and a note in her handwriting, written with a lead pencil on yellow paper, containing these words and figures, "Mrs. Cox, 206 Madison Street," and near by was her cape or cloak. The margin of the river, from the road down to the water, was covered with grass, and the track of a woman heading toward the stream was found at the water's edge, partly covered by the water. Her two account books, tied together with a string, which she was in the habit of carrying with her when marketing, were found in the water near the shore, and the paper upon which the note was written was apparently taken from one of these books. Examination of the body disclosed that the lungs were free from water; that sand was contained in her nostrils, that her lips were of a violet color, and that there were no bruises upon the body, or any indication of violence. Dr. Candiani, the physician who examined her at the morgue during the coroner's inquest, testified that the indications showed that she died from asphyxiation,—that is to say, on being submerged she closed her mouth, thereby excluding water from the lungs, resulting in asphyxiation; and that the body had the appearance of having been in the water a short time only,—from two to four or five hours. Mrs. Cox was about thirty-seven years of age, stout build, weighing 185 pounds and upward. The jury were taken to view the place where her body was found. During the course of the trial the record of the coroner's inquest was offered in evidence by the defendant for the purpose of showing that death was the result of suicide, there being a clause in the policy voiding it if death was so occasioned, and, upon objections interposed thereto, it was rejected by the court. The defendant also offered in evidence proofs of Mrs. Cox's death, submitted by J. H. Bridgeford, scribe of the local lodge, to the supreme executive council, with a copy of the coroner's record attached thereto, whereupon objection was again made to the introduction of such record, but not as to the other proofs, and, defendant's counsel being unwilling to segregate it therefrom, the whole was rejected. At the close of plaintiff's case, and again at the close of the testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was in each instance denied. Defendant also requested the court to direct the jury to find a verdict for defendant. This was also refused, and, the verdict and judgment being for plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

Mr. R. A. Leiter, with Messrs. Harry B. Walker and William D. Fenton, for appellant:

The verdict rendered by a coroner's jury at an inquest held over the body of a deceased person is admissible in evidence in an action to recover upon a certificate of insurance held by him. The findings of the coroner's jury were competent, but not conclusive, evidence in this case, that deceased committed suicide.

A copy of the findings on a coroner's inquest, furnished as a part of the proofs of death of the insured, is admissible, on behalf of the defendant in an action on the policy, as prima facie evidence to establish a defense of suicide. The fact of suicide is prima facie found, and must be overcome.

Messrs. Arthur C. Spencer and Chamberlain & Thomas, for respondent:

Under the Constitution and laws of our state the office of coroner is administrative, and his duties are purely ministerial. It has been shorn of the judicial functions that attached to it at common law, and is not recognized as a court of record, like it is in England. The proceedings at an inquest are taken extrajudicially, and the verdict of the coroner's jury is inadmissible in evidence in an action between parties who were strangers to the investigation.

The laws of the defendant society make it the duty of the subordinate lodge of the defendant, of which the deceased was a member, to notify the supreme lodge of her death, and require the subordinate lodge to furnish to said supreme lodge proofs of death on blanks furnished by the latter. The subordinate lodge is the agent of the supreme lodge, and the officers of the former are its agents and the subagents of the supreme lodge. There is no provision requiring the beneficiary to make proofs of death. The proofs in this case, prepared by appellant itself, could not bind respondent, and the court committed no error in refusing to admit in evidence the portions of them that were objected to.

The instruction that the presumption of law is, in the absence of any evidence as to the cause of death, that it happened from natural causes, and that such death did not arise from self-destruction; but this is only a disputable presumption, and if, from all the evidence in the case, you find by the preponderance thereof that she came to her death by her own hands, whether she was sane or insane, you must find for defendant,—is a correct statement of the law.

The evidence in this case not only fails to show voluntary self-destruction to the exclusion of all other reasonable hypotheses, but it establishes facts and conditions positively inconsistent with the theory of the defense that deceased came to her death by drowning. Any fairminded court sitting as a jury would have been compelled to have found for the plaintiff, and to have instructed the jury to find for defendant would have been a judicial outrage under the circumstances in this case.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question of vital importance presented is respecting the admissibility of the record of the coroner's inquisition super visum corporis as independent evidence to show the fact of suicide. The contention of counsel is that defendant was entitled to have it go to the jury, not as conclusive evidence of the fact, but along with the other evidence bearing upon the subject for their consideration. Anciently, the office of coroner was of great dignity, and exercised by persons of high authority, as well as by those in lesser degree and station. Blackstone says: "There are also particular coroners for every county of England, usually four, but sometimes six, and sometimes fewer. This office is of equal antiquity with the sheriff, and was ordained together with him to keep the peace when the earls gave up the wardship of the county. He is still chosen by all the freeholders in the county court." 1 Bl. Com. *347. As ascertained in great measure from the statute (4 Edw. I. de officio coronatoris), the powers and duties of the coroner are both judicial and ministerial, his judicial authority extending to inquiries touching the manner of death of any person slain or dying suddenly, or in prison, which must be super visum corporis; and also to inquiries respecting treasure trove and shipwreck. His ministerial office is only as the sheriff's substitute. 1 Bl. Com. *349; 2 Bacon, Abr. 428. A coroner's court in England is a court of record, and upon a finding of felo de se the executor or administrator may remove the inquest of office into the court of the King's bench, and traverse it; for it is said: "It would be hard that he should be concluded by an inquisition, which is nothing more than an inquest of office, taken behind his back." Starkie, Ev. 10th ed. *404; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 604; 1 Hale, P. C. 416, 417; Garnett v. Ferrand, 6 Barn. & C. 611. In the United States they are generally denominated courts of inferior jurisdiction, and not of record. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 604. But in this state the organic act does not so much as dignify the office with any judicial functions whatever. Const. art. 6, § 6; art. 7, §§ 1, 9. In the case of a felo de se, under the old law his goods and chattels were forfeited to the King, and his body was given over to an ignominious burial, these resultant features giving the inquisition the semblance of an action in rem, which determined the status both of the person of the deceased and of his goods and chattels. So it has come to be held in England that inquisitions post mortem are admissible as evidence of the status, but not conclusive. Sergeson v. Sealey, 2 Atk. 412; Starkie, Ev. 10th ed. *406; 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 556. A like rule has been promulgated in some of the states of the Union, based upon the reasoning that gave rise to it in the country of its nativity. United States L. Ins. Co. v. Vocke, 129 Ill. 557, sub nom. United States L. Ins. Co. v. Kielgast, 6 L. R. A. 65, 22 N. E. 467; Pyle v. Pyle, 158 Ill. 289, 41 N. E. 999; Grand Lodge I. O. of M. A. v. Wieting, 168 Ill. 408, 48 N. E. 59; Supreme Lodge K. of H. v. Fletcher, 78 Miss. 377, 28 So. 872, 29 So. 523; Metzradt v. Modern Brotherhood, 112 Iowa, 522, 84 N. W. 498. The leading case is perhaps the first cited,—United States L. Ins. Co. v. Vocke,—which bases the rule, not upon the ground that the coroner acts in a judicial capacity, for the organic act of the state of Illinois deprived him of any such power, but for the reason that the inquisition is made by a public officer, acting under the sanction of an official oath in the discharge of a public duty enjoined upon him, and returned to and filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, as required by law; Mr. Justice Baker, in his concurring opinion, affirming that such an inquisition thereby became a record of the circuit court, and as such is competent as testimony. This authority is apt under our Constitution as well, in so far as it discards the idea that a coroner's inquest is judicial in character. Under our statute the coroner has power, when informed that a person has been killed or dangerously wounded by another, or has suddenly died under such circumstances as to afford a reasonable ground to suspect that his death has been occasioned by criminal means, or has committed suicide, to inquire, by the intervention of a jury, into the cause of the death or wound, and to perform the other duties incidental thereto in the manner prescribed by statute. Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 1045. His duty requires him to go to the place where the dead or wounded person is, and summon six qualified persons to serve as jurors, whose duty it becomes, on being sworn, to inquire whether the person was, and when, where, and by what means he came to his death or was wounded, as the case may be, and into the circumstances attending the death or wounding, and give a true verdict therein according to the evidence offered or arising from the inspection of the body. He must subpoena and examine as witnesses every person who, in his opinion, has knowledge of the material facts; also a surgeon or physician, who must inspect the body, and give a professional opinion as to the cause of death or wound; and, for the purpose of compelling such witnesses to attend and testify, or punishing them for disobedience, he is to be deemed a magistrate. The testimony of the witnesses and the verdict must be reduced to writing. If the jury find that a crime has been committed, the coroner must forthwith deliver the testimony and verdict to a magistrate; but, if they do not so find, he must return the same to the clerk of the county court; and, if the verdict also charge a person with the commission of the crime, the magistrate is immediately to issue a warrant for the arrest of such person as on an information, and, when brought before him, to examine into the charge contained in the verdict. Id. §§ 1683 to 1690, inclusive. According to this procedure, if the jury do not find that a crime has been committed, the testimony and verdict must be returned to the clerk of the county court, which, under the Constitution, is a court of record. This would, perhaps, include a verdict that death was self-inflicted, so that we have almost a parallel with the Illinois case. However, it seems to us that that case and those that follow it proceed upon an erroneous principle. Such a document, before it can be admissible under any of the older authorities, must be judicial in character, and we cannot think that the mere fact that it is required to be returned to and filed with the clerk of a court of record endows it with that vitality. Mr. Starkie's classification of judicial documents is: (1) Judgments, decrees, and verdicts, and (2) inquisitions, depositions, and examinations taken in the course of a judicial proceeding. A third includes writs, warrants, pleadings, etc. Of inquisitions he then says: "Such inquests as are of a public nature, and taken under competent authority, to ascertain a matter of public interest, are, upon principles already announced, admissible in evidence against all the world. They are very analogous to adjudications in rem, being made on behalf of the public. No one is properly a stranger to them, and all who can be affected by them usually have the power of contesting them." Starkie, Ev. 10th ed. *316, *403, *404. We have seen that when suicide was involved it was susceptible of traverse under the English system in the court of the King's bench, and had legitimate sanction of a judicial proceeding in every stage of its progress and development; and Greenleaf does not announce a different doctrine. Now, it cannot be said that a coroner's inquest under our system has the sanction or is taken in the course of any judicial proceeding; much less that it is of judicial impress. The verdict of the jury, if no crime is found to have been committed, is merely returned into a court of record, with no power of revision or approval. If a crime has been committed, and a person is charged therewith, the verdict serves as an information, upon which a magistrate may issue a warrant of arrest, and examine him touching the charge; but the inquisition has no probative value in that proceeding even so that it is wholly extrajudicial, and, within itself, is void of all the essential qualities that go to make it independent evidence of homicide, self-inflicted. This view is supported by abundant authority, and we believe it to be founded upon correct legal principles. Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Ross Lewin, 24 Colo. 43, 51 Pac. 488; Wasey v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 126 Mich. 119, 85 N. W. 459; State use of Grice v. Cecil County, 54 Md. 426; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Hollowell, 14 Ind. App. 611, 43 N. E. 277; Ralston's Petition, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 514. The record of the inquest was, therefore, properly rejected.

The next question relates to the refusal to admit in evidence the proofs of death as a whole, which is assigned as error. A by-law of the defendant provides that upon the death of the assured the lodge of which he was a member shall at once notify the supreme executive council, giving the name of the deceased member, the number of his certificate, and shall furnish upon blanks provided for that purpose full and satisfactory proofs of death. The blank forms furnished by the supreme lodge require that, in case of a voluntary or mysterious death, a duly authenticated copy of the coroner's inquest, under his hand, must accompany the proofs. It is undoubtedly a well-established rule of law that the record of a coroner's inquest attached to proofs of death made by the beneficiary or his agent, in conformity to blanks furnished by the company, is admissible in evidence, along with such proofs, upon the ground that it contains admissions of the beneficiary against his interest as to the cause of death. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Newton, 22 Wall. 32, 22 L. ed. 793; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Higginbotham, 95 U. S. 380, 24 L. ed. 499; Keels v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 29 Fed. 198; Sharland v. Washington L. Ins. Co. 41 C. C. A. 307, 101 Fed. 206; Hart v. Fraternal Alliance, 108 Wis. 490, 84 N. W. 851; Walther v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 65 Cal. 417, 4 Pac. 413. But the rule can have no application where such proofs are furnished by the company's agent. When thus furnished, nothing contained therein, unless subscribed by the beneficiary or his agent, or at least with his express or implied sanction, can operate as an admission on his part, and against his interest. Such declarations, from their very nature, must necessarily be self-serving, and could hardly fail to be conducive of abuse or injustice. By § 127 of the by-laws of the order, supra, it is made the duty of the subordinate lodge of which the deceased was a member to notify the supreme executive council of his death in the manner therein designated, and no duty seems to have been cast upon the claimant to furnish proofs of death as a prerequisite to maintain an action upon the certificate. The subordinate lodge is thereby made the agent of the executive council, for whom it acts in furnishing proofs of death, and not for the claimant. Anderson v. Supreme Council, O. of C. F. 135 N. Y. 107, 31 N. E. 1092; Supreme Council, O. B. L. v. Boyle, 10 Ind. App. 301, 37 N. E. 1105. The death of Mrs. Cox being admitted, the object of introducing such proofs in behalf of the defendant was solely to show the manner of her death, it having been alleged as a defense that it was the result of her own act. As we have seen, the record of the coroner's inquest is not legitimate evidence for that purpose, and it is not rendered admissible because it is sought to be introduced along with the other proofs of death made up by the agent of the defendant, and could in no way bind the plaintiff as an admission touching the manner of death. The record was, therefore, not proper for the consideration of the jury, although it constituted a part of the proofs; there being no controversy as to the fact of death. Supreme Council of R. A. v. Brashears, 80 Md. 621, 43 Atl. 866.

It is further insisted that a nonsuit should have been granted upon defendant's motion therefor, or that the court should have directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, as requested. As to this we are clearly of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence adduced to justify the court in letting the case go to the jury. The burden of proof was with the defendant to establish suicide, and this it has not done by such clear and convincing evidence, void of dispute and controversy, as to warrant the court in directing a verdict in its favor. There is a presumption that death is the result of natural causes which inure to the benefit of the plaintiff, and should, as the first step, be satisfactorily overcome before the defendant could have a verdict. Again, the defendant is called upon to counterbalance by such cogent and convincing proofs any testimony adduced tending to establish death from natural causes that there could not reasonably be two opinions touching the result; for, if it were otherwise, it would be an invasion of the province of the jury to take the case from them. The question here, then, is the one stated by the court in the case of Sovereign Camp Woodmen v. Haller, 24 Ind. App. 108, 56 N. E. 255: Are the facts proved such as to exclude any other reasonable inference than that the assured voluntarily took her own life? And this we must answer in the negative. For cases of marked analogy supporting this view, see Beckett v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. 67 Minn. 298, 69 N. W. 923; Supreme Council of R. A. v. Brashears, 80 Md. 624, 43 Atl. 866; Goldschmidt v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 35 N. Y. S. R. 121, 12 N. Y. Supp. 866; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Nitterhouse, 11 Ind. App. 155, 38 N. E. 1110; Stephenson v. Bankers' Life Assn. 108 Iowa, 637, 79 N. W.

459; Metzgradt v. Modern Brotherhood, 112 Iowa, 522, 84 N. W. 498; Home Benefit Assn. v. Sargent, 142 U. S. 691, 35 L. ed. 1160, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 332; Ingersoll v. Knights of G. R. 47, Fed. 272. It cannot be said that the evidence introduced has but one tendency, and that pointing to self-destruction by the deceased. It is somewhat in conflict, to say the least, and different minds may reasonably come to different conclusions as to whether the act was her own, whether sane or insane, or whether it was the result of apoplexy or sudden sickness, causing her to fall into the water where she was found.

The court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows: "One of the defenses in this case is that the deceased, Capitola Blanche Cox, committed suicide, and you are instructed that this is an affirmative defense set up by defendant, and the burden is upon the defendant to establish same to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the testimony. When a person is found dead from unexplainable causes, the presumption is that his death was natural or accidental, if nothing appears to the contrary. Self-destruction is contrary to the general conduct of mankind. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover, unless the evidence introduced has overcome this presumption, and satisfied you that death was voluntary. The presumption of law is, in the absence of any evidence as to the cause of death, that it happened from natural causes, and that such death did not arise from self-destruction; and in this case, if there was no proof as to the cause or manner of death of Mrs. Cox, or if the evidence as to whether her death was caused by accident or natural causes, and not by her own hands, was evenly balanced, you would find in favor of this presumption. But this is only a disputable presumption, and if, from all the evidence in the case, you find by the preponderance thereof that she came to her death by her own hands, whether she was sane or insane, you must find for defendant." Exception was taken to this instruction on account of the use of the words "unexplainable" and "satisfied." It is suggested that Mrs. Cox was not found dead from unexplainable causes; but it is manifest the term was employed by the trial court to define the presumption alluded to, and it was left to the jury to say whether there was any proof as to the cause or manner of her death. It is also suggested that the term "satisfied" is a much stronger one than should have been employed in that relation, signifying, as it does, to settle certainly, or fix permanently, what was before uncertain, doubtful, or disputed. It must be construed, however, in the sense in which it was used. The court explained previously that the burden of proof as to the fact of suicide, if it existed, was with the defendant, and this it must establish to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the testimony. To be "satisfied" by a preponderance of the evidence and to be "satisfied" in the general sense are entirely different conditions of the mind, and the term was, as clearly indicated by the court, employed in the former sense.

But the more serious objection seems to be that the court should not have instructed at all as to the presumption of death from natural causes, affirming that there was sufficient testimony otherwise bearing on the issue from which the jury should have made up their verdict; and citing Sackberger v. National Grand Lodge, I. O. T. L. 73 Mo. App. 38. In the case at bar the evidence is not such as to explain or to indicate with such probability how the body of the deceased came to be in the water as found as to render the presumption unavailable in determining the cause of death. She was found in the water, but no one saw her go in, and how she came to be there, whether of her own accord or by another cause, no one can positively say from the testimony; hence the presumption becomes a pertinent factor in determining the cause, and, we think, was properly submitted to the jury in aid of their deliberations. The instruction is in accord with rule 120, Lawson, Presumptive Ev. 576, and has the support of Graves v. Colwell, 90 Ill. 612.

These considerations affirm the judgment of the trial court, and such is the order of this court.

compel the restoration of a member of a mutual benefit society to his rights therein, which alleges that, upon evidence produced after notice to accused and an opportunity given him to be heard, the society made a judicial determination that he had been guilty of conduct which, under the rules of the association, subjected him to expulsion from the society, is sufficient, although it does not aver that the charges were true, where he presented no evidence, and the society therefore had only part of the evidence before it in reaching its conclusion.

2. Whether or not a member of a benefit society had notice of a hearing, in consequence of which he was expelled from a society for violating its rules, is a question of fact, and not of law.

3. A member of a benefit society having actual notice of the charge against him for which he is expelled from the society cannot reverse the decision because such charge is not specially stated in the form of proceedings against him.
4. Benefit societies being charitable organizations, their proceedings may be lawfully transacted on Sunday, even to the hearing and determination of charges against members which result in their expulsion.
5. The hearing of charges against a member of a benefit society, and expelling him from membership because of violation of the rules, are not a judicial proceeding within the rule which forbids such proceedings on Sunday.

(December 19, 1902.)

ON DEMURRER to the answer to an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the restoration of petitioner to membership in the defendant association. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur M. Allen, for petitioner:

The respondent's answer should have alleged that the charges upon which the petitioner was expelled were true.

Pepin v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 23 R. 1. 81, 49 Atl. 387; Savannah Cotton Exchange v. State, 54 Ga. 668.

The notice which the society gave to the petitioner on the question of his expulsion was insufficient. It does not specify the time when the false representations were made, nor in what they consisted. It would be impossible for a member to prepare his defense upon such a specification of charges.

Rep. 478; People ex rel. Decker v. Hoboken Turtle Club, 38 N. Y. S. R. 4, 14 N. Y. Supp. 76.

A member does not waive the right to object to the notice by attending the meeting.

Downing v. St. Columba's R. C. T. A. B. Soc. 10 Daly, 262.

The society had no power to expel the petitioner for the reasons and in the manner alleged in the answer. The authority for the expulsion must be a clear and definite one, to justify it.

The expulsion on Sunday was illegal.

A resolution adopted by a nonreligious society is invalid because passed on Sunday.

Lansing Turnverein Soc. v. Carter, 71 Mich. 608, 39 N. W. 851.

The petitioner at the trial on the question of his expulsion was entitled to employ counsel; otherwise he would not have a fair trial as required by law.

1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 102; Murdock v. Phillips Academy, 12 Pick. 244.

Under the statute it would have been illegal for petitioner to have employed counsel to act for him on the Sabbath.

Messrs. Archambault & Gaulin for respondent.

Stiness, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner asks for a writ of mandamus to restore him to membership in the respondent society, a corporation, from which, he avers, he has been illegally and unjustly expelled. The respondent, in its answer to the alternative writ, sets up that a complaint was made against the petitioner, which was duly heard before a committee, he being present, and referred to the society; that on September 18, 1898, the committee reported to the society the charge that the petitioner had attempted to defraud the society by drawing, or trying to draw, benefits, under false representations; that, by the record of the society, the petitioner's demand for benefits was laid upon the table, and the secretary was ordered to notify the petitioner to appear before the society to answer said charge, and that he would be stricken out of the list of membership should he fail to exculpate himself; that notice was sent to him by mail to appear on Sunday, October 2, 1898, specifying the charge; that on said day the petitioner failed to appear and to make any defense against said charge or accusation, as requested by said notice; that the accusation was then and there regularly brought before said society, and, said Pepin failing to appear and exculpate himself, and evidence being produced tending to establish the guilt of said Pepin, it was then and there decided by said society that said Pepin was guilty of said accusation, and he was then and there, by a vote regularly passed, expelled from membership. The by-laws provide that those who work against the interests of the society may be stricken off the roll of membership. The answer avers that the accusation was brought in good faith, and not for the purpose of injuring the petitioner or of avoiding the payment of benefits to him; that he was given full opportunity to appear and to offer evidence; and that he was expelled after it had been judicially determined by the society, upon evidence, that he was guilty of the offenses charged against him. The petitioner demurs to the answer.

It was held, in Pepin v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 23 R. I. 81, 49 Atl. 387, and in Lavalle v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 17 R. I. 680, 16 L. R. A. 392, 24 Atl. 467, that membership in a beneficial association, where there is a contract to pay money by way of benefits or insurance, is a contract in the nature of a property right. As such, it is to be dealt with according to rules of law applicable to other cases of contract or of right. A member cannot be deprived of his membership arbitrarily or without proper cause. He is entitled to notice and opportunity for defense, which includes a specification of the charge against which he is to defend. Sleeper v. Franklin Lyceum, 7 R. I. 523; Reynolds v. Pawtucket, 23 R. I. 370, 50 Atl. 645. All of these requirements to a legal expulsion are averred in the answer, and, on demurrer, must be taken to be true.

One ground of demurrer is that the answer does not state that the charge was true. We think it states all that could properly be said in this respect. It says that evidence was produced tending to establish the guilt of the petitioner, upon which the society made a judicial determination. As testimony only on one side was before the society, it would neither be natural nor proper that the society should say that the charge was absolutely true. For the purposes of this demurrer, the society had testimony which, in its opinion, proved the charge, after notice and opportunity to the petitioner to be heard thereon.

The averment of the petitioner that he had no notice raises a question of fact, not of law. Nothing appears to show that the notice was insufficient as to time or substance. The charge, according to the by-laws, was one for which a member could be expelled, if for such a charge an authority in the by-laws was necessary. Society for Visitation of Sick v. Com. 52 Pa. 125, 91 Am. Dec. 139.

It is further urged that the charge as set forth was not sufficiently specific, because it does not state to what particular matters or what occasions they refer, so as to enable the petitioner to defend against them. Doubtless this would have weight if it appeared that the member was unable, for want of specification, to meet the charge, and he was thereby deprived of a chance to present his defense. But when he has actual notice of the particular charge he has all that he can claim, even though it may not be formally stated. In Reynolds v. Pawtucket, the petitioner protested against immediate action on that ground, but his protest was refused. In this case it appears that the petitioner was present at the hearing before the committee, and that the matter then heard was referred to the society.

He therefore knew the particular charge to be tried. We see no ground for demurrer in the substance of the answer.

Another ground for demurrer is that, as the hearing and expulsion took place on Sunday, it was illegal and void. It was a rule of the common law that Sunday is a nonjudicial day, and many cases have held that a judgment entered on Sunday was void. The petitioner argues that the trial in this case was an exercise of judicial power, and therefore void. The cases relied on by him relate to judgments of courts, where it has been held, in some upon common-law authority and in some upon statutory provisions, that judgments so entered were void. We recognize the correctness of such decisions upon common-law authority, and also upon grounds of public policy and recognition of Christian practice. The present case, however, does not come within such grounds of prohibition. While there was a trial, the respondent was not a court of law, but a benevolent association, and its action was a part of the business of such a society. Such bodies are recognized as charitable organizations because their object is not individual profit, but a provision to relieve its members and their families in cases of sickness and death. There was no rule at common law to forbid such societies to transact their business on Sunday. Possibly they are of too recent a date to have been embraced in such a rule. As said by Savage, Ch. J., in Story v. Elliot, 8 Cow. 27, 18 Am. Dec. 423: "By the common law, then, it appears, all judicial proceedings are prohibited. All other acts are lawful unless prohibited by statute." That case involved an award made on Sunday, and the court held it void, as a judicial proceeding, because arbitrators are not only jurors to determine facts, but judges to adjudicate as to the law; and their award, when fairly and legally made, is a judgment conclusive between the parties, from which there is no appeal. Accepting the rule thus stated, we do not think that the action here complained of was a judicial proceeding in the sense in which the term was used at common law, nor by the court in the opinion last cited. Evidently the courts of New York do not so regard it, for in People ex rel. Corrigan v. Young Men's Benev. Soc. 65 Barb. 357, it was held that a notice to answer charges served on Sunday, and a hearing, resulting in expulsion from a benevolent society, on the next Sunday, were not illegal because the papers were served and were returnable on Sunday, because they were not illegal at common law nor forbidden by statute. The court added: "The relator chose to belong to a society which held all its regular meetings on that day, and if, at such a meeting, he was served with notice to attend the next meeting, it does not rest with him to make the objection." In McCabe v. Father Mathew Total Abstinence Ben. Soc. 24 Hun, 149, it was held that a resolution of suspension was not rendered invalid by the fact that it was adopted at a meeting held on Sunday, for the reason "it is pure charity to relieve sick members, and the passage of such a resolution on Sunday would be unobjectionable." In Lansing Turnverein Soc. v. Carter, 71 Mich. 608, 39 N. W. 851, under Comp. Laws, chap. 55, § 1, like our law in excepting works of necessity and charity, it was held that a resolution authorizing a mortgage by the society, passed on Sunday, was void because it was not a religious or charitable association; implying that a charitable association might have done so. No cases are cited by the petitioner, and we know of none, which hold that a society of this sort may not transact its business on Sunday. That which comes nearest to such a statement is Society for Visitation of Sick v. Com. 52 Pa. 125, 91 Am. Dec. 139. The court sustained the expulsion of a member of a relief association for the sick, at a meeting held on Sunday, on the ground that the question of illegality for that cause was not before the court as one of the grounds of demurrer. The court added, by way of quere: "It might be well to consider how far such trials on Sunday comport with the legislation of the state and the genius of our institutions." The statute was similar to ours in excepting works of necessity and charity. We think that the necessary work of charitable organizations is within the intent and words of our statute. The petitioner argues against such a construction, for the reason that he might not be able to compel the attendance of witnesses or the aid of counsel on Sunday. This consideration, however, is not raised by any facts set forth in the record. The attendance of witnesses before such a tribunal cannot be compelled at any time; but a lawyer appearing to defend might be regarded as doing work of his ordinary calling. If either witnesses or counsel should be unwilling to attend on Sunday, or for any cause tending to deprive one of a fair trial he should ask for a reasonable postponement on that account, and it should be refused, there would be strong reason for holding such an expulsion to be illegal. But no such facts appear in this case.

We decide that the demurrer to the answer cannot be sustained upon the grounds stated.

1. An objection to the declaration in an action for personal injuries, based on a formal defect in that it did not set forth any duty owing from defendant to plaintiff, cannot be raised before the appellate court in the first instance.

NOTE.—As to liability of master for injury to servant from use of compressed air in tunnel when servant was ignorant of the danger, see Turner v. St. Clair Tunnel Co. (Mich.) 36 L. R. A. 134, and 47 L. R. A. 112.

As to effect of servant's lack of knowledge of danger on question of assumption of risk generally, see cases in note to O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. (Mass.) 47 L. R. A. 161. 60 L. R. A.

2. A servant undertaking to clean a drain filled with decaying animal matter does not assume the risk of injuries from dangerous gases of which he has no knowledge, the effect of which it requires special scientific knowledge to measure and determine, although he knows of the character of the contents of the drain, and that it emits offensive odors.
3. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that an employer sending a servant to clean out a drain filled with decaying animal matter cannot know of the presence of noxious and deadly gases therein which might cause serious injury to the servant, so as to be charged with the duty of informing the servant of the danger, or taking measures to protect him therefrom.

(November 26, 1902.)

ON DEMURRER to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. B. W. Hallett and H. W. Kimball for plaintiff.

Messrs. Edwards & Angell, for defendant:

The declaration does not set forth any duty owing from the defendant to the plaintiff, the breach of which would give rise to an action in favor of the plaintiff.

Smith v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 152; Parker v. Providence & S. S. B. Co. 17 R. I. 376, 14 L. R. A. 414, 22 Atl. 284, 23 Atl. 102; Wilson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 18 R. I. 491, 20 Atl. 258.

The defendant's negligence, as set forth in the declaration, consisted in allowing a certain pipe or drain to become full of foul, decayed, decomposed, and putrifying animal matter. The condition of this drain or pipe became known to the plaintiff when he went to clear out the same, and the risk of injury therefrom was assumed by him.

Narragansett Brewing Co.* 23 R. I. 430, 50 Atl. 841.

The presence of noxious and poisonous gases in the pipe or drain which the plaintiff was sent by the defendant to clean was known to the plaintiff, and the risk of injury therefrom by reason of working in said pipe or drain was assumed by him.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is trespass on the case for negligence, and is before us on the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. The declaration sets out that the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a laborer at its place of business, on Mineral Spring avenue, in the city of Pawtucket,—said business being known as the L. B. Darling Fertilizer Works,—and that it was engaged in the business of preparing and pickling pigs' feet, tripe, and other meat, and about which employment the plaintiff was engaged by the defendant. And he avers that while so engaged he was, without any warning or cautioning, sent and directed by the defendant, by its superintendent and agent, to clean out and empty a certain dangerous waste pipe or drain, which had become stopped up, situate on the defendant's premises. And the plaintiff avers that he was ignorant of, and did not know and was not informed by the defendant of, the dangerous condition of said drain or pipe, and that, in accordance with the directions so received by him, he proceeded to clean out and empty said pipe or drain. And he further avers that the defendant had so carelessly and negligently allowed said pipe or drain to become full of foul, decayed, decomposed, and putrefying animal matter, that, by reason of the defendant's negligence, the animal matter in said pipe or drain, when opened by the plaintiff for the purpose aforesaid, produced noxious and poisonous gases, accompanied by a great stench, smell, and odor, and from which putrefactions there arose noxious, injurious, and deadly gases; and, while in the exercise of due care while doing said work as aforesaid, he was overcome by said noxious, injurious, and poisonous gases, and was completely prostrated, and was poisoned, and became totally blind, and otherwise sick and disordered, and suffered other injuries, all by reason of the defendant's negligence and carelessness as aforesaid. And the plaintiff avers that he had no notice of, and did not know of, the existence of said dangerous, noxious, and deadly gases in said pipe or drain, but that the defendant ought to have known and been aware that said pipe and drain had been stopped up for a long time, and that it well knew of the unfit, foul, and dangerous condition thereof, and yet carelessly and negligently set the plaintiff to work upon said pipe or drain, which it had so allowed and maintained in a foul, noxious, and deadly condition as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiff was injured, etc.

The grounds of the demurrer to the declaration are: (1) That it does not set forth any duty owing from the defendant to the plaintiff, the breach of which would give rise to an action in favor of the plaintiff. (2) That the defendant's negligence, as set forth in his declaration, consisted in allowing a certain pipe or drain to become full of foul, decayed, decomposed, and putrefying animal matter, and that the condition of this drain or pipe became known to the plaintiff 60 L. R. A.

when he went to clean out the same, and the risk of injury therefrom was assumed by him in entering upon said work. (3) That the presence of noxious and poisonous gases in the pipe or drain which the plaintiff was sent to clean by the defendant was known to the plaintiff, and the risk of injury therefrom by reason of working in said pipe or drain was assumed by the plaintiff. (4) That it appears by the plaintiff's declaration that the injury complained of was incident to the work upon which he was engaged, and was therefore assumed by him. (5) That the plaintiff alleges that "the animal matter in said pipe or drain, when opened by the plaintiff for the purpose aforesaid, produced noxious and poisonous gases." The presence of said gases could not, therefore, have been previously known to the defendant, and hence the defendant could not have informed the plaintiff of a condition which did not exist, and therefore there was no duty resting upon the defendant to the plaintiff in this particular.

The first ground of demurrer is based upon a mere formal defect in the declaration, and therefore is not properly before us. Miller v. Boyden, 22 R. I. 441, 48 Atl. 444.

The second, third, and fourth grounds of demurrer may properly be considered together; and the question raised thereby is whether the declaration shows that the plaintiff assumed the risk connected with the doing of the work of cleaning out the pipe or drain referred to. Defendant's counsel argues that it appears from the declaration that the condition of the drain or pipe was perfectly apparent to the plaintiff, and hence, if he chose to work under such conditions, he assumed the risk of injury from the defendant's negligence in allowing animal matter to collect in the drain, and hence he states no cause of action. We cannot assent to this. For, while the declaration shows that the condition of the pipe, as to its being filled with decaying animal matter, and as to its emitting offensive odors, was apparent to the plaintiff, it does not show that he had knowledge, or was in a position to have had knowledge, of the dangerous nature of the odors and gases in said pipe, and, moreover, the declaration expressly alleges that he had no knowledge of the presence of said poisonous gases in the pipe. Nor are these allegations necessarily inconsistent, as argued by defendant's counsel. A man may know of the existence of decaying matter, and also that it is offensive to the smell, but may at the same time be wholly ignorant of the fact that the odor is poisonous or dangerous. And when such a state of things exists, it cannot be said that a servant who is set to work by his employer in such a place, without any notice of the danger, assumes the risk thereof. He only assumes such risks as are apparent to the senses of an ordinarily intelligent person, and not those which require special scientific knowledge to measure and determine. Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501, 27 N. W. 662, and cases cited. The case is therefore clearly distinguishable from Disano v. New England Steam Brick Co. 20 R. I. 452, 40 Atl. 7, and Baumler v. Narragansett Brewing Co. 23 R. I. 430, 50 Atl. 841, relied on by defendant. In each of these cases the danger complained of was manifestly apparent to the senses of any person of ordinary intelligence; and hence, following the well-settled rule of law in such cases, the risk of personal injury was held to have been assumed by the servant. The case of Beittenmiller v. Bergner & E. Brewing Co. 22 W. N. C. 33, 12 Atl. 599, cited by defendant's counsel, also fails to support the position taken by him. There the plaintiff, a carpenter and foreman of a gang of men, was engaged in doing work at the defendant's brewery. They were ordered by the defendant's superintendent to put a certain stringer in place in a part of the brewery known as the "Ice-Machine House." Plaintiff and his fellows, in pursuance of the order, carried the stringer into the building, and began to raise it, but soon found that there was so much ammonia in the atmosphere of the room that they could only proceed with the work for a little while at a time; and they found that they were more affected by the ammonia as they ascended in the room, but they were ignorant of the place or places at which the ammonia escaped. They left work, but were ordered back to it by the superintendent; he saying that the ammonia was not so bad then. They returned to the work, and the plaintiff climbed to a place where he could direct it. While so engaged, he moved his head along in front of the partition, when his face suddenly came in contact with a puff or blast of ammonia vapor escaping through a hole in the partition. Plaintiff was overcome by the shock, and fell to the floor below, whereby he sustained permanent injury. At the trial of the case below the plaintiff was nonsuited, which nonsuit was sustained by the supreme court. We entirely concur with the decision of the court in that case. It clearly appeared that the plaintiff knew, not only of the presence of the gas, but also its nature and effects, and hence he assumed the risk of inhaling it. In the case at bar, as already suggested, the plaintiff only knew of the presence of decaying or decomposing animal matter in the drain, from which an offensive odor or gas arose, but did not know, and, so far as appears from the declaration, was not chargeable with knowledge of, its dangerous or deadly character. In other words, the danger which the plaintiff alleges existed in connection with the doing of his work was a latent danger, and hence was not assumed by him. See Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506. Moreover, it appears from the declaration that the work which the plaintiff was directed to do, and was doing or attempting to do when he sustained the injury complained of, was outside of his regular employment, and was work with which he was wholly unfamiliar.

The fifth and last ground of demurrer is untenable. We cannot say, as matter of law, that the defendant could not have known of the presence of said noxious and deadly gases in the pipe or drain, or that it was not its duty to have known thereof before directing the plaintiff to do said work. And so long as the declaration alleges that the defendant did know, or ought to have known, of the dangerous condition of said drain, we cannot say that it did not know of it. Indeed, by demurring to the declaration the defendant admits, for the purposes of the present hearing, that it did know of the dangerous condition of said drain, and also that the plaintiff was wholly ignorant thereof.

Demurrer overruled, and case remanded for further proceedings.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed for alleged contempt of court. Granted. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. G. Kittrell and W. W. Walling for relator.
Mr. Robert A. John for respondent.

Henderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding on habeas corpus to enlarge the relator from a commitment of the district judge of the criminal district court of Harris county on an alleged contempt, for publishing the evidence in the trial in said court of D. F. Williams et al., charged with murder, in the Chronicle, a daily newspaper published in the city of Houston.

The state, by her assistant attorney general, has filed a motion to dismiss this case on the ground that the relator, when he sued out the writ of habeas corpus, and thereafter since that time, was not in the legal custody or restraint of the sheriff of Harris county; and evidence has been adduced before us upon that issue. The testimony, in effect, shows that relator was allowed by the sheriff the liberty of the city of Houston; and on one occasion, it seems, he left said city for a short time without leave of the sheriff, but returned to the city. The relator testified that he was told by the sheriff to consider himself under arrest, and that his movements must be under the control of said sheriff; that the sheriff was aware of his purpose to sue out the writ of habeas corpus, and exercised toward him liberality, in enabling him to sue out the writ without confining him actually in jail; that the understanding was that he was in the custody of the sheriff, and, unless he should be released by the writ of habeas corpus, he was amenable to that custody, and would have to pay the fine. As we understand the testimony, this comes clearly within the rule laid down in Ex parte Snodgrass (Tex. Crim. App.) 65 S. W. 1061. A majority of the court in that case, after quoting certain articles of our Code, used this language: "We deem it unnecessary to enter into a long discussion of these articles, but suffice it to say that any character or kind of restraint that precludes an absolute and perfect freedom of action on the part of the relator authorizes such relator to make application to this court for release from said restraint." The motion of the state is accordingly overruled, and we hold that relator was entitled to the writ.

Relator has shown that no order of record was made in said case of state of Texas against Williams et al., prohibiting the publication of the evidence in said case, but that the judge merely, in open court, notified and ordered relator that the court would hold him in contempt of the court if said newspaper, of which he was the publisher, should publish said testimony in said case before a verdict was had. It was further shown that no affidavit was made by anyone charging relator with a violation of said verbal order; but on information, and of the court's own motion, he entered a judgment nisi against relator as for contempt, assessing his punishment at a fine of $100 and three days' imprisonment in the county jail. Notice was then issued, requiring him to come before said court and show why said judgment should not be made final. It is urged by relator that this procedure was irregular and void; that, in the first place, conceding the court had jurisdiction, an order should have been made and entered of record prohibiting the publication of said evidence; that, if same was violated by the relator, then an affidavit should have been made (the contempt being a constructive one against him), and an attachment issued, requiring him to show why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt for a violation of said order; and that it was not competent for the court, of its own motion, and without affidavit, to have in the first instance adjudged him guilty of contempt, and then attached him, to show cause why the said judgment should not be made final; and that such procedure on the part of the court was illegal and void. We are inclined to agree with this contention. 4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 776, and authorities there cited.

However, a more important question is raised, and we do not see fit to rest this decision upon the illegality of the procedure which was adopted. Relator insists (and in this he is borne out by the record) that in the publication which occurred in the Houston Chronicle, of which he was the editor and publisher, there was nothing of a character reflecting on the judge or the court, but he merely published a true statement of the testimony adduced from the witnesses in the case; and he says he was authorized to do this, notwithstanding the order of the judge, because the testimony was given in the course of a public trial in a court of justice, and the Constitution guarantees a public trial, and also guarantees the freedom of the press. We have given this subject that careful examination commensurate with its importance, mindful that, on the one hand, the dignity and authority of the courts must be maintained, while, on the other, free speech, a free press, and the liberty of the citizen must be preserved. Both are equally valuable rights. If the court is shorn of its power to punish for contempts in all proper cases, it cannot preserve its authority, so that, without any constitutional or statutory guaranty, this power is inherent in the court. But the Constitution itself, in our Bill of Rights, guarantees free speech and the liberty of the press. Of course, it was never intended, under the guise of these constitutional guaranties, that the power of the court should be trenching upon. Indeed, under our system of government, it was wisely intended that the authority of the court should be safeguarded and preserved, in order that all constitutional guaranties might be upheld for the safety and protection of the liberty of the citizen. We have examined a number of text-books, and in some we find it stated in general terms that the court may prohibit the publication of testimony in certain cases, but that the publication must have a tendency to embarrass, impede, or obstruct the administration of justice, and the case must be pending at the time of the publication. Rapalje, Contempts, § 57; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 60, subd. 3. And the following cases are referred to in support of this proposition: Tenney's Case, 23 N. H. 162; Sturco's Case, 48 N. H. 428, 97 Am. Dec. 630; United States v. Holmes, 1 Wall. Jr. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 15,383; State v. Galloway, 5 Coldw. 326, 98 Am. Dec. 404; State v. Dunham, 6 Iowa, 245; Shortridge's Case, 99 Cal. 526, 21 L. R. A. 755, 34 Pac. 227; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; Res v. Clement, 4 Barn. & Ald. 218. We have not had access to the common-law case last referred to, but it would have little, if any, bearing upon the question, as it is an old English case. Tenney's Case is not accessible to us. However, we have examined the other New Hampshire case, reported in Sturco's Case, 48 N. H. 428, 97 Am. Dec. 630, as well as the other cases named, and not one of them supports the proposition that the courts in this country have the power to restrain the publication of testimony developed in the trial of a case. Sturco's Case, 48 N. H. 428, 97 Am. Dec. 630, was a publication, not of evidence, but language abusive and defamatory of the court, and the proceedings thereof, calculated to obstruct the administration of justice, and was properly held a matter of contempt. The Arkansas case has no particular bearing on the subject. But in Galloway's Case, 5 Coldw. 339, 98 Am. Dec. 404, the court says that unquestionably the power exists on the part of courts to control the publication of their proceedings while in progress, but it says, "Not, perhaps, by direct attachment of the publishing party after publication, but by the exclusion from the court of parties who are there for the purpose of reporting the testimony or proceedings of the court," etc.; following Holmes' Case, 1 Wall. Jr. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 15,383. But even this was not necessary to that decision, because the court held that the matter complained of was not a contempt under the statutes of the state. However, in that case, in connection with the alleged testimony, the article was denunciatory and abusive of the court. Nor was the question properly before the court in Dunham's Case. What was said by the court in that case was merely dictum. It was held in that case that the publication of the proceedings was not a contempt of the court. We also find in Shortridge's Case, 99 Cal. 526, 34 Pac. 227, which was a divorce case, some general expressions to the effect that the courts possess the power to prohibit the publication of testimony pending the trial, where such publication would tend to obstruct the administration of justice. But the court held in that case that the publication of divorce proceedings, notwithstanding a statute of California authorizing such proceedings to be private, did not subject the party to contempt, though he made the publication in violation of the order of the court; that the publication itself was not calculated to impede or obstruct justice. The general trend of that decision, we take it, favors the proposition that, where the proceedings are not of an obscene character (and we are not discussing that kind of a case 60 L. R. A.

here), the court has no power to prohibit the publication of testimony adduced on the trial. The fact that no decision can be found in support of the power on the part of the courts of this country to prohibit the publishing of evidence developed in the course of such trial is strongly persuasive of the absence of such power, for, if it had been assumed to exist, evidently somewhere some judge before this time would have attempted it, and we would have a report of the case. But even if it be conceded that some other court in some other state had decided in favor of the power of the courts to inhibit the publication of testimony, and to treat a violation of the order as a matter of contempt, then such decision, in order to be even persuasive, should afford some good and sufficient reason as its basis; otherwise it would be entitled to but little consideration, especially when we take into view our constitutional provisions which have a bearing on the subject. Section 8 of our Bill of Rights guarantees the freedom of speech and the liberty of the press. Section 10 guarantees to an accused person a speedy public trial by an impartial jury. If the Constitution guarantees a public trial, is it in the power of the court to make it a private trial? If not, then where is the power of the court to prohibit spectators, or to require or enforce thereafter silence on those who may witness and hear the proceedings? If there is no power on the part of the court to prevent spectators from rehearsing evidence, by the same logic the court has no authority to prevent a publication of the testimony. Our Constitution is but in accord with the genius and spirit of our free institutions, which is intended to guarantee publicity to the proceedings of our courts, and the greatest freedom in the discussion of the doings of such tribunals, consistent with truth and decency. And as has been well said, "when it is claimed that this right has in any manner been abridged, such claim must find its support, if any there be, in some limitation expressly imposed by the lawmaking power." And this imposition must be in accord with the provisions of our Constitution guaranteeing the publicity of all trials, as well as the freedom of speech and of the press. We take it that the learned judge who exercised his authority in this instance did it, as he believed, in the interest of the due administration of the law; but the argument of convenience can have no weight as against those safeguards of the Constitution which were intended by our fathers for the preservation of the rights and liberties of the citizen. And, even if there was a conflict here between the authority and dignity of the court, that should yield to the plain letter of the Constitution. We accordingly hold that the court had no power to prohibit the publication of the testimony of the witnesses in the case, and that his act in punishing the relator for contempt for violating that order was without jurisdiction, and was consequently void.

The relator is ordered discharged.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina

v.

J. D. RAY, App't.

(131 N. C. 814.)

An ordinance requiring the closing of stores at 7:30 P. M., excepting Saturday night, is not authorized by general charter authority to make by-laws, rules, and regulations for preserving the health of the citizens, and such as are deemed necessary for the better government of the town.

(Clark, J., dissents.)

(December 16, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Halifax County convicting him of violating an ordinance against keeping places of business open in the evening. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. A. Dunn, for appellant:

It is not a nuisance to keep open dry-goods stores and other mercantile establishments to an hour later than 7:30 o'clock.

The law-making power of towns must act within the scope of their delegated powers, or their acts are ultra vires and void. They cannot do what they are not authorized to do by their charter or by the general law of the land. If a thing within itself is not a nuisance, they cannot make it so by saying it is.

State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1024, 48 L. R. A. 446, 35 S. E. 473; Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 236; State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 965, 12 S. E. 598.

Town ordinances must be subordinate to and harmonized with the general laws of the state, unless special powers are conferred upon the town by its charter.

State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 574.

An ordinance cannot legally be made which contravenes a common right, unless the power to do so be plainly conferred by a valid and competent legislative grant.

Messrs. Robert D. Gilmer, Attorney General, and E. L. Travis for the State.

Furches, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is the owner of a dry-goods and grocery store (not of liquors) in the town of Scotland Neck, Halifax county. Scotland Neck is an incorporated town, and on the 4th of July, 1902, the commissioners of said town passed this ordinance: "It shall be unlawful for barrooms, groceries, dry-goods stores, and other places where merchandise is bought and sold (except drug stores for the sale of drugs and medicines only) to keep open later than 7:30 o'clock P. M. except Saturdays. Anyone violating this ordinance shall be fined $5 for each and every violation." The defendant admits that he is the owner of a dry-goods and grocery store in the town of Scotland Neck, and that he has kept it open later than 7:30 P. M. since the 7th day of July, 1902, the date at which said ordinance was to go into effect, but pleads not guilty, and a special verdict was returned, finding the facts as above.

It is admitted that the charter of said town gives no special authority for the passage of such an ordinance, and that the commissioners had no authority for the passage of said ordinance, except the general powers incident to municipal corporations. This presents squarely the question of corporate power to pass and enforce such an ordinance without any legislative authority to do so, except the fact that it is a chartered municipality. It is therefore not necessary that we should discuss the power of the legislature to pass such an act, or to authorize a municipality to pass such an ordinance, and we do not enter into the consideration of that matter.

It must be admitted that the enforcement of this ordinance would be to deprive the defendant of his natural right,—would be to interfere with the free use and enjoyment of his property, used in such a way as not to interfere with the rights of others. It is not shown, nor is it suggested, that defendant's keeping his store open after 7:30 interfered with the rights of anyone else. It was said that the other merchants in Scotland Neck were willing to close their stores at 7:30, but the defendant was not, and the ordinance was passed to compel him to do so, for the reason that if he kept open the others would be compelled to do so, or to give the defendant the benefit of the trade of the town after that time. But did this give the commissioners the right to close the defendant's store?

It would seem that no legislative power exists, under our form of government and our ideas of personal liberty, as to allow such interference with one's rights of ownership and dominion over his own property, except such interference be exercised for the protection and benefit of the public. When such interference is authorized, it is under the doctrine of eminent domain, or what is known as the "police power of the government." The attempted exercise of the power in this instance is clearly not under the doctrine of eminent domain, but it is said to be under the police power of the government.

If the state could exercise such power (and we do not say it could), can a municipal corporation do so without express authority from the state? The general rule is that a municipal corporation can only exercise such powers as are expressly given in its charter, or such as are necessarily implied by those expressly given. This doctrine is well expressed by 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89, which is copied by Justice Avery in State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 962, 12 S. E. 598, and is approved and adopted by this court in that case: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." The same doctrine is probably more pointedly stated, as applicable to the case now under consideration, in State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1221, 24 S. E. 535, as follows: "An ordinance, says Dillon (1 Mun. Corp. § 325), cannot legally be made, which contravenes a common right, unless the power to do so be plainly conferred by a valid and competent legislative grant; and, in cases relating to such right, authority to regulate, conferred upon towns of limited powers, has been held not necessarily to include the power to prohibit.

. . . If the general power to pass by-laws, intended for local government merely, carries with it, by implication, the authority to restrict the use of private property by prescribing the hours when a person shall be permitted to occupy his own house, then cities and towns need nothing more than the enactment of a law creating them, with the incidental grant embodied in § 3799 of the Code, to give them equal authority with the legislature itself to restrict and regulate the rights of personal liberty and private property within the limits of the municipality. No such latitudinarian construction was intended by the legislature to be given to the statute, and its attempted exercise was therefore unlawful." It seems to us that these authorities settle the question, and plainly show that this ordinance was unlawful and cannot be enforced.

It is said that towns are constantly exercising such power over barrooms where liquors are sold. This power, so far as our investigation goes, is expressly given in the charters. But if there is any case where it is not, it must be understood that it stands on a very different footing to the sale of dry-goods and family groceries. Liquor itself is regarded as an evil,—an enemy of civilization and of good government. Bailey v. Raleigh, 130 N. C. 209, 57 L. R. A. 178, 41 S. E. 281; State v. Barringer, 110 N. C. 525, 14 S. E. 781. Its sale without a license is condemned and prohibited by law, and the regulations closing such shops might well be put upon the implied power, as being for the public good. But however that may be, that is not the question before the court, and what has been said as to the sale of liquors has only been said to meet an argument of the state.

It is also said that the state of California has exercised such power without express legislation, and that the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the judgment of the California court. But when those cases are examined, it will be found that they were cases where the business of ironing was carried on all night in a thickly settled portion of the city of San Francisco, consisting of old wooden buildings near the Sound, where the wind usually blew hard, which made it very dangerous to carry on such work at late hours of the night, on account of fire. And the opinions rest upon the ground that it was for the public good—the protection of the public from the danger of fire—that the city was allowed to prevent such persons from carrying on such work at such late hours of the night. But the Supreme Court of the United States only affirmed the ruling of the state court, which is the rule of that court where there is no Federal question involved. So it amounts to no more than a decision of the supreme court of California against the repeated decisions of our own supreme court. And were we to admit that the distinction does not exist between the California case and this case, which we have pointed out, the question then is, Shall we adhere to our own decisions, when we are not able to see any error in them, or shall we adopt the opinion of the court of California? We prefer to follow our own decisions, and are of the opinion that the corporate authorities of Scotland Neck were not authorized to pass the ordinance under consideration, and it is void.

There is error, and under the special verdict the defendant was entitled to an acquittal and discharge.

The judgment of the court below is reversed.

Clark, J., dissenting:

On July 4, 1902, the town of Scotland Neck passed an ordinance prohibiting "barrooms, groceries, dry-goods stores, and other places where merchandise is bought and sold (except drug stores for the sale of drugs and medicines only), to" be kept "open later than 7:30 P. M. except Saturdays," under penalty of $5 for each violation; and it was made the duty of the chief of police to ring the town bell at 7:30 P. M. every day, except Saturdays and Sundays, as notice. The ordinance prescribed that it was to be in force from 7th July to 1st October. The defendant admits that he came within the class specified, and did not comply with the ordinance, but kept open his store for the sale of dry-goods and groceries later than 7:30 P. M. and conducted his business just as if the ordinance had not been passed. The sole defense is that the ordinance is invalid. The judge below sustained the action of the mayor, who imposed a fine of $5, and the defendant appealed. The object of the ordinance, as was stated on the argument, and as is readily apparent, was to give the clerks and other employees of stores a rest from toil in the hot months of July, August, and September after 7:30 P. M. At that season the days are hot and long, business is dull, and purchases can readily be made by the community without inconvenience before 7:30 P. M. To avoid any reasonable objection, Saturday night is excepted, and the "early closing" is limited to the three hottest and dulllest months in the year. It seems strange that anyone should object to this modest concession to the clerks and others who for small compensation are at work from sunrise till late at night the balance of the year. So reasonable is the regulation, that by common consent the merchants of most of the towns, probably, in the state, have for years, by voluntary agreement, adopted it. But as one merchant in a town by holding out against it can force all other stores to keep open, thus compelling all the clerks and other employees to forego this small concession, the commissioners had no other means to secure this cessation of work, so beneficial to the health and comfort of a large and useful class in the community, than by the passage of this ordinance. There can be no question of the reasonableness of such an ordinance, and if this action of the local legislature did not correctly express the wishes of their constituents, or did not prove satisfactory, public sentiment would soon cause its repeal, or at least the matter would be corrected by the election of a board of commissioners of a different cast. Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 499. Certainly, if the power to pass the ordinance exists, the propriety of its passage is a matter that can be better determined by the commissioners elected by the people of the town, and conversant with the surroundings and the wishes of their constituents, than by five lawyers assembled in a public building in Raleigh.

The ordinance being a reasonable one, the only possible question is that of the power to pass the ordinance. The charter of the town (Private Laws 1901, chap. 342, § 15) broadly gives its commissioners the usual powers conferred on towns and cities by Code, chap. 62. Among the powers conferred expressly by that chapter are— independent of the inherent and incidental powers of every municipal corporation—those of Code, § 3799, "They shall have power to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for the better government of the town as they may deem necessary; provided the same be not inconsistent with this chapter or the laws of the land," and § 3802, "They may pass laws for . . . preserving the health of the citizens." In Hill v. Charlotte, 72 N. C., at page 56, 21 Am. Rep. 451, the court says: "We conceive that nothing can be clearer than that when a general authority is given to a municipal corporation, to be exercised through its proper legislative officers, to make ordinances for the good government, health, and safety of the inhabitants and their property, it is thereby left entirely to the discretion of those authorities to determine what ordinances are proper for those purposes." In State v. Austin, 114 N. C., at page 856, 25 L. R. A., at page 283, and 19 S. E., at page 919, Burwell, J., speaking for the court, after setting out in full the above § 3799 of the Code, says emphatically: "This is an express grant of authority to the officers of this municipal corporation to exercise within the territory made subject to their control the police power of the state, the only expressed restriction upon their action being that the rules and regulations made by them shall not be inconsistent with 'the laws of the land.'" There is no law forbidding a regulation giving clerks and other employees "in stores, barrooms, and groceries" a breathing spell after 7:30 P. M. on five days during the three hottest and dulllest months of the year. If the legislature can confer such power on any municipality, as is admitted, the above decision holds that it has been done. It is a most reasonable regulation, a humane and just regulation, and in the interest of the public health and comfort, and detrimental to the interest of no one. As was well said by Daniel, J., in Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 499, with that confidence in the capacity of the people for self-government and ability to regulate for the best their own local matters which marked the utterances of that court: "If a majority of the citizens of the town deem the ordinance impolitic or injurious to the people of the corporation, they have the power in their own hands to remedy the evil; but we cannot say that this ordinance is either against the general law, or is in itself unreasonable." The people are the best judges of their own interest and wishes, and, as Judge Daniel says, the correction should be left to them, unless an ordinance is on its face in violation of some statute enacted by the will of the lawmaking power of the whole state, or is so unreasonable in its nature as to be beyond the police power conferred to the municipality by virtue of the general statute.

A case almost on all fours with this, in the terms of the ordinance, and presenting certainly the very question of the power of the town to pass such an ordinance as this, has been held in favor of the power by the Supreme Court of the United States. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357. An ordinance of the city of San Francisco closed all laundries and wash-houses "from 10 o'clock at night till 6 o'clock in the morning." Those opposing the measure argued that the motive was to discriminate against the Chinese. Those defending it said it was because such occupation was dangerous on account of liability from fire. The court, adhering to the settled ruling that the motive in passing a statute or ordinance cannot be considered, unless it appear on the face thereof, held: "The provision is purely a police regulation, within the competency of any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers belonging to such bodies. . . . The same municipal authority which directs the cessation of labor must necessarily prescribe the limits within which it shall be enforced. . . . This is a matter for the determination of the municipality in the execution of its police powers." The validity of the same ordinance was again presented in Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730, and was more fully and elaborately discussed, and the following points, having no reference whatever to the danger from fires, were decided: "The objection that the fourth section is void on the ground that it deprives a man of the right to work at all times is equally without force. However broad the right of everyone to follow such calling, and employ his time as he may judge most conducive to his interests, it must be exercised subject to such general rules as are adopted by society for the common welfare. All sorts of restrictions are imposed upon the actions of men, notwithstanding the liberty which is guaranteed to each. It is liberty regulated by just and impartial laws. Parties, for example, are free to make any contracts they choose for a lawful purpose, but society says what contracts shall be in writing, and what may be verbally made, and on what days they may be executed, and how long they may be enforced if their terms are not complied with. So, too, with the hours of labor. On few subjects has there been more regulation. How many hours shall constitute a day's work in the absence of contract, at what time shops in our cities shall close at night, are constant subjects of legislation. Laws setting aside Sunday as a day of rest are upheld, not from any right of the government to legislate for the promotion of religious observances, but from its right to protect all persons from the physical and moral debasement which comes from uninterrupted labor. Such laws have always been deemed beneficent and merciful laws, especially to the poor and dependent, to the laborers in our factories and workshops, and in the heated rooms of our cities; and their validity has been sustained by the highest courts of the states."

After these two explicit and unanimous decisions of the highest court known to our laws that any town "possessed of the ordinary powers" has the right to pass "such beneficent and merciful" ordinances for the health and comfort of the toilers "in the heated rooms" of our towns and cities, by "prescribing hours for closing at night," no one has ever since contested the validity of such ordinances in that court, and the state courts have been as humane. Not till now has any court recorded a decision to the contrary. The above cases begun in the United States circuit court, and went thence to the Federal Supreme Court. But the supreme court of California has cited those cases, and heartily indorsed the principles therein laid down, in Re Hang Kie, 69 Cal. 152, 10 Pac. 327, quoting with approval: "The provision is purely a police regulation, within the competency of any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers belonging to such bodies." In Missouri, under a statute worded like 60 L. R. A.

our Code, § 3799, above cited, a city ordinance closing stores, shops, and other places of business at 9 A. M. on Sunday was held valid. St. Louis v. Cafferata, 24 Mo. 94. It seems there was no state prohibition as to opening stores on Sunday. In State v. Freeman, 38 N. H. 426, it was held that a town ordinance prohibiting restaurants from being kept open after 10 o'clock at night was valid and authorized by a statute not so broad as our Code, § 3799. To same purport, Hudson v. Geary, 4 R. I. 485. And there are other authorities to the same effect, as Judge Field says in Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730, and none to the contrary. The validity of an ordinance closing bar-rooms at a specified hour is impliedly recognized as valid and authorized by Code, § 3799, in the discussion in State v. Thomas, 116 N. C. 1221, 24 S. E. 535, which holds invalid, not the requirement to close the bar, but the prohibition of the proprietor to remain in it after it was closed.

In Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 400, 4th ed., it is said: "Under a general power to pass any other by-laws for the well-being of the city its council may, by ordinance, prohibit saloons, restaurants, and other places of public entertainment to be kept open after a specified hour, and objections that such by-law was unreasonable and deprived the citizen of the constitutional right of 'acquiring property,' were not considered to be well taken."

If the town commissioners of the progressive and growing town of Scotland Neck thought it would conduce "to the better government and aid to preserve the health of many of its citizens" (Code, §§ 3799, 3802) to close the places of business, except for sale of drugs and medicines, at 7 P. M. on five days in the week during July, August, and September, and that in so ordering they were executing the wishes of a majority of their constituents, are they not the best judges thereof, subject to correction only at the ballot box when a new board is chosen? Our system of government favors local self-government. Whenever any effort is made in the interest of humanity to lessen the hours of toil, and give a breathing spell,—a chance, however small, for the enjoyment of life to the employed,—a protest is almost always made on the ground stated by Judge Field (113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730), that "it deprives a man of the right to work at all times." This objection means simply that it deprives the objector of the right to work "the other fellow" at all times, without stint or limit. Someone has said, with more force than truth or elegance, that "civilization is held to the under dog." On the contrary, civilization consists in greater humanity and consideration for the comfort, the convenience, the health, of those who are not able to compel or to buy that which is conceded them voluntarily or guaranteed by law. The purpose of a government of law is the protection of the weak, for the strong can take care of themselves. The brief recreation and surcease from toil given by this ordinance during the hot summer evenings to the clerks and other employees of the stores in their town is an act which reflects credit upon the commissioners of Scotland Neck. Their action is warranted by the decisions of the highest court in the Union and of several states, and their power to do so has not till now been denied in any.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE of West Virginia
v.

John MCBEE, Plff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

- *1. On the trial of an indictment under § 16, chap. 149, Code, the burden of proof is on the state to satisfy the jury that the labor was not in household work, or other work of necessity or charity.
2. On such trial, refusal by the court, when asked, to instruct the jury to that effect, is error.
3. If, upon the trial of an indictment under such section, it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the jury that material, permanent loss and injury would come to the owner of an oil well by reason of not pumping it on Sunday, such pumping would be deemed a work of necessity, under the statute.

(January 14, 1903.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ritchie County to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the Sunday law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hunter H. Moss, Jr., and Camden & Peterkin, for plaintiff in error:

It was necessary for the state to show that the work in question was not "a work of necessity or charity."

The object of the statute was not to enforce any religious duty, but to provide for a day of rest.

By a work of necessity is not meant of physical and absolute necessity; but any labor, business, or work which is necessary to the accomplishment of a lawful purpose under the circumstances of the particular case, is a work of necessity within the statute.

Messrs. Romeo H. Freer, Attorney General, and Alex Dulin, for the State:

While the Sabbath, or Sunday, has its origin in the doctrine of the Christian religion, having been adopted in the place of the old Jewish Sabbath, yet in its legal aspect it is to be regarded as a civil, and not a religious, institution; as a day appointed by the law-making power on which the ordinary business of life shall be suspended, in order that thereby the physical and moral wellbeing of the people may be advanced.

The object of pumping the wells on Sunday was one "for revenue only."

In order that the state should make out its case it was only necessary to prove that the defendant was laboring at his trade or calling on Sunday.

A flow of two barrels of salt water per day into an oil well is not sufficiently injurious thereto to make the pumping of it out on Sunday a necessity.

It is the peculiar province of the jury to determine, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, whether the work charged to have been done on Sunday was, or was not, a work of necessity.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John McBee was indicted in the circuit court of Ritchie county under § 16, chap. 149, Code. The indictment contained two counts,—the first a general charge that the defendant "was found unlawfully laboring at a certain calling on the Sabbath day, said calling not being a household or other work of necessity or charity, against the peace and dignity of the state." The second count was that the defendant "was then and there found unlawfully laboring at a trade or calling, to wit, that of well pumper, pumping an oil well, the same not being a household or other work of necessity or charity." The defendant appeared and moved to quash the indictment, but the court overruled the motion, when the defendant pleaded "Not guilty." No ground for the motion to quash having been pointed out, nor error claimed either in petition for writ of error or in defendant's brief, and the indictment appearing to be sufficient, the motion to quash was properly overruled. The issue was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict of guilty. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict because the same was contrary to the law and the evidence, and to grant him a new trial, which motion was overruled. The defendant then moved in arrest of judgment, which motion was also overruled, and the court fixed the fine at $10, and entered up judgment on the verdict. Defendant procured a writ of error, assigning several errors in his petition, based upon bills of exceptions taken by him during the trial.

The first error claimed is in refusing to permit the jury to consider certain proper evidence offered by defendant, as shown in bill of exceptions No. 2. On cross-examination by defendant of prosecuting witness J. H. Davisson, counsel for defendant was questioning witness about trouble between himself and defendant, when witness spoke of the women folks having gotten up a trouble that witness "took up." When he was asked to "state what that was," he answered, "That was a little trouble among the girls there." He then asked witness, "State what the trouble was,"—which question was objected to by the prosecuting attorney, and objection sustained, and exception taken. While it is true the objection was sustained and the question was not permitted to be asked, yet on further cross-examination the witness stated fully in reply to defendant's questions what the trouble was, without objection, so that, whatever there was in the question and answer to benefit the defendant or affect the case, defendant had the benefit of it subsequently.

The second error assigned was the permitting of improper evidence to be considered, as set out in bill of exceptions No. 3, when witness W. K. Jacobs, who had charge of the Cairo Oil Company's property, testified for defendant. On cross-examination by the prosecuting attorney, witness was asked, "Is it not a fact that the Cairo Oil Company orders you to have your men pump this well on Sunday?" Objection of defendant to the question was overruled, and question permitted to be asked, and defendant excepted. Defendant, in his brief, claims that the question was calculated to prejudice defendant's case in the minds of the jury, by tending to create the impression that the oil company, instead of John McBee, was on trial. His answer is, "So far as the wells are concerned, the company never gave me any instruction one way or the other." It seems to me, the tendency of the question, if it made any impression at all upon the jury, would be favorable to the defendant, in that, if he had such instructions from the company, it would tend to relieve him from the responsibility which otherwise would attach to him alone; but, whether he had instructions or not, if the work did not come within the exception of the statute, being a work of charity or necessity, he was equally liable for the violation.

The next exception noticed in defendant's brief is that of the court sustaining the objection by the attorney for the state to a question asked W. F. Taylor, the witness for defendant, who was a practical oilman, and had worked in the oil field where the wells in question were situated, and had had charge of them some two or three years before that, and had stated that he had shut them down on Sunday, and that they did not get Sunday's production back until, probably, Tuesday, and the wells kept dropping off, and he commenced pumping them again, and got a steady production, and that he was afraid that to shut them off on Sunday would spoil the wells altogether, and that he believed that pumping them on Sunday was a work of necessity. Then he was asked to "state whether, speaking from your experience, there is likely to be any change in these wells since you were superintendent," an objection to which question by the attorney for the state was sustained, and exceptions taken. An answer to the question must have been purely speculative,—mere "guesswork,"—and the answer to the next question propounded by the defendant indicates very clearly that, if witness had been permitted to answer the question, it must have been to the effect that he could not tell whether there would be a change or not. He was asked to "state to the jury whether, after a well has been shut down as you shut down these wells, the shutting down of them afterwards is no more injurious than it was at first." He answered: "I don't know. Of course, it is the water that bothers them, and I suppose, as the water goes down, it would not be needed to pump quite so much."

The next and only other assignment of error noticed by defendant in his brief is the refusal of the court to give the instruction offered by the defendant as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the burden of proof is on the state in this case to establish beyond reasonable doubt the fact that the defendant pumped or operated certain oil well or wells in Ritchie county on a Sabbath day within one year prior to the finding of this indictment, and, further, that the burden of proof is on the state to prove that such pumping or operating was not a work of necessity or charity,"—as set out in bill of exceptions No. 11. This instruction was refused as offered, but modified by the court by striking out the last clause, in relation to the burden of proof, and the bill of exceptions shows that this modification was made because the law on the burden of proof was in effect given by defendant's first, second, fourth, and fifth instructions. I have carefully examined the said instructions 1, 2, 4, and 5, as given by the court at the request of the defendant, and fail to find in any one of them a single expression which could be construed to touch the law of the burden of proof. The first and fourth merely state that, if the jury believe from the evidence certain things set out, and that the work done was necessary to preserve the property from destruction, etc., and no
